What the boy wants for an ideal is something virile and manly, and his choice may readily settle on a prize-fighter or a great wrestler. But on the other hand if Christ is taught to adolescent boys, a strong man, living a strong man's life and overcoming great obstacles, then we have the attention of the adolescent boy. "A man's work in a man's way" is the Christian ideal that will appeal to every boy, not the idea that Christ was effeminate, and that the Christian life is well enough for women and children. A good way to get the boys' reason for dropping out of the Bible school is to ask them. This has been done with the following results: "Don't learn nothin'"; "Too slow"; "A kids' show"; "Just don't want to go"; "Men don't go"; "Rather shoot craps"; "Rather read the Sunday newspaper"; "Goody-goody boys go to Sunday school, none of it for mine."

Normal Work.

The chief normal work to be done is to train teachers for boys' classes. The imperative themes for the mid-week meeting of the church are such as relate to childhood, its training, temptations and local environment. One of the most important practical activities of the church is to fight home-destroying institutions. It is desirable to visit, study and coördinate with the church all other local means of education, such as the home, the school, playgrounds, vacations, libraries, museums, social settlements, local historical sites, and so forth, before defining the special boys' work in a single church, in order that the work done may be supplementary and may take such advantage as is possible, of these others. We cannot get the boys if we just pray for them. We must assuredly work and work hard if we hope to get them, and if we are careful and prayerful in all these preparations we shall succeed in getting the adolescent boy.

Get Him.

First we must get him, then we must hold him, then we must teach him, and finally we must win him for Jesus Christ. Someone has said, "Wherever anything is growing, one former is worth a thousand reformers," and our work now is constructive in the highest degree. In order to get the boy we must first get ready for him. The church must place the boy in the midst. It must organize around the boy. Its architecture and arrangement, its altruism and activity must make the adolescent boy the first thought and not an afterthought. There must be in the church, either the pastor or another, at least one person who is equipped for work with boys. It is necessary to develop in the home intelligent and active care of growing boys.

Should we plan a state-wide campaign to take in all the adolescent boys in New York, how many teachers, men, would we need? Over 130,000. In New York state there are about 750,000 boys between the ages of 12 and 18. That represents the field of all the churches, clubs, Young Men's Christian Associations and other religious organizations in the state, and that includes only boys between 12 and 18. How many other boys, girls, young people and adults there are besides, who ought to be in the Bible school. The Bible school problem, instead of being an insignificant one is one of the foremost of the day, and it will never be solved until the men of the churches take hold of it in earnest.

What to Teach.

So much for teachers. Now what shall they teach? Christ as a manly man. Clean lives. That is enough. If a teacher will present Christ to an adolescent boy in a straightforward way, the boy will accept him as an acquaintance, and later, with personal effort, as a Savior. How shall a teacher teach Christ? There is a great variety of ways, some of which have already been mentioned. In teaching the "Life of Christ" in one of the Young Men's Christian Association courses, each boy keeps a note book, and the teacher, with the aid of a blackboard, outlines each one of the fifty-six important events by which it is easily remembered, for instance: Birth—manger, Visit of the Wise Men—star, Flight into Egypt—pyramid, and so forth. This gives the boys something to do and keeps their minds on the lesson at hand. Boys may be taught by means of stories, pictures, and also by tactful questions. A fine way of teaching boys when they are on an outing or at camp is by reference to illustrations in nature, and there seems to be no time when a boy is more receptive and naturally more devotional than around a camp-fire, listening to a quiet, personal talk by the camp-leader. Then also in the realm of personal talks to boys with reference to personal purity there is a great field for teaching. This must be adapted to the needs of the individual boys, and must be tactfully discussed. These are merely suggestions. Every teacher must adapt his teaching to his boys.

Winning Him.

Now that we have followed the boy up the successive steps of getting, holding and teaching, we are near the top, for the last step is winning him. A boy is never influenced so much by a sermon as he is by a personal talk. "The sermon to an audience of one" is the sermon that counts. This is the way to win the boy. An observing teacher can tell when the time comes to have such a talk with one of his boys, and if he grasps the opportunity the boy is won. We cannot emphasize too much the value of personal talks. They are the keys to almost every problem that arises in the Bible class. A teacher need not be discouraged if a boy appears to be indifferent at first, for a noted worker among boys says, "There are as many different ways of boys accepting Christ as there are of boys going in swimming. Some plunge resolutely in, all at once, in a clean-cut decision for the Christian life; others wade in slowly but surely, and thus are won more deliberately; others rush in a little distance, then come out again, then go in a little further, and so on till finally they overcome all doubts and accept Jesus Christ; still others are forced in, and after they are in, finding that it is not so bad after all, remain devoted Christians; while others lie on the shore and wait for the waves to come in and float them off, and in this way they accept Christ." It doesn't matter how they do it as long as they do it, and if a boy accepts Christ you have right there a boys' Bible class teacher in embryo.

Things Essential.

In conclusion your attention will be called to several things that are essential in a successful work with boys in the Bible school. In the first place it is essential that the men of the church take a greater interest in the boys, that they sympathize with them in their sports and other activities, and that they seek to win the boys by establishing a bond of friendship and comradeship that will be a blessing to both. In the second place it is essential that a boys' club of some sort be formed in connection with every Bible school, organized along the same general lines as the Young Men's Christian Association boys' departments. By means of such a club not only is it possible to hold the adolescent boy, but also to develop material for teaching future boys' Bible classes. And finally it is essential that every boys' Bible class in every Bible school be taught by a man or older boy. This will be hard to accomplish at first, but we must work toward it and attain it gradually. If we go about the work for "those boys" systematically, sympathetically, tactfully and prayerfully, we will no longer say doubtfully "those boys," but we will say proudly, "our boys."

"Is There Room?"

The columns of The Christian Century seem to be thrown open to an opportunity for our brethren to express their minds and convictions as to whether there is room among us for such men as Cecil J. Armstrong. H. F. B. has expressed himself fully on one side. It is to be hoped that others will express themselves on the other side. I have no hesitancy in saying there is no room for men holding his views among us. Why? One answer is sufficient. He does not believe what we believe. He does not teach what we teach, and this on vital and fundamental points. He has done well to resign his pulpit. He should have taken this step sooner. As soon as he found that he was not in harmony with the people who supported his pulpit, his resignation should have taken effect at once. How an honorable man can occupy a pulpit in any religious body and live on the money of that people while he can not believe and preach that for which they pay their money is one of the unsolved problems. When the case is stated in stronger language, of which it is quite capable, viz., that if he preaches what he believes it would be utterly subversive of the faith held by the people on whose money he is living. Then common honesty demands that he vacate. He is "misrepresenting you in this pulpit" as much after making "a frank statement" as before. The misrepresentation is as great as before, with the added offense of continuing in the pulpit after making the statement.

Mr. Armstrong "frankly states" that he is not in accord with us on the means of bringing Christian unity to pass. What is that means? What was it with those who projected this movement? What is it now with all save a little few who seek to promote it? Plainly stated it was this:

Christian union (and through this unity) was to be brought about by restoring the religion which the Apostles gave to the world in "the new and living way."

It was and it is the only possible means to accomplish this end.

We are not to be drawn aside into a discussion of baptism, or modes of baptism, or the question of "letter" and "spirit," etc.

If baptism has a place in that religion given by the Apostles, and is part of it, there is no room for discussing it. It must be restored. By the way, some of us grow sick of this "I am holier than thou" attitude of certain who assume great exaltation, and large spirituality above us common disciples, by talking of obeying the "spirit" of the law rather than the "letter" of it, and proceed to call us "legalists," and mechanical Christians and other names. The most spiritually minded men I have known have shown their spirituality by a loyal obedience to the letter (which is the teaching) of the law.

Uzzah was a striking example of one who tried to obey in the spirit of the law but not in the letter.

Cecil J. Armstrong's action is to be commended and his example held up worthy of imitation by others of his kind.

Let him depart in peace and find a place with those of his mind. E. L. Frazier.

A Municipal Church

A Study in Practical Philanthropy

From the Rev. Washington Gladden's "The Municipal Church" in August Century.

It is safe to assert that the state of the Christian church in this country at the end of the first decade of the twentieth century is not all that could be desired. Without indulging in any pessimistic deplorings or venturing on any percentages or estimates, I am content to rest this statement on the experience and observation of intelligent men. Put this question to any Christian minister: "Is your church today sustaining the relation to all classes of the community which you would like to have it sustain? Has it the measure of respect from the high and the low, the powerful and the weak, the learned and the ignorant, that you would like to claim for it? If you are a pastor of a good many years' experience, do you feel that your church is gaining in its hold upon the people round about it?"

The only way to judge of the true condition of the Christian church is to bring it into immediate contact with the character of Jesus Christ. It claims to be the body of which he is the head, the organization in which he lives and through which his life is manifested to the world. The primary question is, therefore, whether its life reproduces his life. By as much as it does not must its strength be impaired and its influence annulled.

I do not wish to understate that part of our Lord's ministry in which he sought to bring men unto conscious fellowship with God. That work of restoring the wayward and the disobedient to the joy of sonship and the strength of virtue was never absent from his thought. We must not undervalue this, but we do need to get into its proper perspective before our minds this other phase of our Lord's ministry. And there can be no doubt that his relation to the poor and the friendless was the outstanding fact of that ministry.

We are comparing the life of the church of today with the life of its Master. How does it compare in this respect? Is it giving an equal proportion of its ministry to social service? Do the sick and the poor and the despised in our American cities think of the churches of these cities in the same way that the same kind of people in Galilee and Decapolis used to think of Jesus Christ?

Martin Luther's idea was that the care of the sick and the poor ought to be handed over to the community instead of being provided for by the religious organizations. His expectation was, of course, that the community —the municipality or the state—would be so thoroughly Christianized that this work could be safely entrusted to it. That was the idea of the New England churches also. When the town and the church were one, the church had the philanthropic work in its hands; when the church was separated from the town, the church relinquished to the town this part of its function. But is was supposed that the political community would be so fully Christianized that the work would be properly done.

It is highly probable that the first Christian churches were municipal churches; that in every town or city was one church with several local congregations, each with its elder or leader, and all co-operating in the work of the city. The need of the hour is the restoration to every town or city of the municipal church. It ought to include all the Christians of the municipality; every Christian organization should be represented in it.

Its claim to the philanthropic leadership of the community would not be disputed. If it is the body of which Christ is the head, that is its first business. In passing it over to the state the church has divested itself of its most vital function. The loss is lamentable, almost fatal; the weakness of the church in this latter day is largely due to it. The church must recover this function; it is not a mere matter of expediency, it is a question of life or death.

For such a service as this the municipal church would require no creed. Its simple message to the world would be: "We believe in the friendship of Jesus Christ, and we live to make it known to those who need it most."

Nor would it need any new machinery. In most communities the nucleus of such an organization as is required already exists. There is a local Federation of Churches, or a United Brotherhood, which holds occasional union meetings, and sometimes finds it hard to justify its own existence. Let it assume this task. Let the churches commission it to represent them in this larger service to which Christ is calling them.

THE FOREIGN SOCIETY AND THE EDUCATIONAL UNION IN NANKIN, CHINA.

Some questions having been raised about the union educational work in Nankin, we submit the following facts:

1. Our people and the Presbyterians and the Methodists, in the interest of economy and efficiency, have agreed to unite in educational work in Nankin, China, in what is known as the University of Nankin.

2. The first man to propose this union was F. E. Meigs, our own missionary. He it was that started our educational work in that city. Our missionaries have led in this movement. All of our forty-six missionaries save one approve this action.

3. Our advisory committee in China unanimously recommended this course to the executive committee of the Foreign Society, here in Cincinnati, and after a thorough investigation of the subject in all of its bearings it was unanimously agreed to.

4. The Foreign Society shares equally with the other societies in the management of the University of Nankin, each of the three societies having the same number of trustees.

5. We have had educational union with the Presbyterians for three years with satisfaction to all concerned.

6. The missionaries on the faculty have perfect liberty to teach the word of God as they understand it. F. E. Meigs is in charge of all the biblical teaching in the university. The Bible is a text book, and is taught to every student every day of the week.

7. The work of the university is not to train evangelists. The society has a Bible College for that purpose, of which Abram E. Cory is the head. The Bible College sustains the same relation to the university as the Bible College at Lexington sustains to Transylvania University.

8. If the union does not prove satisfactory the Foreign Society is at liberty to withdraw at any time. This property is legally safeguarded so that if it would withdraw it would not lose a dollar. The society retains its title to the property. It has given away nothing and will not do so.

9. The missionaries of the three societies were thoroughly convinced that by coöperating in educational work they could do their best work for China. The university is a Christian school to teach the Chinese the common branches of western learning, such as mathematics, history, science, and literature, and to teach them in a Christian way. While in school these students are led to be Christians and trained for Christian service. At the same time this school will give the Chinese people an ideal of what a university should be, thus influencing them to build their own universities on Christian rather than on pagan lines. In so doing they believed that they were contributing most largely to the advancement of the kingdom of God in China.

10. This step has been taken with the fullest knowledge and the most cordial approval of the brotherhood in convention assembled through a series of years. The facts were stated to the board of managers and to the convention at Buffalo, and to the conventions at Norfolk, at New Orleans and Pittsburg. These statements received the most cordial endorsement. Reference to the union can be found in the annual reports for 1906, 1907, 1908 and 1909. Not only so, but in the rallies held in all parts of the country for the past several years this union was explained and not a word of criticism was heard. Nothing has been done in secret. The fullest publicity has been given to the matter. Everywhere and always this concrete case of union in service was most heartily applauded.

11. The situation in China is not parallel to anything here in America. It is manifestly unfair to compare church college work there with similar work here. Here we have hundreds of years of Christianity, there the missionaries face a solid wall of paganism and ignorance. Here Christian people have been driven apart by occidental differences in creed and church; there the missionaries have been driven together by the overwhelming conditions of heathenism which oppose them. They wish to drop all denominational distinctions and make common cause in Christian education, in fighting their great common foe of ignorant paganism. Christian union is much nearer in the mission fields than at home. In Nankin, there is no parading of denominational differences as such, by either the missionaries or the natives. Because of this there is no general knowledge of these things among the Chinese. Christianity will be taught in the university in our atmosphere entirely free from denominational prejudice. What more could the missionaries desire? If our people can unite in educational work with the free Baptists here as we have at Keuka College, New York, can we not unite in China? Here denominational pride and differences are at the maximum; in China at the minimum. Our workers in Nankin will teach as they believe, with no restriction. Their opportunity for reaching people will be three times as great as before.

Real Christian union is coming in China before many years. If the missionaries do not give it to the native church, the Chinese will have it whether or no. They have no interest in the divisions of western Christendom. For a people who have been pleading for Christian union for a hundred years, it would seem to be the part of wisdom to unite in literary work, in educational work, in Christian Endeavor work, in temperance work, in moral and social reforms, wherever and whenever we can do so without compromising any principle or conviction. By doing so we will be in the position to exert the greatest influence when the oneness for which our Lord prayed approaches.

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

She let him out by the hall door. Archie Monteith looking out at the shop window saw him depart. Turning to meet Jeanie as she came in by the side door, he mockingly inquired if the minister came every day to superintend household duties at Hopefield. Jeanie merely smiled and turned towards the office.

"Where are you going, Jeanie? Can you not afford me a few minutes of your society, too? or am I only second best?" He could not hide his ill humour. But her mind was so full of Donald that she took no notice.

"Father wants me to write fo' him, for a short time, Archie."

"What, you write in that beastly, cold office, on such a morning? You shall do nothing of the kind. Get away upstairs with you. If either of us must write, I shall."

"How kind of you, Archie."

"Come into the office with me, Jeanie. I'll see if we can't both get off—I do so want to talk with you, today," he whispered, as they passed into the office.

"Father, Archie very kindly says that he will do whatever writing you want done. He thinks the office too cold for me today."

"That's real guid o' ye, Erchie—The work's a bit behind, ye see."

"Would the writing do after dinner, Uncle David?"

"Business first, pleasure afterwards, is a guid auld rule. It's only twa or three dozen envelopes to be addressed, lad. The accounts an' orders are a' ready tae slip in. I'll fold an' you'll address them."

"Oh that's nothing, Uncle David. We'll not be a jiffy. Run away to the fire, Jeanie you are blue with cold."

An hour afterwards Mr. Graeme put a number of letters into James Douglas' hands. hands.

"Post them yersel', Jamie. There's some important anes, an' there's nae trustin' o' apprentices. Look through them, Jamie, an' see that they're a' stamped an' sealed."

James threw them on the counter and turned them over. As he glanced at them one by one, his attention was suddenly riveted on the name, "Richard Smith." As he gazed his heart gave a sudden leap of exultation. Donald innocent! But he must be cautious. No man can show more cool self-control in an emergency than the canny Scot. Glancing towards the office, James saw that Archie had gone. Mr. Graeme was there alone. He put his finger along the gummed edge of the letter he was gloating over and it opened easily. He turned into the office and said quietly to his employer,

"Would ye give me another cover for this letter Maister, the gum o' this one's no guid?"

"Ye'll get anes in the blotter there."

He drew the order from the envelope addressed by Archie Monteith, and slipped it into another addressed by himself. He turned from the office calmly without another word. But grasped firmly in one hand he held the envelope addressed by Archie Monteith to "Richard Smith."

CHAPTER XIV.

Looking Backward.

When Jennie returned to the drawing-room, she found her mother seated by the bright fire, her knitting needles flashing in the dancing light.

"How cosy it is by the fire-side today, mother," she exclaimed as she knelt down on the hearth-rug and held out her hands to the heat.

"Ay, child—among all our blessings, the fire is not one of the least."

"No, indeed, one of the best, I should say How glad I am that I have not to do an hour's writing in that cold office today."

"Is Donald there? Has father asked him back to his work?" Jennie felt it hard to quench the eager light on her mother's face, but she could only state facts.

"Not yet, mother. But he soon will. He promised Mr. Sinclair just a few minutes ago that he would." Her mother sighed.

"Where is Donald now, dear?"

"Archie asked him to go to the post-office, and send his mother a wire, saying it would not be safe to motor while this mist lasts."

"Archie is a good lad to his mother, Jennie."

"Yes."

"What is he doing now?"

"He is in the office, doing the writing I should have had to do, had he not taken my place."

"You ought to think yourself a lucky girl, Jennie. He is very devoted to you."

"And yet he knows very little about me."

"My word—what will you say next? He knows very little about you, indeed! After living three years under the roof with you, in his mother's house."

"All the same, I repeat, he knows very little about me. He seems to think that he will just sort of take me by storm—running here every few days."

"Most girls would feel flattetred by so much attention."

"I suppose so, but that is not me. I would feel far more flattered by being trusted. If ever any man really wins my affection, he will be the one who can believe that neither time nor distance can change me."

"Perhaps you have never told him so, dear."

"The right man will not need to be told—he will know."

"And yet Archie is a good man, Jennie, and well off."

"I don't know. He certainly has been very nice for a good while now. But for the first two years of my stay in Glasgow, I thought he had a queer way with him."

"How queer, child?"

"He thought I was too young then, perhaps, to be thinking much, so he used to express his opinions pretty freely to his mother."

"Were his views not all right? I think myself you were too young then to form a correct judgment."

"But I am not too young now, mother." She smiled up into her mother's face saucily.

"No. But you haven't mentioned his fault. What was wrong with him?"

"I thought that, if he made up his mind to gain a thing, he would scruple at nothing to attain his end."

"You are too hard on him, Jennie. I rather like him for being so dead in earnest about his wooing. I never could trust a man who came sneaking about after a lass, ashamed all the while to let any one know he was after her."

They both laughed and wondered at themselves the next moment for having felt lighthearted enough to do so. Jennie picked herself up from the cosy rug and, taking a piece of needlework in her hands, seated herself in a low chair with her back towards the windows. There was silence for a time, then Jennie said abruptly:

"Mother, wasn't John McKitridge father's shopman long ago?"

"Bless my heart, child, what put him into your head?"

"Do you know that one of the reasons why I was so glad to take charge of the organ was that I could get away from our own pew? That man always seemed to be glaring at me."

"You shouldn't have looked his way, dear."

"I couldn't help it—his wife's face always attracted me. I think I never saw a face so sweet and patient looking."

"Ay, it would do for a portrait of a saint."

"And his would do equally well for one of a sinner."

"He's not a man to jest about, my love. I think I can safely say that he is the only enemy ever your father made to himself."

"Tell me about it, mother."

"It's not a long story, dear, but it's a sad one. Your father trained him first as apprentice, then as assistant, and last as manager. He trusted him in everything, and John got a good salary, too, so in time he married. It always was a puzzle to me how it was that so sweet a lass fancied him—for I always thought him a dour man. But there she was, as good a woman as ever brightened a man's home. In time there was a lad wean born, but it didn't live out the year. I mind well taking Donald with me to see the wee thing in its cradle, near the last. Some one had been talking to him about angels, and when he saw the lovely wee waxen thing lying in its white bed, he whispered to me:

"I see nae wings." With that poor Mrs. McKitridge fainted away. She had been worn out watching, you may be sure, and nature could hear no more. Well, the bairn was taken, doubtless in love, but folks can't see love when he comes that way. John McKitridge grew sour and dissatisfied. Then he took to drink—to crown all, he got mixed up with a lot of betting fellows, and that finished him. Money went amissing from the till. If your father had not always been one to mind his own business, matters might have been worse. When he accused John of pilfering, at first he denied. Then he said he only borrowed the sums he had taken, and meant to pay all back. Your father told him that if it were not for his wife's sake, he would make him suffer for his dishonesty. As it was, of course, he would have to look out for other employment. Would you believe it, Jennie, instead of being thankful to your father for not prosecuting him, he flew into a horrible passion and he vowed with a fearful oath that he would be revenged on David Graeme, cost what it might. From that day to this we have had no dealings with John McKitridge, but the pity of it was that in breaking with him I lost intercourse with his wife—the best woman I have ever known. Many a day my heart has been sore for her." Jennie's hands had fallen on her lap, and she was gazing sadly into the fire as her mother told the story. When it was over, she looked at her mother earnestly and said:

"Mother, do you not think sometimes that men are too hard on those who yield to temptation?"

"It is always hard to know what to do in such a case."

"Some might rise again if they had but the chance."

"Yes, dear. But is it right for an honest man to put his goods into the power of one whom he has found dishonest?"

"I don't think that would be right. But many a weak man, kindly spoken to, and tried for a time, in a place of less responsibility, might be won over to the side of right."

"Men don't often do things like that, dear, but let us be glad that the Master does." Mrs. Graeme's eyes were full of tears. She knew that Jennie's thoughts were full of Donald. Jennie now heard a step on the stair and she rose quickly, saying at the same time:

"Mother, stay where you are. I am going to help Sarah with the cooking."

"Who's going to help Sarah with cooking? Aunt Elizabeth, I ask you, is it fair that after having devoted myself to penance dire for the past hour, just to save my lady Jennie from a place of torment, that she literally is ready to turn and fly the moment I appear?"

"Indeed, I don't think it's at all fair, Archie—come to the fire, lad, and warm your hands. I am sure the office is enough to freeze one today. How your uncle spends so much time in it I don't know. It was real good of you to do the writing for Jennie. I think she ought to thank you for your kindness."

"So I do, mother. Archie, I thank you with all my heart for saving me from that ice-office today. And perhaps the best way I can show my gratitude is by running off now and seeing that dinner is not spoiled."

"Dinner be spoiled!" he laughed. "I want some music."

"Sit down and play for him, Jennie. I'll look after the dinner myself."

"I thought you wanted your shawl finished as soon as possible, mother. This won't be the last cold day, you know."

"Oh, I'll overtake it, dear. Sit down and give your cousin some music."

"Thanks, Auntie. You have some compassion on a poor, ill-treated fellow."

Jennie turned to the piano, and presently she was drawing from the chords most weird and wailing sounds. Archie waited for a time, hoping she might break off into lighter sounds, such as he loved. But she played on dreamily, seeming to forget his very presence. He seemed to feel his very heart chill when she drifted into a sort of reverie, sighing and wailing and moaning round the grand old melody of "Loch Aber No More." Archie, jumping to his feet, was at her side in a moment. Bending down till his face almost touched hers, he exclaimed:

"For heaven's sake, Jennie, stop—this is torture to me." She lifted her sad eyes to his in surprise:

"I thought you wanted music, Archie."

"Yes, something bright and gladsome and hopeful—not the wailings of lost things."

"How could any one feel bright on such a day? Think of all the weird, mis-shapen things one sees in a mist."

"No, don't think of them," he said. "Think with me, Jennie, that even darkness may be a friend betimes. Come to the fire and talk." He set a low chair for her where the grey light from the windows fell on her face.

"Forgive me," she said, trying to laugh. I don't like to look out at that dull, clammy thing. Let me sit with my back to it."

"You do not want to see with my eyes, Jennie?"

"It would be mighty dull living if all the world were to be of one mind."

"I suppose so. But when 'all the world' means to a fellow just another and himself, the dullness comes in nowhere."

"Is your world not rather narrow, Archie?"

"You would not think so if I were as much to you as you are to me." In all his life, he had never seen her look so sad. She was silent a moment, as if weighing her words. Then in a low, firm voice, she replied:

"Archie, you ought to know that I have very little room in my mind at the present time for anyone but Donald."

"It would not make you think less of Donald to give me a word of hope."

"I cannot give you hope. So long as my brother's name bears a stain, mine is stained also. No other honorable name shall be dragged down by mine." In the grey light she could see him change color. But he answered warmly:

"But, Jeanie, you are not mad enough to believe Donald guilty. I would stake my life on his innocence." She smiled wanly, pleased to hear him. She wondered, too, in a dull way, how ever she had, even for a moment, suspected this man, who spoke so kindly of Donald, of having had aught to do with the deed for which they were all suffering so keenly. Might not some other person's r's and t's and h's resemble Archie's? She felt ashamed of herself for having ever harbored such a thought. To make amends for the wrong she had done him, she now smiled gratefully back at him as she replied:

"I am thankful to you, Archie, for your faith in Donald. But you know everything looks against him. Besides, you and I have more reason to doubt Donald than even father has."

"I know Donald was foolish, Jeanie, for a time. But I firmly believe he told you the truth. Some one else has done this thing. I think it strange, very strange, that not one of you seem to suspect James Douglas. Now he is the first I thought suspicion would rest on." She looked at him wonder-eyed. He caught the look and hastened to add, with forced calmness, "the moment your father told me of the forgery." She felt reassured but only replied to his allusion to James Douglas by a slight shake of the head.

"If we did not know anything of Donald's past folly, I for one, would never think of suspecting him of this crime. I would just have thought that some one else had been in the office with father, while he was filling up the counter foil. That father had been called away and perhaps forgot at the time all about the cheque. The rest is easy to imagine. The temptation was too much for the thief." He was rather noisily putting coals on the fire, as she finished. Then he took up the poker and cleared the ashes and cinders from between the bars of the grate. When he laid down the poker his face was redder than usual. It could not have been caused by the firelight as the fresh fuel had darkened its glow.

"Even as it is, Jeanie, what you say may be quite true. What was to hinder any other man in the shop doing this thing. If James Douglas is such a paragon as to be above suspicion, why there are two other young fellows in the establishment. It is simply incomprehensible to me, how it came about that every one of you should agree in laying the blame on Donald. I will never believe it of him."

"As I said before, I am glad that you have faith in him. Mother, too, and—somebody else, firmly believe in his innocence. I wish with all my heart that I could."

"You must, Jeanie. It is your duty to shield your brother's name from shame. We must talk your father over, too. It is unnatural of him to treat Donald as he is doing."

"You must not blame father, Archie. He considers it simply his duty to punish falsehood and dishonesty, no matter who the guilty person may be."

"He has as good a right to believe Donald's word as he has to believe James Douglas's word. And as you say, some unknown person may have done this."

"If you can persuade father that Donald is speaking the truth, he will have the matter in the hands of a dective within an hour."

"It would be madness, utter madness," he said excitedly. "Do you not know that once in the hands of the authorities, the thing is public property? Does he want Donald's name—all our names, indeed, dragged into notoriety?"

"It would be simply terrible. But, oh, what is to be the end of it all?"

"The only wise way will be to hush the whole thing up. So long as there is a doubt about Donald it is something in his favor."

"No," she said firmly. "It would be far better to know the whole truth, no matter how black."

"Would you ever forgive him if he is guilty?" She drew a long breath and paused, "Have we forgiven people when we pray for them, Archie?"

"Yes—I suppose so, Jeanie. I fear I have not been a very religious man in the past, dear one. But now, I long to be, for your sake."

"We all need to be for our own sakes, Archie."

"The world has no joy for me apart from you."

"It will never have joy for me any more, I think, so long as my brother's name is tarnished."

"You know how I love you, Jeanie. Be my wife, and my whole life shall be devoted to your happiness."

"Would you consent to marry the sister of a possible forger, Archie?"

"If you had ten brothers, all forgers, I would still gladly make you my wife." His intense earnestness touched her. She could not help the soft light that shone over her face as he bent eagerly towards her. After all he loved her, and she might in time learn to return his affection. And then, he was so good to Donald. Even Mr. Sinclair had not shown such kindness to him or to herself. He would not be willing to marry a woman under such circumstnces. She was gazing wistfully into the fire as these thoughts flashed through her mind.

"Speak to me, darling. Say you will be mine," pleaded Archie passionately.

"I am deeply grateful to you, Archie, for your goodness to both me and Donald. But for the present urge me no further. Father is going to take Donald back into the shop again. My first duty now is to my erring brother. He needs me. If he has fallen indeed into evil ways, my sympathy and love may help to lift him up again."

"And you would sacrifice me for a brother whom you cannot trust?" He exclaimed almost harshly. Then more softly he added: "Why not allow Donald to do what he has been clamoring to do for so long? Let him go to Canada, and then the whole miserable matter can drop. All his friends and acquaintances doubtless know that he dislikes business and has been wishing to emigrate. Let people think that he is only following the bent of his own inclinations. Believe me, darling, it will be best for us all that no further investigations be made. Donald is sure to prosper, perhaps become a great man out in Canada." As he spoke the momentary tenderness died out of her face—

"You have been painting a double picture, Archie. At home, a sister surrounded by every comfort, enjoying every luxury even that her heart may desire, content and happy in the love of a fond husband. In a foreign land, her only brother, an outcast from friends, and home, and native land, without one loving voice to cheer his loneliness or utter one word of comfort for his sad heart. I do not like such contrasts cousin Archie. Please say no more."

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

Jesus and the Blind*

It was a favorite thesis of Renan's that Jesus achieved his Messiahship through the loving encouragement accorded him by those with whom he lived—his mother, his Nazareth teachers, the people of his generation in the Holy City, and most of all his disciples. There was in the air a great expectation. The singularly pure and prophetic life of Jesus encouraged his companions to think of him as the hoped-for Messenger from God. And this faith of theirs in turn reacted upon him, to create in him the Messianic confidence.

Not for one moment will such a thesis stand the bombardment of facts. Jesus became the Interpreter of God to man not by reason of his environment, but in spite of it. Not one of all those who influenced his life was great enough to mould it in the forms of that world-embracing program which is evermore associated with his name. His mother, sincere, discerning and high-souled as she was, never understood him. His teachers in the local school at Nazareth must have been of the class we know so well from the hints of the New Testament and the pictures preserved in Jewish tradition, small, pedantic, uninspiring men. As for the spirit of the age, Jesus first met it in that disillusioning experience in the School of the Temple at the age of twelve, and apparently he never lost the disheartening impression made upon him then regarding the formal and external nature of the religion of the day.

The Disciples and the Master.

And the disciples, the best men he could find, the group he had drawn about him as most impressionable and plastic to his touch —how much might have been expected from them. They at least would understand him They would not hold that crass and worldly view of the Messianic work which prevented the nation from recognizing its true Leader when he came. Surely Jesus might count upon sympathetic and intelligent help from them in all his ministry. Unlike the scribes and Pharisees, they had not to unlearn a mass of tradition before they could learn the secret of the kingdom. With fair hope of success Jesus might look forward to their education in the higher meaning of his work. Yet when he really put them to the test he found that—but why describe their state of mind? Our present study illustrates it beyond all need of discussion.

They were on their way to Jerusalem for the last time. The disciples knew that the great hour was about to strike. Many hints the Master had given them that a new phase of his work must soon begin. And in spite of all that he had said to disabuse their minds of the worldly hopes they had cherished, he saw that they still associated his arrival at the capital with the overthrow of the government and the establishment of the kingdom of which he had talked so much. This kingdom they seemed unable to conceive under any other form than a new political arrangement in which Jesus would be king. It was necessary, therefore, to make a final effort to correct this unhappy and misleading idea of theirs.

The Deluded Twelve.

So on the way toward Jericho from the East-Jordan country, Jesus took the twelve away from the other feast pilgrims who were thronging in the same direction, and had a heart-to-heart talk with them. He told them frankly that their dreams were in vain. He was not going to Jerusalem to triumph, but to suffer. He was going there to give his last and most impressive testimony to the world's sin and the divine love, and was to offer up his own life as the evening sacrifice of the world. He even went into particulars as to the specific treatment he was to receive from the authorities. No one should have been left with a doubt as to just what he meant. Yet see the result. Not a word of it all did they believe. He had spoken to them before in figures; this also must be a parable. It was simply beyond their power to rid themselves of the dream of glory which they had been so long fashioning in their souls. Blind they were to all the deeper truth of Jesus' words. Blinder they could not be.

And no more striking evidence of that blindness is to be found than the scene which follows. If any in all the group of disciples might be trusted to comprehend, it was John. The entire tradition regarding him warrants the belief that he was very close to Jesus in sympathy and affection. If confidence was to be placed in the intuition of any single member of this band, surely John was the man of promise. Yet hardly had Jesus finished his words of warning against their false hopes, and of entreaty to look at the real purposes of his ministry, than this very disciple and his brother came with the strangest of all requests. In the earlier narrative of Mark the two disciples came and proffered their request in person. In the First Gospel some degree of apology is implied in the statement that their mother was the one to present the petition. Yet, even so they were present to enforce it.

James and John.

The substance of that petition was this: They said they understood the immanence of the revolution that was to take place when he arrived at the capital. He was to set up his own government. Immediately there would be some offices to distribute. They had been very close to him all through his ministry. None had been more faithful. Would it be too much to ask that when he made distribution of these rewards of service, he would remember them? Frankly, they would like to have positions among the best he had to give. Would he not make them his two leading officials, say secretary of state and of the treasury respectively, with seats on the right and left hands, nearest to him?

No bolder or more unexpected request could have been made. The whole situation was so shocking and so painful that Jesus must have felt the hopelessness of making these worldly and ambitious men see, save by the hard discipline of events, how unthinkable a thing they had put before him. He said to them with utter surprise and grief, "Can you then share with me in the suffering through which I am about to pass?" Full of the illusion that the coming success was all a matter of a bold stroke of state when they should reach Jerusalem, they said without hesitation that they could share all that lay before him. And he answered them sadly, "Truly you will drink the cup, and pass through the baptism of suffering. But the offices I cannot give you. They must come in the fulness of time to those who are worthy, and whom my Father shall choose." He could not tell them that the robes, crowns, weapons and pomp of which they were dreaming would melt away in the heat of the fierce struggle that was to follow into the purple rag of scorn, the crown of thorns, the spears of Roman guards and the derision of Jewish mobs. In days that followed swiftly on, they read the meaning of his words in letters of fire and blood.

Blindness of Eyes.

When the rumor of this ambitious request reached the rest of the twelve they were angry. Not because the two brothers had so fatally misunderstood the mind of the Master, but because they had taken advantage of an opportunity to get the better of the others by making a previous request. Jesus saw that the blindness of the two was the blindness of all. They shared the crass and worldly idea of his kingdom. And not even the solemn words he had spoken to them so often had availed to cure them of this strange madness of ambition. The great lesson of humility was again laid upon their hearts. And how must those same disciples have written with sad and humbled hearts in later days the story of their blindness and of Jesus' patient and anxious efforts to lead them into the light.

After this struggle with the deep blindness of these dear and loving men, it must have been an easy and gracious task for Jesus to cure the sightlessness of the beggars of Jericho. Whether we suppose with Luke that the work of healing was performed as Jesus entered the city, or with Matthew and Mark that it happened as he came out; and whether we suppose with Mark and Luke that there was one blind man, or with Matthew that there were two, are matters of little concern. Such details the disciples told as they remembered them, and cared for no further precision of record. But the healing power of Christ was made manifest, and the blind had reason to know that the Son of David was with them, in power to open the eyes of the blind and to let the oppressed go free.

Yet ever the harder and more important task is to open the eyes of the spirit of man, that he may see the reality of the kingdom of God, that it comes not with observation nor with pomp and circumstance, but by the vision of the King in his beauty, and the Land of Heart's Desire, toward which our steps are ever turned.

His "farmhouse" is the most magnificent in the world—a palace, costing $1,600,000 in gold, superbly furnished, with rooms for 500 guests.

Church Life

Read about the National Convention in our "Church Life" columns.

The Religious Educational number has been unavoidably postponed until next week.

The address delivered by our absent editor, Chas. Clayton Morrison, at the Anglo-American Conference appears in this week's issue of the paper.

On another page will be found the program of the meeting of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society at Springfield, September 12-15.

Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of the Christian Century, is holding enthusiastic meetings in the churches of England. He is preaching every Sunday during his tour and making a number of other addresses. On a trip to Northern Scotland directly after the Edinburgh Conference Mr. Morrison preached in the Free Church at Huntley and the Established Church at Keeth. In the latter place a union meeting of twelve congregations and their ministers was arranged and a congregation of 1,600 persons heard Mr. Morrison's sermon on missions and Christian Unity. Among the Disciples of England he is greeted with large and enthusiastic audiences. In this connection we are reminded of a remark the editor made before his departure, intimating that it was his wish, if his editorial duties permitted, to hold an evangelistic meeting early in the fall after his return. We take the liberty of putting this in the form of a hint to the wise.

Rev. G. B. Garner, First Church, Columbus Grove, Ohio, has resigned and accepted a call to the church at Bluffton, Indiana.

The members of the church at Lima, Ohio, recently united in an outing, spending the whole day in one of the parks of the city.

W. C. Cole, pastor of the church at Goldfield, Iowa, is a nominee of the Prohibition party for state representative from Wright County.

J. Boyd Jones of the Marion, Ind., Tabernacle resigns to assume charge of the Central at Anderson, September 1, a call having been extended him July 10, 1910.

The new Christian Church at Dahlgren, Ill., was dedicated last Sunday by J. Fred Jones, of Bloomington, Ill. The dedicatory service was followed by a basket dinner.

O. C. Bolman, pastor of the Christian Church ,Havana, Ill., has accepted a call to the pastorate of the Christian Church, at Pekin, and will at once begin his new labors.

The new sixty thousand dollar church at Marshalltown, Iowa, is to be dedicated September 4, with I. N. McCash in charge. Mr. McCash dedicated the McKinley Avenue Tabernacle, Tacoma, Washington July 3,

O. H. Loomis, Tecumseh, Nebraska, has accepted a call to a church near St. Joseph, Mo., and will begin work there September 1. B. B. Burton, Des Moines, Ia., will hold a meeting at Tecumseh, beginning October 20.

E. H. Clifford for two years pastor of the Fourth Church, Indianapolis, has resigned and will close his work there September 1. Mr. Clifford is state superintendent of Christian Endeavor for the Christian Churches.

The pulpit of the First Church, Hutchinson, Kansas, is being supplied during the vacation of the pastor by C. A. Richards, who has been president of the Kansas State Reformatory, but has just resigned to re-enter the work of the ministry.

The new church at Iotumbe, Africa, has a membership of seventy-five. Twenty-five of these came from Bolonge and Longa as workmen. Some of these workmen belong at Lotumbe, and the homes of some are still three days' journey up the river.

James Ware, Shanghai, China, writes that in the last month over twenty have confessed Christ. "At the Yangtsepoo chapel we have had several confessions, and there are many signs of blessing, and there is every reason for encouragement."

Dr. and Mrs. Edward Scribner Ames, Chicago, have sailed for a two months' trip through Europe. They went via Montreal, Thursday, August 4. They will visit Oberammergau. Doctor and Mrs. Ames will return in time for the opening of work in the University of Chicago, October 1st.

Morton L. Rose, the wide-awake minister at North Yakima, Washington, has planned a series of mission Bible Schools around the city, making each tributary to the church and main school. On July 17th another new one was formed. Mrs. Paul Kruger is the superintendent. This is a splendid idea.

Clarence Mitchell, Ada, Ohio, has received the degree of Master of Arts from Ohio Northwestern University. Mr. Mitchell has been called upon for many special addresses during the spring and summer. During the next few months he will have some time for evangelistic work.

John Johnson, of Nantungchow, China, says: "The work still continues to encourage us. The colporteurs are having remarkable sales of Scripture portions. The meetings are well attended, and there are several apparently earnest enquirers. The Sunday-school grows in numbers and interest.

Next Friday will be known as "Disciples' Day" at Meyers' Lake, Ohio, where all the churches of Stack County will unite for a day's outing. I. J. Cahill of Cleveland will deliver the address of the day in the theater, at 10:30 a. m. His subject, "The Disciples' Contribution to the Religious Thought of Our Time."

A very valuable piece of land has been secured by the F. C. M. S. in Shanghai for $6,000. This is much less than the market value of the property. The Hanbury estate has sold it to the society for missionary purposes. It is because it is to be so used that the price is reduced.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the year to July 27 are $8,755 in advance of last year. A gain of $10,560 before September 30 will assure the $400,000. This amount is badly needed that the good work may go forward satisfactorily. An earnest effort on the part of all friends of the work will insure success.

Dr. Osgood, Chu Cheo, China, writes that the medical work is growing beyond bounds. The hospital is crowded to the doors, and patients sleep everywhere and on anything that can be made into a bed. There are forty-five in-patients when the limit is thirty-five. This is far beyond what it ever was before.

S. S. Jones, Danville, Ill., was surprised just before his departure for a month's vacation by a large gathering of the members of the church at the prayer meeting hour, and a meeting that took on the nature of a reception during which Mr. Jones was presented with a beautiful travelling bag as an expression of the good will of his people.

J. H. Gilliland, who has just closed 23 years of unparalled service in Bloomington, Ill., will spend the month of August in visiting his mother at Vermillion, Ill. The first of September he will dedicate the new church at Macomb, and will follow this meeting by a revival. His time is then engaged until after the first of the year.

Harvey Shelton, of the First Church, Fresno, Calif., filled the pulpit of the North Side Church, that city, on July 24th. Chas. L. Beal, the minister, was taken to the hospital for an operation on July 12th. The operation was successful in every respect. On the 21st he was allowed to go home. He left Monday for a three weeks' vacation at Long Beach.

The report of the Edinburgh Conference will be published in nine volumes. These nine volumes cost $4.00 in the United States and $3.75 outside of the United States. This offer will last until the 31st day of August. Orders with the money can be sent to W. Henry Grant, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City, or to the Foreign Society.

Word has been received that the "Oregon" has reached Kinshassa, Africa. There it will be rebuilt. Messrs. Wilson and Moon, with the aid of native carpenters and blacksmiths, are putting the ship together. Some of the longer pieces of iron were bent in transit and one was broken. In a few weeks the "Oregon" will be in the service of the foreign society.

The official board of the Wabash, Ind., congregation unanimously refused the resignation of their pastor, E. F. Daugherty, presented July 20, 1910, to accept a call to the First Church at Vincennes which ahe congregation there has extended July 14, 1910. It is Mr. Daugherty's expectation that he will take up the work at Vincennes, September 18th.

Dr. A. L. Shelton of Tibet writes that he has burned 160,000 brick and 40,000 tiles has gotten out a great deal of lumber, has burned lime, and has had floors planed and doors made. Thus far the missionaries have not been able to secure land so the building operations have been checked for the time being, but the securing of land is only a question of a little time.

J. C. Archer, Jubbulpore, India, says: "I am getting now to where I enjoy the work, and wish that I could be doing more. I take my turn with the boys at preaching. I do not find near enough practice for my Hindi. The press has kept me too close. Everything goes on well here. The last few days the temperature has been delightful. However, we have had some pretty warm weather.

John L. Brandt, wife and son, have just returned to St. Louis, Mr., after an eignt months' trip in which they made a tour of the world, covering a distance of 45,000 miles, visiting Asiatic and European countries and Egypt. For the immediate future Mr. Brandt will devote his time to evangelism, dedication of churches, and lectures. He may be addressed at 4528 Westminster, St. Louis.

The Sunday-schools have already given more than for the entire Centennial Year. Last year the receipts were a little over $77,000. For the ten months of the present year the amount is more than $78,000. The amounts received during the remaining two months will be a clear gain. Every school not having sent its offering, should do so at once, that the $100,000 from the schools may be assured.

The three adult Bible classes of the Sunday-school at West Pullman, Ill., recently gave a dinner, served in the parlors of the church. The young ladies' class is taught by Mrs. Shilling, the Women's Bible class by Mrs. C. A. Pearce, and the men's class by the minister, C. A. Pearce. There were three addresses during the evening by Dr. Elizabeth Stanford of Englewood, Mr. Beeman, president of the Englewood Athletic Association, and Mr. Chas. B. Hall, secretary of the Cook County Sunday-school Association.

Chas. S. Settlemeyer, Nankin, China, writes that there is perfect harmony of spirit among the workers at the Union University Nankin, which was formed last February, and that it is the belief of the missionary teachers that they have here a great field of usefulness. Among the students of this university there are 158 Christians, and 273 who are not Christians. Only 86 of these are from homes where father and mother are Christians. The grounds and buildings devoted to the use of this university are valued at $396,216. The income from the students for the year is estimated at $23,000.

The Fremont Christian Church, Washing-

Drake University

Drake University is twenty-nine years old, has eleven buildings devoted exclusively to school purposes, employs more than 150 instructors, and has an annual attendance of more than 1,800 students. The University is located in the best suburb of "Beautiful Des Moines," with easy access to every point of educational and religious interest in the city. Library facilities are unexcelled in the West, living expenses are moderate and opportunities for remunerative employment are unusually good. School is in session throughout the year.

THE COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE

The Bible College of Drake University was established at the opening of the school in 1881. It is

Free from the limitations of man-made creeds and sectarian domination; has a faculty of earnest scholars, each an expert in some branch of Bible study; maintains that spirit of loyalty to Christ which leaves the mind free to "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good"; has organic union with a large and rapidly growing university and affords an opportunity of hearing in lecture or recital many of the most famous world characters. Des Moines is an educational, artistic, industrial and religious center.

MEDICAL MISSIONARIES

Drake University has more Medical Missionaries in the field than any other of our schools. No other institution in the Brotherhood offers the advantages to be found at Drake University. The College of Medicine of Drake University is standard by every test applied to such institutions. The training of the medical missionary in the College of Liberal Arts, the College of the Bible and the College of Medicine assures the best preparation for complete service.

Scholarships for Bible College Students

Free scholarships are provided by the university and its friends for all students preparing for the ministry or the mission field.

ton, just concluded a meeting with twenty-seven added. F. H. Groom of Tacoma, did the preaching and Miss Mary Lingenfelter did the solo work and had charge of the music. The church is greatly strengthened by the new additions and a fine impression is made in the community. "Mr. Groom is a great preacher. He is a student of the times and preaches an up-to-date message. It is the adaptation of the Old Gospel to the new age. He has solved the problem of the student and the evangelist. There is nothing left to apologize for but a feeling of pride that there are such men who can win men by an intelligent gospel message."

A new church was dedicated at Plainview, Texas, Sunday, July 17. E. W. Allen preached the dedicatory sermon in the forenoon and preached again in the evening. In the afternoon was held a special service for young people. The building has been erected under the leadership of Jewell Howard, who began his service with this church the first of January, 1909. It will seat 600 people and is well equipped for the work of the Sunday school. The finishing is of the best material obtainable. The church has gained great credit in the community by the success and character of their work in erecting the new edifice. Following the dedication a meeting is being held with Homer T. Wilson as evangelist.

R. B. Doan, Streator, Ill., began work in his new parish at Armington, Ill., the first Sunday in August.

George B. Van Arsdale and Evangelist C. L. Organ each occupied the pulpit of the South Broadway Church, Denver one Sunday during July.

Charles William Dean, Pueblo, has been called to the pastorate of the church at Fort Collins, Colo. Mr. Dean has resigned as state evangelist and enters upon his new duties at once.

specialists will meet every morning from 8:00 to 9:30 in conference with the National Bible School secretary presiding, and in these meetings the 1911 front rank standard will be drawn up.

Announcement is made in Cincinnati papers that J. L. Hill, formerly pastor of the Central Church of that city will preach a series of Sunday morning sermons from the band stand at the Zoo. Mr. Hill believes that the preacher of today should like his Master go where the people are.

A note just received from L. C. Hammond, pastor of the "Church of Christ, Morningston Road, Southport, England, reads: "C. C. Morrison paid us a visit a fortnight ago and on the Lord's Day preached at both services His word was with power and made a great impression."

The Topeka Convention

Preparations are well under way for Bible School Day in the Topeka Convention. Saturday afternoon and night, October 15, are given over to the Bible School and both sessions are sure to be packed full of good things. The night addresses will be made by R. P. Shepherd and Herbert Moninger, whose names are sufficient guarantee in themselves. The afternoon program is not yet complete, but of one item we are sure, and that is an address from Hugh McLellan of Texas, on "The Bible School and the Christian Conquest of America."

A few other special features may also be announced:

1. There will be a great parade of Adult
2. There will be a Teacher Training luncheon at five-thirty in the evening, where this important subject will come up for thoughtful discussion, with Clarence L. DePew of Illinois as toastmaster.
3. There will be a record Bible School on Sunday morning in charge of Myron C. Settle, the Kansas man, and it promises to be what its name betokens, a Record School.
4. There will be a mammoth exhibition of literature, Adult Bible Class matter, records, banners, Teacher Training material, maps, hand work, superintendent's devices, programs, plans and all that goes to make up the material equipment of the Bible School.
5. The state men and other Bible School Men's Classes at one o'clock, the like of which our people have never seen before, in charge of D. P. Gribben of Kansas City.

Make your plans right now to go to Topeka for the Bible School sessions of October 15.

New Chancellor

At a meeting of the board of trustees of Cotner University, held July 26, William Oeschger of Vincennes, Ind., was selected as chancellor of Cotner University to succeed Dr. William P. Aylesworth, resigned. The board of trustees reluctantly received the resignation of the chancellor some weeks ago. He was elected chancellor emeritus and will be retained upon the teaching force of the University in the chair of Sacred Literature and History, also teaching Hebrew.

William Oeschger, A. B. B. D., graduated from Cotner University, June, 1894, with the degree of A. B. In July of the same year he entered Chicago University, receiving the degree of A. B. from that school in April. He then entered the Graduate Divinity school of the University of Chicago. Three years later he took his B. D. degree from the Divinity School. During his last year of residence in Chicago he served as secretary of the Chicago Ministerial Association.

In June, 1889, Mr. Oeschger took charge of the First Christian Church at Fairbury, and after a most successful pastorate of almost two years, he resigned to accept a call to the First Christian Church in Vincennes, Ind. He served that church for almost ten years. In addition to his church work, Mr. Oeschger was very active in civic matters.

Annual Offering for Church Extension

Begins

FIRST SUNDAY IN SEPTEMBER

Church Extension Supplies should be ordered at once so the orders can be filled promptly from the office at Kansas City.

THE FOLLOWING SUPPLIES WILL BE SENT:

Ist, Collection Envelopes; 2nd, A four-page pamphlet, "Church Extension and the New Century Before Us," which ought to be circulated by the thousands among the members of the church; 3rd, Pastoral Letters; 4th, Church Extension Subscription Cards.

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS THIS YEAR

is the amount we want to secure for the current Missionary Year for Church Extension. If we can raise FORTY THOUSAND DOLLARS in September we will reach the $100,000. Is this not worth working for? The Board trust that every minister of the gospel and every elder in the church will take an interest in enlisting the congregation, over which he has charge, in the Annual Offering.

ATTRACTIVE FEATURES OF CHURCH EXTENSION

1. Church Extension money comes back to go out again every five years. Loans are returned in five annual payments.
2. Churches do their best to help themselves and come to this Board in their extremity for loans to complete their buildings.
3. The Board loans about one-third the cost of the lot and church building. The church aided, therefore, raises two dollars for every one loaned.
4. Many congregations to whom we promise loans do not need them in the end. Yet they would not have had the courage to begin except for the offered help.
5. A loan from this Fund makes it possible for a congregation to erect the first building in a new town or ward of a city and thus gain immense advantage.
6. Our Board encourages churches to erect up-to-date buildings by furnishing church plans that are modern and useful and that are perfect as to heating, lighting, ventilation and acoustics.

The Essential Significance of Graded Lessons

RULING PRINCIPLE

The new education puts the pupil at the center and requires the instruction to be adapted to his needs. The history of education shows that the pupil for a very long while was denied this central position. The question of interest belonged to the instructor, not to the instructed. But modern education entirely reverses this. The nature of the pupil, and the consequent needs of the pupil, receive first consideration. Modern psychology, particularly the study of the child-mind, has shifted the educational center from subjects to persons.

BEGINNERS

The series begins where the child's conscious thought always begins, with the parental idea, and presents God to the child-mind as the heavenly Father, and leads it to the conception of this divine fatherhood through the simple and familiar relations of the child to its earthly parents. The very reading of the topics which are the subjects of the lessons in the course for Beginners is like sweet and simple music, and to any heart capable of appreciating the simplicities of truth it will indicate how natural and simple religion is as belonging to the very nature of the soul, entering into its most germinal development and working itself out in all the processes of growth.

PRIMARY

In the Primary grade the same simple but great themes touched upon in the Beginners course are continued, but just sufficiently developed to correspond to the growing capabilities of the child's mind, including, but not going beyond the widening circle of the child's extending associations and experiences. Nothing is forced in upon the child that is unchildlike in character; truths which the child can comprehend and that have natural place in his life are presented and repeated with that reiteration which the child's mind requires, while the teacher is content to wait for the germination and silent growth of the simplest seeds of truth in the child's heart.

JUNIOR

In the Junior lessons the pulse of life begins to throb more strongly. The great subjects of religious thought begin to enter; the simple introduction to the great story of history begins; the wonderful stories of the Bible begin to exercise their fascination; duties growing out of natural relationships are recognized; the choice of good and evil, and the fateful results of such choices, are made to be seen and felt; and the thought of God's providence over individual life is given manifold illustration in the biblical stories. In the fourth year of the series a more careful study of the briefer of the four Gospels is entered upon, followed by a study of the most striking incidents described in the book of Acts, and closing with stories from that larger book of Acts, the lives of later Christian missionaries.

INTERMEDIATE

Here we find ourselves where adolescent life begins, when the child ceases and the man begins; when the stirrings of those ambitions which are to issue in great deeds begin to manifest themselves; when the sympathies and affections become more intense; when the great choices and decisions are made; when the heroic spirit becomes dominant and when ideals are set up; when the great temptations open their deadly assaults; when the reason begins to exercise itself: a period of strife, and tumult, and strain, of high resolving, of deadly peril, of glorious victory. To this fateful period our new series of lessons comes with definite and intelligent understanding. Christ forever knocks at the door of life in every stage, but more distinctly and strongly does he knock at the door of the heart of youth at this period than at any other time.

SENIOR

This is the period for constructive study. It is the altruistic period of life and its spirit is optimistic. The individual begins to define his relations to others and the duties growing out of those relations. The sense of obligation and responsibility grows, purpose becomes more definite and the formulation of a life program is undertaken. Consequently the steady aim of the study and instruction in this period is to help the pupil to find his place and work in the world.

NEW CONCEPTION

The new movement is the outgrowth of the larger conception of religious education. According to this new conception the factors entering into the process are much more varied than was formerly supposed. All truth belongs to religious education, from whatever source it may be derived. Moreover, the aim of all genuine education is the production of sound character, and all instruction must be directed to this purpose. Consequently into these new courses is to be introduced the study of great characters other than those included in the Scriptures. And the moral heroes of every generation will be summoned to illustrate and impress the great elements of noble character.

THE BIBLE

The Bible is used as the most valuable material in moral and religious instruction; and it is used with discrimination, with a clear understanding that we must select from it in the progressive education of the child such material as answers to the needs of the child at the various stages of his growth. The Bible is a great storehouse of spiritual food, but in its stores is food for the little child and the strong man. Henceforth we are to give to the child only that which belongs to the child and to the man only what belongs to the man.

FOR TEACHERS

WE implore thy blessing, O God, on all the men and women who teach the children and youth of our nation, for they are the potent friends and helpers of our homes. Into their hands we daily commit the dearest that we have, and as they make our children, so shall future years see them. Grant them an abiding consciousness that they are co-workers with thee, thou great teacher of humanity, and that thou hast charged them with the holy duty of bringing forth from the budding life of the young the mysterious stores of character and ability which thou hast hidden in them. Teach them to reverence the young lives, clean and plastic, which have newly come from thee, and to realize that generations still unborn shall rue their sloth or rise to higher levels through their wisdom and faithfulness. Gird them for their task with thy patience and tranquility, with a great fatherly and motherly love for the young, and with special tenderness for the backward and afflicted. Save them from physical exhaustion, from loneliness and discouragement, from the numbness of routine, and from all bitterness of heart.

We bless thee for the free and noble spirit that is breathing with quickening power upon the educational life of our day, and for the men and women of large mind and loving heart who have made that spirit our common possession by their teaching and example. But grant that a higher obedience and self-restraint may grow in the new atmosphere of freedom. We remember with gratitude to thee the godly teachers of our own youth who won our hearts to higher purposes by the sacred contagion of their life. May the strength and beauty of Christ-like service still be plainly wrought in the lives of their successors that our children may not want for strong models of devout manhood on whom their characters can be moulded.

Do thou reward thy servants with a glad sense of their own eternal worth as teachers of the race, and in the heat of the day do thou show them the spring by the wayside that flows from the eternal silence of God and gives new light to the eyes of all who drink it.

The New Head at Cotner

Some weeks since when my resignation as chancellor of Cotner University was tendered, it was planned to withhold the announcement until, if possible, the name of a successor could be given at the same time. I am delighted to be able to say that William Oeschger, late of Vincennes, Indiana, has been unanimously chosen to fill the vacancy and has accepted.

This step on my part has been the result of much prayerful consideration. Twenty-one years of my life have been spent here, fifteen of which, including the year of organization, as acting president, I have borne executive responsibility. These have been very strenuous but blessed years. But the work has grown heavier each year. Heretofore administrative duties have been combined with active work as teacher in the department of sacred literature. This cannot be long combined with profit. Executive duties, the building up of a better foundation and better public representation, demand not only mental ability but the best vigor and enthusiasm of a younger man. The department of sacred literature must also be enlarged and strengthened.

Bro. Oeschger brings to the work he has accepted very thorough scholarly preparation. He is wise and constructive in spirit. Thorough biblical training and deep spirituality have kept him from extremes. He is a growing man. He is persistent, not easily discourgaed. He has a strong body and enjoys perfect health. He has always believed in his alma mater. He was a charter student of the institution. He undertakes it in the right spirit, not as a stepping stone to easier things, but as a life ambition.

Personally, no successor could make easier the severing of a relationship in which I have had the constant sympathy and support of my co-workers in the past. An honored pupil of other years, a son in the gospel, a personal friend, I feel a sense of satisfaction in welcoming him to his important place.

Bro. Oeschger has a strenuous work before him. I am sure he will have the sympathy and support of his co-workers and of the entire brotherhood. With such support, coupled with his ability and preparation, he will succeed. W. P. Aylsworth.

San Juan is shown to be the largest town in the island, its population being 48,716. Ponce comes next with 35,027. San Juan made a gain in the eleven years of 16,668 or 52 per cent, and Ponce a gain of 7,075 or slightly over 25 per cent.

The Three Resurrections

What Was the Thought of the Resurrection in the Early Church?

The hopes that relate themselves to the future life, and that have become so imperishably a part of the Christian faith, are in large degree expressed in the Word of God in terms of that revival of the flesh which was to Hebrew minds an indispensable condition of the conquest of death. Therefore, though the classic difference between the two ideas, the future life and the resurrection of the body, is very great, in the vocabulary of the New Testament it disappears.

A correspondent asks us to discuss the theme of the resurrection as the early church interpreted it. It is a theme so closely and vitally connected with the message of Christianity to the world that it needs clear and emphatic statement, and for this reason we are the more concerned to respond to the request.

The New Testament deals with three resurrections, the resurrection of our Lord from the grave, the resurrection of the believer from death to the life eternal, and the daily resurrection from the life of sin to the estate of vital relationship with God.

Our Savior rose from the dead. Of this the New Testament is the confident and constant witness. After Jesus had been laid in the tomb, and the hopes of his disciples had sunk to the lowest depths of despair, he came back to them, and made them aware by unmistakable proofs that he was alive, and alive forevermore.

The manner of this return of his from death we do not understand. Some of the evidence in the Gospel records points clearly to a physical revival, and many there are who find no satisfaction in any other view of the event. It is not difficult to construct an argument based on the conviction that the disciples saw and handled the same body which they had known in the flesh, and had seen laid in the rock sepulchre of Joseph.

Again there are portions of the narrative that unmistakably look toward some other sort of manifestation. There is a mystery about the event that baffles confident and dogmatic assertion regarding the manner, and drives one back upon the simple, clear and convincing fact that Jesus was not holden of the powers of death, but made himself known to those who loved him in some manner not to be doubted.

There has always been controversy between the advocates of the two views regarding the resurrection of Jesus. There will be controversy till the end of the day. It is a matter of small moment, eager and confident as the disputants often prove themselves. The one thing the church has affirmed with emphasis is the fact that Jesus "was declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead." The manner of the resurrection was a question of a different order, and of lesser import.

The second resurrection is that which the Christian anticipates for himself in virtue of his relations to Christ. It is the clear and confident promise of the gospel that death has no permanent dominion over the life that has survival value. And this survival value is conditioned upon right relations with God. Those conditions Jesus has made known to us in his character and teachings.

It was natural that this survival of death should take on the usual Hebrew form of description in a community essentially Hebraic, like the early church. To the Hebrew mind the only way in which life could be conceived as triumphing over death was through physical resurrection, the upbringing of the body from its place of interment, and its reinvestiture with the warmth and activity of daily living.

To other minds than the Hebrews this conception of future life was repulsive and impossible. The Greeks of the first century were believers in a future life, but the Jewish doctrine of the physical resurrection they could not accept. The modern world largely shares that disinclination to the Semitic view. Life eternal seems capable of belief and even of demonstration; the belief in the recall of the body from the grave finds little guest-room in the modern mind.

Yet it was inevitable that the early church should accept the forms of Hebrew thought as the best vehicles for its message. The distinction between the message and the vehicle is the present necessity of faith. For Judaism handed over to the church an entire series of curious speculations regarding the future life, not one of which is essential to Christian belief.

Among them was the apocalyptic teaching of an earlier and a later resurrection, the one of the saints to happiness, the second of sinners to judgment. Another was the chiliastic notion of a thousand years of blessedness, to be followed by a world-crisis and the final judgment. The apocalypses, which form so notable a part of the literature of Judaism during the last two pre-Christian centuries and the first hundred years of the church, are full of these interesting, but for the most part, mechanical conceits.

Yet they influenced the ideas and language of the church in its early years. Indeed, they formed the most convenient scheme for eschatology in an age which was not as yet prepared to understand the progressive realization of the divine purpose in the growth of the child of God into the divine stature through the ages to come.

Even Paul, whether or not he shared these Jewish views as to the future, found them a convenient frame on which to train the flowers of Christian hope in the minds of his young and troubled converts. Of this the epistles to the Thessalonians are abundant proof. Without any desire to formulate a program of future experiences, he finds it convenient and helpful to encourage his friends with the Jewish view of the end, touched with the light of assured Christian hope.

The third resurrection is the daily rising with Christ from the life of the world to the higher life of faith and trust. If we are risen with Christ we shall seek the things which are above. But the rising with Christ is no mere emergence from the waters of baptism, as a partial interpretation has been eager to insist. It is much more than that. It is the rising of the soul to the new levels of vital relationship with God. It is the conquest of the flesh, the victory over the second best, the realization of the fullness of spiritual power.

To such a level of being Paul himself continually aspires. And as if to warn us away from the supposition that it is some magical process of transformation at the end of life to which he is referring, he assures the saints at Philippi that his one ambition is the attainment of the fellowship of Christ's sufferings and the power of his resurrection. "Not," says he, "as though I had already attained, or were yet made perfect." They might think that as an apostle, and the chief interpreter of Christ in the world, he had already reached this perfection to which they all were to aspire. Not so, he says. He is daily striving to possess that fulness of life, for which there is no form of speech so fitting as the Jewish word that implies the revival from the grave.

This, then, is the real resurrection, the rising to the life that is life indeed. It is not some sudden transformation at a moment in the future. It is a daily experience of renewal and growth, in virtue of which the future life of blessedness is made sure. Far less essential is it that the Christian should speculate about the manner and the time of that life to be than that he should make sure of the life with God that is his daily duty and privilege, without which no future life worthy of the name can be conceived.

"The program of the future life has not been issued yet," said Henry Drummond. Even if it had been, there is no speech nor language in which it could be written so that we could understand it. The life of the spirit can be understood only by those who have attained some true measure of spiritual experience. All in good time that comes, as we rise in the school of Christ.

The ground of assurance for the Christian is found in these three resurrections: the return of Christ to his friends after death had done its worst; the assurance that we, too, through vital relations with him, shall achieve the life eternal; and the daily approach, through the practice of the Christian life, to the ideal which is itself at once the means and the beginning of the life that is life indeed.

Chicago has been entertaining the Knights Templar commanderies during the past week. The daily papers report some thirty thousand in the procession on Tuesday. The decorations have been very elaborate, and the weather ideal.

There is no form of Masonry which appeals more to the love of display than the commanderies. There is something in human nature that rejoices in a spectacle. Perhaps to one who looks back to the serious and noble character of the crusader knights, there is an element of amusement in the trappings in which the modern knight bedecks himself. In spite of the high average of the personnel in such a gathering, it seems hard to doubt that many a four dollar man in the ranks is wearing clothes, weapons and badges that run up into the hundreds. It is at least a satisfaction that so large a company of men could convene with so high a degree of order and good behavior. Masonry is probably a declining movement. There is not enough in it to justify the expense involved. But it is essentially a social organization, not without admirable fraternal features, and certainly harmless enough. The foolish charges made against it by its foes seem rather childish. It furnishes the public an occasional spectacle, its ideals are worthy, its ritual impressive, and in a faint and far off way, it keeps alive the tradition of orders that at one time, at least, were noble and knightly in their estate.

President Peter Ainslie of the American Christian Missionary Society has issued an address entitled "The Unfinished Task of the Reformation," which he called "an open letter to Protestants. It is an admirable statement of the ideals of the Disciples, and perhaps as fair a presentation of our appeal to the religious world as has been made. We doubt if strength is added to it by the paragraphs on the ordinances. The quotations from Luther and others on the subject of baptism are interesting as expressions of opinion from eminent men, but unconvincing and irrelevant in a present day discussion of the problem of unity. It must be by a different path that we come to common ground. But the spirit of the address is admirable, and most of the matter excellent. It might well be circulated widely by our people, and is intended for just the purpose which is germane to our efforts, and so largely neglected by us, the presentation of our message to our friends of other communions.

The journey of F. M. Rains and wife to the mission stations of the orient is an event of moment in the work of our Foreign Christian Missionary Society. We believe that the secretaries should visit the fields to make actual inspection of the work, and to receive suggestions from the missionaries. No official worker in the home field can know all the difficulties that beset the laborer in the far countries. Nor can these difficulties be set forth in any correspondence. Therefore the missionary secretary should see the work for himself, and should sit with deep humility and with open mind at the feet of the men and women who are actually doing the work. He goes not as dictator, but learner, and the value of his going, to himself, to the missions and to the churches, will depend on the spirit in which the visit is made. At the same time we believe the policy of sending out others than missionary secretaries is valuable. Some of the representative men of the brotherhood ought to go out, in companies of three or four, every few years. This policy has been tried with valuable results, and the Disciples ought to begin it.

The beauty of trees, the richness of metals and jewels, the strength of beasts, the vastness of the sea, the sweetness of colors, and of music, the brightness of heaven; all these things, humble and good persons know how to turn in good earnest to Christ's honor and the increase of His kingdom. These are the fresh green branches plucked by the wayside and strewn before Jesus—Selected.

THE PARTING.

George A. Kyle.

When comes the unfathomed Holy Hour,
  The sun's farewell kiss, the going, the soul
Leaving its life-scarred house, the talent
  Which God gives us for His good service use;
Ardently I pray that this strange parting
  Be like the ending of the fairest day,
Silent as holiest of sacred thoughts,
  Beautiful as twilight's lingering hues,
Peaceful as truest faith—no tears of grief;
  And naught within the hearts of those who stay,
But hope for the dawn of a Day Divine.

—The Watchman.

In Salvation By Faith or Works?

The problem of Paul was that of universal religion. The Judaizers insisted upon burdening Christianity with purely national rites. In answer to the demands of the Judaizers, Paul emphasized the doctrine of salvation by faith. He showed that faith was the universal element in the religion of Abraham. The hero of faith was a man whom all earnest men could claim as a brother. National customs divide. Faith unites men in a common brotherhood.

Faith does away with the necessity of an official priesthood. The man of faith comes into the presence of God without the mediation of men appointed to convey to humanity the grace of life. Faith does not do away with the dependence of one man upon another. It increases that dependence. But it is the man and not his office that gives help. The minister of religion, where men live in accordance with the doctrine of faith, is one with his brethren. Ordination conveys to him no special gifts. He is a leader by virtue of his character.

Faith is bold. It reaches out after the new and better. If the old is bad, the man of faith does not cling to it because he does not know all that is involved in leaving it. Confusion may follow the forsaking of the old but confusion is more to be desired than cowardly contentment with known evils. Luther was not able to foresee all the results of his attack on indulgences. He saw the sin of the practice and he boldly denounced the sin. The modern missionary movement had its origin in lives of faith. The leaders of the church were opposed to the movement. They had no faith in the universal gospel. They did all they could to discourage the preachers of missions. The latter were ignorant of the ways in which the nations could be reached by the gospel, but they had the courage to make a beginning.

The "look and live" type of faith has no basis in biblical teaching. It is a caricature of Christian faith. Faith is not a passive thing, it is active. The one who has it lays hold upon the resources of God and uses them for his tasks. Faith is a moral altitude. It is the assertion that life has worth, that it gets its worth from God, and that nothing can separate the soul from God except its own choice of evil. Faith, therefore, has its roots in character. The ability to believe in the goodness of God implies moral integrity. The worst man in the world has some good in him. It is possible for him to have faith. But his faith is weak and lacking in serenity. The unshaken conviction of the saint is due to what he is. As he grows into the likeness of his Master, his trust increases in strength and dignity.

The problem of James was of conduct. There were some persons in his day who thought it made no difference what a man did provided he accepted the orthodox creed. Religion with them was a formality. They probably believed that Jesus had lived, and died, and risen from the dead. These facts had no spiritual meaning for them. They felt no obligation to carry on the work of Jesus. It did not bother them that there was suffering about them. They were willing to let the world continue in sin. By a mere formality they had secured for themselves certain privileges, and that was all they saw in religion. They have many spiritual descendants in the modern world. Their ancestors were the pagans who thought feasts and sacrifices constituted the whole of man's duty to the higher powers. Justice formed no part of their conception of God or the gods. James says that faith as it is understood by men of this sort is worthless. Men are saved by service. There must be a vital connection between what is professed in the church and what is lived before men.

We may say, then, that salvation is by faith and by works. These two are not antagonistic. They are aspects of one thing. The opposition between them is in the minds of men who understand neither. Wherever good work is being done faith will be found. Faith cannot exist without expressing itself in righteous acts. The particular acts will be determined by the person and the circumstances. There is room in the kingdom of faith for great variety of custom and of thought. If we are weak in faith, we try to impose upon others our ways of doing things. We cannot see how any one can live the Christian life without the habits we like. Strong faith sees the universal in particulars that vary widely. But it never sees the universal in wickedness.

Midweek Service, Aug. 24. Rom. 3:28-4:8; Phil-3:7-11; Jas. 2: 14-26; Gal. 5:6.

Human law deals with acts. All noble mortality and God's law, which is the noblest of all, deals with intentions.—Alexander Maclaren.

SLUMS IN THE COUNTRY.

We have visited slums in many cities, but it was reserved to our trip through Ireland to see slums in the country. We have been in the country places in France, Holland, Germany, Switzerland and Austria, as well as in many parts of the United Kingdom, but none of them were to be compared with Ireland's country homes for poverty and squalor. Best of all, we have lived with Irish neighbors, walked through Irish quarters in the great industrial cities of the eastern part of our own land, and found how Pat and Bridget live when opportunity offers. Few people ever choose poverty. They may become inured to it until efforts to escape cease, or become so hopeless and discouraged in failure to escape, that they settle down to it in despair and drink for solace, but poverty has no charms, and the only blessing in being born in it is the blessing of escaping from it.

More than one-half of Ireland's population dwells in houses that health officers would not permit to exist in America. The casual tourist does not see them. They are not the show places. They are not artistic nor antiquarian, nor a part of nature's beauties. You may even visit the very estate on which they exist and leave with no conception of them. The manor house will be in the midst of a park, and well macadamed roads will lead you to it. The "demesne" will stretch out over thousands of acres and the cottages of the care-takers will be neat little stone affairs with trimmed hedges, blooming rhododendrons and climbing roses all about. Deer may roam within sight, the meadows be rich and velvety, little pony carts ply here and there and some lovely water sparkle in the glint of sun or lie rich and blue under the clouds. Splendid sleek coated cattle may feed in the deep green meadow and some range of steep blue hills, half curtained in a veil of cloud woo you to say Ireland is the loveliest land the sun shines down upon.

But get away from the mansion and meadows where cattle have driven men off the heritage of their fathers and betake yourself to those cloud becurtained mountains that breathed poetry into your soul. There you will find women and children making eyries and calling them homes—eyries that, like those of the eagle, are things for poetry until approached and their filth looked upon. The rook will fly over your head with his hoarse caw and the more you see of these homes the more will his cry and his presence seem to you a sort of an evil omen about the place. The cuckoo will throb out his doleful melody somewhere afar and he will seem to you to be striking out the dirge of a funeral bell. It is poetry yet, but it is no longer the poetry of beauty and the sweet songs of a winsome paradise, but the poetry of an Isaiah crying out "woe unto them that join house to house and field to field until there be no more room."

WHERE THE COTTIER LIVES.

Here in little groups the "cottier" lives. The bleak eternal hills that in this rich land would be forsaken for their very worthlessness furnish his "farm" and for that farm he pays rent. His house is built of the unhewn shale rock that is picked up within a few yards of the spot he builds upon. Walls are run up from five to eight feet and the chinks plastered with mud. A chimney is built up at one end until it tops the roof pole by a foot or two, and eternal earth furnishes the floor. The roof is of thatch. It is laboriously laid in straight and steep layers and bound down with withes. A single, unopenable window pane lets in the light and a thin door of wood, sawn asunder mid way up, is the only means of fresh air as well as of access. Inside, peat turf smoulders in the chimney, and above it hangs an iron pot, the only cooking utensil in the cabin. In it the potatoes are boiled, the fish stewed and the bread baked. A rough deal table stands next to the wall opposite the door and along it there is a plank set on stakes—the settle for the family. Of chairs there may be one, but seldom is it graced with a back. Boxes are used to supply deficiencies. There is no other furniture. Bedsteads are unknown in such hovels as these. A dirty tick of straw or a pile of straw without a tick makes up for the bed. In one cabin we saw a folding bed. It consisted of some poles with a coffee sack laid over them and with straw on the sacking and a blanket thrown over all. This was hung on four wires and drawn up to the rafters during the day. In most of the cabins there is a rough rack along the end wall and in it is laid, edge up, whatever colored plateware the family possess. This with an occasional colored advertisement, that has strayed that way in form of a calendar, complete the decorations. In another hovel we found one end partially pasted over with some strips of wall paper, a floor about six feet wide laid and a wall of thin boards some three feet in height partitioning it in. The secret was that the eldest daughter was attending one of the Congested District Board's lace schools and had there imbibed some ideas and earned enough money to make this pathetic attempt at the æsthetic. In a cabin in the north we found a Singer sewing machine. It must have been the wonder of the little settlement of Kiltinny. It was about all there was in the house but with it the comely young matron carried the distinction of cleanliness and did "fancy sewing" for the neighbors.

A FAMILY AT DINNER

A description of a family we visited at meal time in Southwest Ireland will serve to illustrate the habits of domestic life. The cabin was such as is above described. Under the roof was an attic in which the entire household of eight slept. It was reached by a ladderlike stairs. The peat was glowing hot in the chimney, for the day was damp and chilly. The door was open. The reason all Ireland is not dead or dying is that it lives out of doors. The mother and all the children except the largest boy were barefooted. The father and eldest son wore clog-like boots because they worked among the rocks in the garden and pastures. This family had two cows and fifteen sheep. For their pasture and an acre in small patches of garden they paid about twenty dollars a year. The wool was combed, carded and spun in the cabin. In a neighboring cottage it was woven into the coarse Irish tweed that wears like iron. The mother cut, fit (?) and sewed it into garments. For Sunday clothes the finest of the wool was woven into a whitish-like cloth of which the coats of the men were made, as well as the women's skirts.

We were greeted with a "welcome to this house, sir,—and (as soon as we had spoken) ah 'e are from America, sir, and ye are twice welcome here, sir." A valuable and rudely eloquent eulogium on America followed. Everywhere was the interest in America, and the uniform story of the friends and relatives out there. We were given the only chair as a guest of honor and conversation flowed freely about cows and sheep, bogs and potatoes, rent and rates, weather and soil, America and the poverty of Ireland, but an attempt to speak of the passing events of the world at large showed the provincialism and ignorance of mine host. He and his lived in these hills. He never left unless it was to go to Wales for a season in the mines. His horizon was bounded by these rocky mountlets and his dreams of America with its golden promise of work and wages. A glass of milk was brought to mine guest and the table was ready spread with the family meal. Indeed it was groaning under its burden. The great pot had been filled that morning with the staff of Ireland's peasant life. Hours before these had been turned out on the table—three pecks of "murphies" which lay a waiting the appetites of the blue eyed urchins when they should wander in. They ate as they came. There was no ceremony, no family gathering, and, nothing else to eat. They sat them down by ones and twos on the bench by the wall, peeled potatoes with their fingers, touched them to a pile of salt in the corner and washed them down with a cup of buttermilk. Sweet milk was for the stranger, but they must drink it after the precious butter has been extracted. They have bread each day, but not at each meal. Cabbage is the only other vegetable much used and fish must furnish the flesh diet, for it can be caught in the bay below at odd hours and in the evening. The mother took great pride in showing us the old spinning wheel. It epitomized the primitiveness of Irish peasant life. The spool was held in place by withes of straw and the wheel was connected up with a woolen string. There was no handle to the wheel and it must be turned with a forefinger—worn callous with the operation. The spool balked and fretted under its straw withes. A couple of pieces of leather or tin would have relieved the friction. The woolen cord slipped and caught alternately while a strap would have worked with ease. And there that mother would stand by the hour, turning the wheel with a finger, tirelessly waving her arm back and forth to regulate the feed of the fleece as the spool flew, then sputtered and stopped, then flew again, and slowly filled the bobbin with the heavy cord.

CRUMBS FROM THE TABLE.

About our feet the dog sought scraps of potato peel and Biddy and her brood scratched for what Providence might supply in crumbs from the table. Over by the fire, water had been spilled and the mud was slowly drying. On the plate rack were a few blue-printed pieces of china, and in the pot some dough was seething or baking for bread. The total money income of this family was not over fifty dollars for the year and they would average above those about them. Our shilling for attention given and the cup of milk was gratefully received. In another cabin to which we came belated from a long wheel through barren moorland, a pitcher of half sour milk was served with a bountiful supply of solid, unleavened bread. Hunger had made us ravenous and we ate feeling that an appetite was as good as a feast and the six pence was thought most generous pay. Never do these people name the price to you. All they have is yours with the most gracious hospitality and the price is "whatever ye please, sir."

The cabin above spoken of was among the hills along the southwest coast. A further pilgrimage into this section brought us upon many groups of cabins among rocks where no garden plots could be platted. By infinite toil they had built rock dams across the little ravines and caught the silt brought down by the rain and thus made plots that would range from a rod to three rods square. On these their potatoes were growing or a little patch of oats would be waving. Here were cabins without windows, single roomed little hovels in which families of from six to ten were being reared and the landlord paid his rent. The men from most of them were over in Wales working in the mines just at that time and the women and younger children were caring for the plots of potatoes and the little handful of sheep or goats. The fuel is dug from the boggy land hard by and left in ricks to dry, after which it is carried in great baskets on the back to the rocky home. A little donkey and a cart was found here and there. In the evening the sight of men and women carrying new mown hay from some cranny, flinging it over their shoulders for the climb, reminded one of the Alps, only the Swiss peasants keep their animals in better houses than these people were dwelling in.

Up in Galway and the middle west, the poverty is yet more dire. There the cabins often have not so much as a chimney and the smoke fills the hovel on its way to a hole in the thatch. We saw cabins built half in the hillside where the shelter was good when the bleak and damp winds blew, but where the sod was always damp and oozy. Do you wonder that when the people were evicted from their richer lowland soil, because cattle could be pastured for great profit than men could be kept, that they turned "cattle drivers" and "moonlighters" and made all Ireland a scene of bitter land warfare? If you do then come with us and walk for hours through that rich lowland where we meet few humans, but see pastures dotted with sleek-coated beasts and then on up into those bleak and barren rocks and learn that men were driven from that heritage of God's into this wilderness of the devil's because cattle paid better than men.

In our next we will tell the story of two estates and the difference between old Ireland and the new Ireland that promise holds since the battle has been won for land purchase.

The Church and Education

The Church Educating Itself Through the Sunday School

BY DR. HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The church is the visible organization which carries on the work of the kingdom of God in the world. This aggregate of religious activity is divided into local groups to which the same name of church is given. These local groups manifest in varying degrees the spirit and ideals of the total world-wide organization. With great varieties of ritual, confession and methods of work they are still controlled by the dominating purposes of the universal church. And the characteristics of the whole are measurably evident in all of the parts.

Like all other organizations which pursue successfully the work of development and achievement, the church, both local and universal, is interested in the task of educating itself for efficiency. Under widely differing conditions the various social groups which make up the organized life of the world are compelled to resort to this process of education for purposes of development and protection. The clan or tribe educates its youth in the arts and practices which insure it against destruction and promise it the greatest success. The family, consciously or unconsciously, is always concerned in the education of its children, even where that term must be limited to the narrowest definition of self-interest, in training the child to habits and industries that strengthen the family intrests. The guild is concerned to instruct its members. The association or union of whatever nature is similarly concerned to instill in the minds of its membership, especially those of less mature years, the principles for which its stands. Upon such efforts its own safety and future depend in no small degree. And the nation, as soon as it begins to acquire self-consciousness and awareness regarding its opportunities and dangers, sets itself to the task of public instruction, whether in the narrow range of military duties, as with primitive peoples or in the ampler region of intellectual and moral culture, as in modern times. Every organism is compelled to seek self-development and protection by the education of all its immature members.

The church is no exception to this rule. And from the first it has recognized the necessity of instruction as the means by which those who enter its membership shall be prepared for efficient activity. And since the call of God is the highest to which the soul of man can respond, it is inevitable that the task of education within the church brings the worker sooner or later face to face with God, the supreme reality. It is to attain greater knowledge of God and of those principles which enable the individual or group to live in harmony with his will that religious education becomes necessary.

Religion Needs Education.

As education needs religion, not less does religion need education as its ally. It must not be the one field in thought and experience in which competent training is to be considered unnecessary. In the Sunday school, as in some other departments of religious activity, unfortunately it has been the case that slight emphasis has, at times, been placed upon the educational principles universally recognized in other lines of instruction. This period of indifference is now closing, and happily so. The change is coming none too soon. The church can be protected from fantastic and fanatical types of teaching only by sound knowledge. It has suffered sufficiently from fads in religion to appreciate the value of true pedagogical methods. Fantastic exegesis of Scriptures, unembarrassed by any adequate knowledge of the principles of Biblical study or of scientific investigation, has led to curious teachings regarding many matters, such, for example, as the coming of the Lord, the end of the world, the relation of the Old Testament to the New, the laws of healing, and the application of Christian truth to matters of social conduct, teachings in which a grain of truth has not infrequently been mixed with quantities of chaff, and which have led to unnecessary and unhappy emphasis upon matters which were either largely erroneous or unessential. The only corrective for this danger is a sound knowledge of the facts of holy Scripture and of Christian experience.

The most important instrument which the church possesses for the accomplishment of its educational work is the Sunday school. This department of the church has been greatly enlarged and improved within recent years. Today it undertakes a far more complicated work than that conceived to fall to its direction in earlier times. It has gradually assumed the work of providing a large share of all the ethical and spiritual training which the average child receives. This is by no means an ideal situation. The home is responsible for the spiritual life of the child, and can never rightly delegate this function to any other organization. The public school and other institutions of learning have a direct and specific duty in reference to moral and religious instruction. But, unhappily today, both the home and the school largely evade this responsibility, and this condition throws a heavier burden upon the Sunday school, a burden which in some measure it must attempt to carry if the younger generation is not to be deprived of all religious oversight.

There are today three disciplines to which the teacher in the Sunday school must devote himself. First, he must know something of the nature of the child; second, he must have some competent knowledge of the subject he is to teach; and third, he must understand the art of bringing the child and the theme into vital relation. First, then, the child must be known. Perhaps no generation has devoted so much attention to child study as our own. Of course no one wishes to affirm that children were never studied nor understood until the latter part of the last century, or that no one ever thought of adapting education to the normal stages of a child's development. Plato himself founded his scheme of education upon the well known fact that there are stages through which the individual life passes, and that the powers and interests of the child vary at different times. But these facts, which a few more careful thinkers understood in some measure in the past, are now everywhere recognized as of great importance in the training of the child. What is known as the new psychology is really the effort to determine by actual experiment the methods by which the child acquires knowledge. He has been placed under the microscope, to be studied as one examines any other interesting specimen in the laboratory. In ascertaining the actual facts it has been found essential for the student as well as the teacher of the child to become himself like a little child, in order to enter the realm of appreciation and knowledge of that young life which he seeks to know. To live with children, to be led by them and taught by them, is the only competent method of reaching satisfactory results. The parent and teacher may now as never in the past come to understand through what stages the child must pass, and at what period one or another interest will be strongest. The love of adventure, of mystery, of beauty, the concern for humanity, sympathy with the poor, the values of religion, all find their natural time of manifestation in the growth of a child and may be anticipated with a degree of certainty. Surely no one will wish to despise the enormous importance of this knowledge. Least of all can the Sunday school teacher afford to do so. That knowledge which the teacher in the day school uses with such competence and success is as essential in the work of the Sunday school teacher. The results of the process are based upon careful study of facts. The new psychology is experimental and not metaphysical. It tries to reach the facts as to what the child actually is, rather than to depend upon theories as to what he might be supposed to be. It starts with physiological facts and works upward through mental processes to character, rather than downward from metaphysical assumption to imagined facts.

The New Place of the Bible.

In the second place, account must be taken of the subject which is to be taught. That subject is Christianity. More particularly it is the Bible as the record of those events which most clearly illustrate the Christian ideal, through the life and teachings of the Christ. The Bible is the greatest book in the world, because it is the record of the spiritual experiences of holy men of old, through whom the divine mind has been most convincingly interpreted to the world. It is the history of spiritual origins and growth. Here again there is great need for competence in the knowledge of the facts. Our generation has been interested as no other in questions which the modern mind is certain to raise regarding all themes presented for its consideration. How did we receive our Bible? In what form did it first appear? In what land and through what people did it come into being? How did the geography of Palestine and the manners and customs of its people influence the writers of these books? How does the Bible differ from other books? In what sense can it be called a revelation from God? Are all of its parts of equal value and may one trust with implicit confidence to its statements? The raising of these questions has tremendously stirred the waters of Christian life in recent years. Many people connected with the Sunday school work have been seriously disquieted by the coming of the new Biblical learning, which has insisted upon careful investigation of the facts of the Bible in the light of all the knowledge that other literatures and experiences place at our disposal. Does not the historical method of Bible study, they say, eliminate to too great a degree the spiritual element in the Word of God, and reduce all to the common level of human workmanship?

An Old Question.

Recent as this question seems, it is in reality as old as the church, and it is of great advantage to us in reaching conclusions on a theme like this to have so long a course of religious history behind us. If there is one truth that emerges from the study of the story of the church it is that it is always a mistake to infer that the intellect is the enemy of the soul. The experiences of the church's great saints, leaders and teachers is conclusive on this point. The greatest of them have been men of profound intellectual power as well as lofty Christian character. The apostle Paul, Origin, Clement, Basil, Athanasius, Augustine, Aquinas, Luther, Calvin, Wesley, the men who in different periods have most profundly effected religious thought, and have been the strongest champions of the Cross, were the best illustrations of the intellectual life. Those instances in which men have discarded the need of study under the stress of religious enthusiasm are among the saddest in Christian history. The Anabaptist fervor in Germany, which led Carlstadt to declare at Wittenberg that there was no need for academic study, and which led George Mohr, director of the grammar school, to tell the people to take their children from school, because there would be no need of learning henceforth in the presence of the divine prophets of Wickau, are among the sad commentaries upon a zeal which is without knowledge. Professor James observes that "spiritual excitement takes on pathological forms whenever other interests are too few and the intellect too narrow."

Fear of the Newer Learning.

We are still, in church and school, far too much afraid of the newer Bible learning. The critics of biblical research are still a great host. We respect their sentiments, for we appreciate them so thoroughly. But they are not inspired by truly spiritual motives. We have not reached the meaning of the Bible if we are blind to the fact that truth is the holy of holies, that the search for it is a divine vocation, and that to find it is to have a new vision of God. Does it never occur to these alarmed defenders of former biblical theories that the new discovery, whether in physical science of biblical literature, however surprising and disconcerting it may be to us, can never be so to God? When he is afraid of his own truth, of the facts of his own universe and of his own word, it will be time for us to be. One of our highest duties to the young in these matters is to teach them nothing they will have to unlearn. One of the deadliest shocks to the soul is to discover that it has been deceived, that its religious teaching has been a subterfuge, a hiding, a misrepresentation of the facts. The results that flow from this attitude have been told for us in that recent pathetic narrative which Mr. Edmond Gosse has given us in his book "Father and Son," where we have a parent in his desperate anxiety for the spiritual welfare of his child, pressing upon him a doctrine of the Bible and religion which, as his intellect expended and he saw the world for himself, brought on a bitter and absolute revolt.

The teacher's business, then, is to know his Bible and its accompanying themes as truly as he must know the nature of the child he teaches. The division of the Scripture into its general groups, books and sections of books, becomes absolutely essential to the knowledge of the subject. Biblical history, which needs constant comparison with contemporary history in order to secure the proper outline and proportion of events; the progress of religious ideas as witnessed in the different moral standards of successive portions of the Bible, the history of other nations of ancient and modern times, with which comparison can always helpfully be made, especially in the case of those children who are interested in general history; the study of different types of writing in the Bible, such as prophecy, legislation, wisdom, devotional material, apocalypse, epistle and narrative; the portrayal of biblical characters and the development of biblical doctrines, are all themes of study which the well-informed teacher will recognize as essential to proper preparation for Sunday school instruction.

The Aim in Character.

But these two disciplines of psychology and biblical literature are not enough, for the child and the Bible must be brought together. One might understand all the facts of mental science and have command of all the details of biblical literature and still be quite unable to teach successfully. The other discipline is pedagogy, the art of teaching.

The kind of teaching which is needed in the Sunday school, and which shall most effectively enable the church to educate its own young and hopeful life, is such as begins with fact, carefully and critically obtained, and gives to this fact a religious interpretation. And that is the marvel of most biblical materials and Christian records. Rightly approached and with the proper equipment of self-preparation, the teacher discovers that these facts are full of high inspiration. The universe is God's and all of it speaks of him. No doubt if one had to make choice between a Sunday school teacher, largely unfurnished with the materials of formal education, but deeply concerned with the work in hand, and dowered with a high enthusiasm for religious values, and on the other hand one possessed of all the competencies of formal education, but devoid of that passion for reality and character, which is the sign and seal of spiritual life, it would be far better to employ the former in the training of the young. It is here that all the confusion has arisen. Men without scholarship, but with pure and humble souls, have been enriched with the hidden treasure and made others wealthy in the sharing. And the multitude who have felt their power, and have found others, furnished with all that academic institutions could give them, lacking in this essential, have too easily concluded that the mental was a hindrance to the spiritual. The real point is, however, that the one can never be a substitute for the other. No learning can ever compensate for the pure heart that sees God. What we need is the combination of the trained mind and the devout spirit.

The Loftiest Art.

It is thus, then, that the church must teach its youth through the Sunday school. The art of the teacher is the loftiest of all arts. He who gives himself to this task is an artist dealing with more delicate and imperishable materials than sculptor or painter. More marvelous are his products than those of poet or singer. And he has the supreme joy of fellowship, not only with the noblest ideals of life, but with those youthful spirits whose vision has been broadened and whose natures have been enriched by these same ideals of truth and duty. Such a teacher will keep the Master in the midst, and the child will unconsciously absorb the feeling that the Christ is everywhere to be reckoned with, and that his life is the fairest, the noblest the divines the world has known. To create in the child the desire to see Jesus, and bring him at last to the point where, by submission of his will to the ideals of Jesus, he is willing to see none but Jesus only, is the imperial task of the individual teacher, and of the church that rises to its true duty of teaching through the Sunday school.

HIS PART.

"So you confess that the unfortunate young man was carried to the pump, and there drenched with water? Now, Mr. Fresh, what part did you take in this disagreeable affair?" Undergraduate (meekly): "The left leg, sir."

A New Office

Function of the Director of Education in the Modern Church

BY ARTHUR J. HALL.

The solution of this problem seems to hang upon our conception of the church and its mission in the world. Jesus came not to be ministered unto, but to minister and to give his life a ransom for many. The church continues the good work Jesus began. The church, therefore, is built upon the rock of social service. Its task is to bring in the kingdom of God. It is to be the principal agency in establishing the perfect social order upon the earth. The church, therefore, has vital concern in all the organized forms of social life. It is concerned both with social institutions and social individuals; with the family, the school, the city, the state, as well as with John Smith and Samuel Jones. The rescuing of isolated individuals, whether they be few or many, does not exhaust the mission of the church. The institutions of society must feel the healing touch of the gospel: the social consciousness must be redeemed.

Or if we describe the work of the church as the production of Christian character, even still we are under the broad canopy of the social ideal. Character cannot be defined wholly from the individual point of view. It means social efficiency. To be good is to be good for something. Good intentions have no value unless they find expression in life and conduct. But conduct has reference to other individuals. The church is then a social institution, and its task a social task. It hopes to make possible the perfect individual in a perfect social order—than which there is no bigger work in the world. There is nothing grander, nothing nobler, nothing higher, nothing harder.

How then shall this task be accomplished? Shall it be by incoherent and disconnected exhortations? Shall it be by a hurried and hasty evangelism? Shall it be by an archangel winging its flight under the heavens and proclaiming the everlasting gospel? Shall it be by a revivalism that seeks to rescue the individual and has little thought of the larger social whole? Shall it be by a blow here and there, and now and then? Impossible! A task so great and so difficult can never be accomplished by methods so haphazard and indefinite. There is need of thoroughness and thoughtfulness, of organization and method. In a word, the church must be an educational institution.

The Great Commission recognizes the educational function of the church. The apostles and their successors were to go into all the world and make disciples of all the nations, make learners of every people. So through all the Christian centuries, with varying degrees of fidelity and success, the church has exercised the teaching function. And Dr. Trumbull, in his Yale lectures on the Sunday-school, undertakes to defend the thesis that the church has enjoyed greatest properity in those periods in which she has most faithfully discharged her teaching obligation. But the fact is, judged from our modern point of view, the church's conception of education has always been inadequate. In practice the church has said, "Education means instruction, handing down a given body of doctrine." This narrow notion of education still lingers among us, so that, with few exceptions, the work of the modern church has little right to be called educational. It is too uncertain, too often without point and system, going in no specific direction and arriving nowhere in particular.

Not long ago, in an old book, I found this sentence: "The preacher draws the gospel bow and shoots the arrow of truth at a venture, and trusts in God for results." We have to admit that this is descriptive of much church work at the present time. But what a fearful arraignment! Think of shooting the ar- of truth at a venture! The church should know whether or not the arrow of truth has struck the mark, and if not, then why not? It may be good poetry to say—

"I shot an arrow into the air,
It fell to earth, I knew not where;
For so swiftly it flew, the sight
Could not follow it in its flight."

This may be good poetry; it is not good policy for church work. Here we have need of purpose, and plan, and system, and method.

The teaching of scripture, and the needs of the modern world alike, demand that the church be an educational institution. In no other way can its mission be accomplished. The activities and agencies of the church must be organized from the educational point of view. That is to say, the church must undertake the task of changing human life and transforming human society by the gradual processes of instruction and training. And this requires that the church have all the preciseness and thoroughness and comprehensiveness of a modern educational institution.

This educational ideal includes all the agencies of church work—the pulpit, prayer-meeting, Sunday-school, young people's societies, women's societies, leagues, clubs, etc. I shall take time to speak only of the Sunday-school and the young people's societies.

The modern Sunday-school is now upon the second century of its career. It has accomplished a splendid work. It came to the assistance of American education, just as religious instruction was being put out of the public schools. It has thus rendered a conspicuous service to our country. But the making of the Sunday-school a thoroughly educational agency is a task still remaining before us. The Sunday-school can have no right to be called an educational institution, until it shall have a well-articulated and comprehensive program of study. The church needs a generation of intelligent Christians, who not only know their Bibles, but the world as well, and the city and community in which they live; who understand this modern world, and who know life as it goes on at the present day,—a generation of Christians, who know the meaning of citizenship and patriotism, and the social, political and industrial problems of the day; who have large interest in missions and benevolences and philanthrophy. The Sunday-school can meet this need only by providing a suitable program of instruction. It must be adapted to the needs, interests and capacities of the children in the kindergarten, the boys and girls in the primary and junior departments, to the young people in the advanced department, and to the men and women in the adult division.

The public school has its courses of study following in regular and definite succession. The college has its curriculum, so also the university. To take one of the higher university degrees, one must pass through a regular and prescribed course of study. If the Sunday-school expects to accomplish a significant work, it too must have its curriculum. This is an immediate and imperative need of the Sunday-school. In the strict sense, it can never be an educational institution until it shall have a unified and co-ordinated and comprehensive program of instruction, all of which to be under the direction of competent teachers.

And the competent teachers will have to be made. The progressive Sunday-school will have a normal department for the training of its teachers and stitute what should be the minimum requirements of such a department: (1) A course in the psychology of religious education in two parts; the first to be a general survey of the stages of growth, taken by all the teachers; the second groups the teachers according to their grade and takes up in greater detail the problems they have to meet. (2) A course in the principles and methods of teaching. This also to be in two parts: the first a general survey of the subject, the second taking up problems in detail in connection with experimental work in teaching. This will show the teachers how to apply the principles and methods they have acquired. (3) A course in the history of the Sunday-school, with special emphasis on the rise of the uniform lesson system and its recent modifications, and leading to a consideration of the curriculum from the point of view of our present needs. (4) A course on the Bible, making the teachers familiar with the historical point of view and methods of Bible study, and acquainting them with the general contents of the scripture. The purpose of this course is to make the teachers efficient in the use of the Bible. In the ideal school all the teachers will be graduates from the normal department.

While in the Sunday-school active service is not to be divorced from instruction, in the young people's societies activity must have the right of way. The young people's movement has failed in the realization of its expectations on account of being organized on the prayer-meeting basis. The prayer-meeting, as conducted heretofore, does not seem to meet the needs and interests of the young people. What is needed here is a program of activity, of Christian work, with instruction occupying a secondary place. On such a basis as this, the success of our young people's societies will no longer be a matter of question. The experiment has already been tried and is now placed beyond doubt. But this situation calls for the ablest sort of leadership.

So far the place of the director of religious education in the modern church has been discussed indirectly. We have seen that the only way the church can accomplish its mission is by becoming, in fact as well as in name, an educational institution. We have seen what this requires of the Sunday-school and the young people's societies. Does not this give the answer to our question? Who is going to organize the Sunday-school and arrange its program of study? Who shall train its teachers? Who shall have charge of training the young people? Certainly not the pastor. If for no other reason, simply because he does not have the time. The ministrations of the pulpit, with the collateral work involved, and the round of pastoral duties consume the whole time of the average minister. For the church to expect of its pastor to assume charge of the Sunday-school and the young people's work in the large way that religious education demands, is to place upon his shoulders burdens he cannot bear.

Some one else must have charge of the educational work of the church. This individual we call, the director of religious education. He must be an expert. We do not think of putting novices in charge of our public schools, at the head of our colleges and universities. But the educational work of the church is none the less important, none the less delicate in its nature, or complex in its character. Quackery is not to be tolerated. The smallest good the humblest worker may accomplish is a matter of gratification. But the widest training and the most comprehensive learning are none too much for the director of religious education.

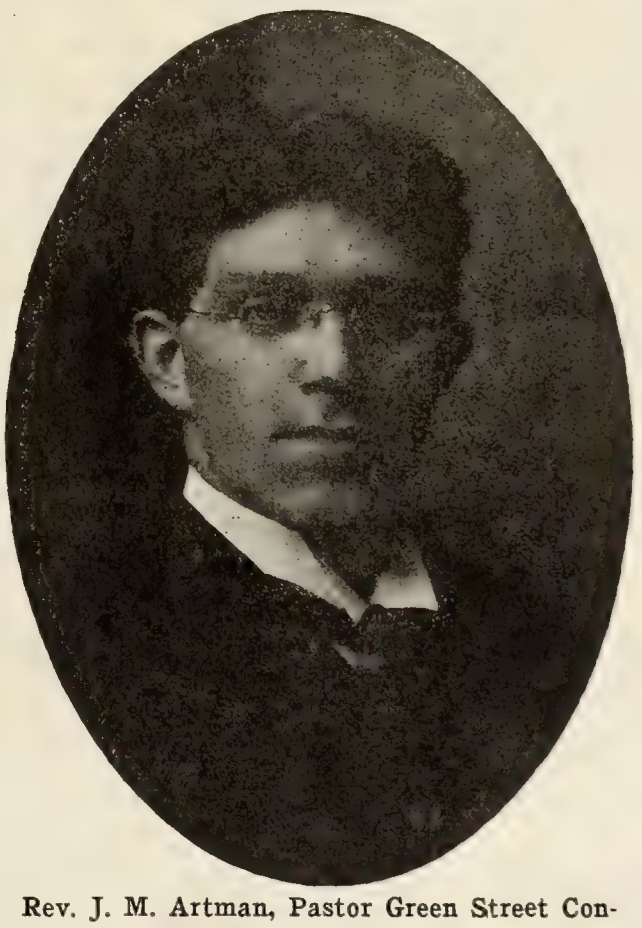
He is confronted by a gigantic task, an enormous responsibility. There is no danger of his powers decaying through idleness or lack of use. He must needs burn the midnight oil. He will often wish the days were forty-eight hours long. He will be able to appreciate the feeling of Joshua, when, in enthusiastic opposition against the Amorites, he cried—

"Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon;
And thou, Moon, in the valley of Aijalon."

The Place of Play in Religious Education

A Discussion with a Suggestion for the Leaders of the Church

BY J. M. ARTMAN.



We are a peculiar people. The heyday and rush of life makes us quickly old. Then like Ponce de Leon we search vainly for the fountain of youth. Foolish people! God gave youth to humanity as a permanent asset and there is no need of ever becoming old. The fountain of perpetual youth lies within our own human nature and is a part of every normal life.

The cry for "natural living" is not the mere flash of an unbalanced intellect. Ephraim was "a cake not turned" because of one-sided development. Our life has been too serious in the sense of too much time being given to the "practical things." All work and no play is not conducive to health and youthfulness. To live naturally, we should give healthy expression to every side of our nature. Work is not the whole of life. There are many attributes, all of which must find expression if we are to be completely human.

Our education has demanded a vigorous exercise of the intellect. The classic ideal of exclusive training of the mind has ignored the value of the developed body, which is now cared for by means of manual training and athletics. We are now realizing that a strong body is necessary for a good mind as well as good morals. We must learn to take recreation. It has been found necessary for man to have a certain amount of rest, say one day in seven. But rest is not enough to rejuvenate the body and keep the spirit in tune for its full life. All of us are familiar with the experience of working until you came to a point where it became absolutely necessary to engage in a frolic of some kind. I have seen persons weary and worn from work who were made anew by a game or other recreation. It seems that there is a kind of reflex energy built around an opposite pole from that which finds its outlet in work. This energy needs an expression all its own. When given vent after long restraint, persons will often become utterly foolish. They can not contain themselves. Nature demands these periods of relaxation, of play and recreation, in every individual, whether young or old.

Children and Parents.

A story is told of aged parents whose children came home each year to celebrate Christmas. These children had the common conception, that since father and mother were old, all gayety must be suppressed. Accordingly, they brought presents of the most practical and somber nature. Of course these good parents had great joy in the home-coming of their sons and daughters and appreciated their gifts. But when the day was over, there were still unsatisfied longings in their breasts. Each of these good old people secretly longed for a taste of the brightness and gayety of youth. At length these secret yearnings could contain themselves no longer and the mother, as the holiday season approached, slyly intimated to her husband, "Wouldn't it be splendid to have a jolly Christmas as we used to do?" A gleam of light shone in his countenance, for he, too, had long wished for the opportunity to throw away the cares of years and the burdens of life and just have a good time. But their children would consider such gayety as foolish and unbecoming to persons of their age. They would have a frolic, therefore, the night before the children should come. They would invite the old people of the community, who, like themselves, only wanted to have an opportunity for light hearted enjoyment. What springs of joy, long hidden, now burst forth, as these old people planned their party. They would have such a good time and the children should never know. But, contrary to expectation, the children came a day earlier this year and, as they approached, they found the quiet of the old home broken with music, laughter, and dancing. A son looked through a window upon the gayety and joy within, and then, shamefaced and conscience stricken, they all stole back to the city. For the first time in their lives, they realized that even in the hearts of their old father and mother, the springs of joy must needs bubble over. The story tells us how they came the next day and gave such a day of joy and pleasure to the parents that the good old people were bewildered at the change in their children.

A Chance to Play.

Young and old must have a chance to play. Seriousness alone is but one-half of life. The college boy, who puts the cow in the belfry and ducks the college policeman, is not necessarily displaying criminal tendencies. This is but the explosion of pent up feelings which must find vent in some fashion. When expressed in healthy athletics, the pranks pass away. Continuous work and more work will not relieve these pent up feelings. These feelings demand an expression all their own and the more one works, the more insistent is the demand for relaxation in gambol and play. Adults have nervous prostration almost to the point of breaking, all because these dammed up energies have no chance of expression. The pent up feelings, the friction and strain of life, which spills over now and then in spite of ourselves into irritation, ill-humor, and boisterous display must have a chance to explode. If this is not provided through healthy play, it will have to find vent in unhealthy ways, for it must out. Drink, and crime, and depredation arise because no other mode of expression has been given. Our education has been all unconscious of this permanent trait in human nature to "break loose" once in a while and give full and free expression to itself in play. Our moral and religious education has made no provision whatever for the healthy expression of this side of our nature. Yet every individual has this impulse and, if full development is our goal, we must provide for this freeing of the soul in our education.

Purpose of Play.

The race has developed play for this very purpose of freeing the strained and pent up feelings. Play serves two important functions. Spencer tells us that "Play is the discharge of surplus organic activity;" while while Groos says, "Play is an impulsive function which serves to call out future useful activities." Both these definitions are true, one supplementing the other. The latter tells us that well directed play paves the way for future useful acts. The playing the part of the adult in keeping store, building ships and engines, carrying on little governments, keeping house, etc., is the very best foundation possible for future duties. This function of play is fraught with large possibilities and has been made much of by different educators. Yet the mass of people do not seem to realize the value of play in this respect. The former definition has been less used, even, than the latter, and yet it is of prime importance in the stress and strain of our modern life. The saying that we have forgotten how to play is proven every day by the dozens who have arrived at the breaking point through lack of expression and wholesome recreation in play. There is nothing that we so need today as the knowledge of how to play. There is nothing that will do so much good as real play.

A Game of Ball.

A certain church and Sunday-school went from Chicago to a big woods for their picnic. The Sunday-school boys challenged the men for a game of baseball which was duly accepted. What good was there in such a game? Wasn't it uncomfortable for them and out of place for men of forty and forty-five to engage in a game of ball? Perhaps. That game of ball, however, gave opportunity to turn loose a lot of restrained feelings; feelings, which is not given healthy expression, would have come out in irritableness, nervousness, and unruly words. As it was the throwing, catching, running and rivalry turned loose a lot of steam which relieved all the busy strain of city life. Even those who filled the hillside grandstand couldn't keep from throwing their caps and shouting and hurrahing for their companions. In these weeks following, we hear on every hand, "I never had such a time in my life." And why? Because it gave an opportunity to explode, to discharge the pent up energies of many busy days.

At every point in the history of the race, we find play serving this function of balancing life, of cadencing the soul. Animals, even, can't spend all the time in search of food and in the chase, they must play. Man finds life unbearable without the relaxation of play. Young and old find the normal outlet for restrained feelings in play. The dances and revelries of history have had a larger influence in the development of civilization than has been supposed. Investigation shows that the tribal dance was the largest instrument of control in savage life. And in the growth of civilization and religion, we are largely indebted to the ceremonial dance for the conserving and presenting these to the race. If we had space much could be said for the influence of play in the development of civilization.

Religion and the Romp.

No doubt someone is asking what all this discussion has to do with religious education? We are interested in developing the religious life, say they, not in taking a romp. We have anticipated this objection. "The word of God is life," says Oscar Carleton McCulloch, who has interpreted the religion of action. "I understand God's business in this world is not salvation alone; that is a little part of it. It is not restoration alone; that is but a phase of it. It is not repair; that is a small portion of it. But it is utilizing all the forces that are as yet unlimited and unexhausted, that children shall be born to happy homes and joyful parents; shall be so surrounded by education and by the conditions of a happier and purer society that they shall not go astray, that they shall not fall into evil, that they shall have no taint of sin upon them. There shall be no need of their being born twice, since God's first birth is good enough for all and suffices for all, if nothing comes to prevent the perfect development of His plan." Thus this man states the ideal of religion as that of developing the full, harmonious, abundant life. "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly," said the Master. Religion, therefore, is interested in making life normal and complete, and seeks to utilize every natural agency to attain this end. Since play is a normal attribute of all life and is necessary as the balance-wheel of the soul, religion will use play as one of its instruments. Just what plays to use and how to use them are the problems of each community. But the value of play to religion cannot be emphasized too much. Religion has never given play its proper place. Indeed play has been tabooed by religion. Religion has not taught expression but repression. A boy must not shout, he must not leap or run. He must just be good. What such a doctrine hopes to attain, when all life is in terms of expression and action, is a mystery. What it has actually brought to pass is easily seen. The spirit of repression in religion has diven all the good, healthy games away from the church and out from the influence of religion. The saloon and the professional amusement halls have gladly taken them up. The boys and men and many girls, having to get rid of pent up energies by the very necessities of their natures, have followed the games which give the chance for such expression and so have left the pale of religious influence.

Recreation Commercialized.

What an indictment upon our religious education! Human life is given into its charge for complete development. Play is a necessity for such development, and yet all the healthy games, pool, billiards, bowling, box-ball, dancing have been driven by our attitude of repression into the hands of money-makers. God never meant for our recreation to be so commercialized. When games become commercialized they are no longer a means of life but of death. No good can come from a good game in bad environment. The church of the future must see to it that the healthy games and means of recreation, which are absolutely essential to man, are under religious guidance and influence. The Y. M. C. A. is doing a work in this respect that the church should have done long ago. If you are interested in this very important subject, you should study the efforts of the New York schools and our Chicago Playgrounds. Religion must dominate the whole of life. Play is a neglected, but golden opportunity for cadencing and balancing the soul.

Training Teachers

The Scope of the Task—A Proposed Program

BY HARRY FOSTER BURNS.

Educational ideals are becoming potent in the church. They are formative for every department of her work. Pulpit committees are searching for teaching pastors. These pastors measure their work, by educational standards, and direct the church toward educational ideals. The fundamental aims of education and religion are one—the development of character. The methods differ; but the aims are one. The work of the one is the completement of the work of the other. They work together to produce the best character.

When such ideals obtain, it is but natural that the Sunday School should receive the most thoughtful attention of the church. Educators, editors, pastors, vie with one another in emphasizing its importance. This attention from the most thoughtful is working mighty changes in all that affects the work of the Sunday-school. A new style of architecture has been introduced; church services are rearranged; new series of lessons are prepared, all to meet the growing demands of the Sunday School. The vague visions of yesterday are becoming definite. Separate class rooms, a system of graded lessons, equipment for the use of the teacher of children—these are already the possession of the best schools, and will soon be found in all.

The usefulness of these material acquisitions waits upon the coming of the trained teacher. Mechanical and electrical inventions are of value to society only when in the hands of men skilled in their use. A modern electric lighting plant would be of little use to a tribe of Indians. Without the trained teacher in the Sunday School all other equipment is half waste. Here then is the imperative need of the hour. We need not brick and mortar, but flesh and blood; not lesson helps, but lesson teachers; not crude material appliances, but living, loving personalities trained to the great task of educating the immature being in religion and morals.

Teaching is a fine art. It requires no less skill to direct aright the developing personality than to paint a human face, or sing an oratorio. In teaching unskilled work is poor work. Poor work is bad work. Bad work is wicked.

Natural Qualifications.

It is well recognized that there are certain natural qualifications for teaching. There is a sense in which teachers are born and not made. Not everyone can be a success in teaching either in the public school or the Sunday School. There must be some natural qualifications.

The teacher should have good health. Good health means energy—energy to be used in the taxing hour in the class room. Good health means power. Power commands respect. Besides this good health makes for vivacity and cheerfulness, without which a personality can have but little attraction for the young.

There is need of sympathy with those whom one would teach. The teacher must be able to rejoice with those who rejoice.

Above all there must be genuine moral worth. In teaching, character counts. We teach by example more powerfully than by precept. Only the best men should be permitted to stand before the young as their teachers. A further point is worthy of note. The teachers of boy's classes should be men, manly men. The boys will despise all others. The teachers of girl's classes should be women, womanly women. Only womanly teachers can inspire true womanliness.

Acquired Qualifications.

Having set down the above qualifications as requirements that we shall make of our teachers, what more shall we ask? Evidently, training for teaching, acquired qualifications. None are born with all the qualifications for teaching, though superintendents have sometimes acted upon this principle. Four things are imperative in this training. First, there must be a knowledge of the persons to be taught. The teacher must understand the life that she would direct. She must know the laws of its growth. The fact that a man knows how to care for calves does not argue for his success as a keeper of bees. To succeed with either one must know their nature and co-operate therewith. Just so will the true teacher seek to co-operate with the laws of spiritual and moral growth of the one whom she teaches. Second, the teacher must know the laws of teaching. She must know something of pedagogy. Pedagogy is but the systematized knowledge of teaching gained by teachers in the past and present. The teacher will need avail herself of this rich experience. In the third place there must be a knowldge of the subject matter of instruction, the material to be used as the means of religious education. I might have said a knowledge of the Bible; but that is not sufficient. Other material—biography, history, literature, and art—may be used with great profit in religious education. Of these, the more the teacher knows the better. But the Bible must occupy chief place among the materials to be used. It is the great store-house of religious expression and moral truth. Of it the teacher of religion will make most constant use. To use it she must know it. That knowledge must not be mere ability to name the books of the Bible in their order, or to tell the years of the reigns of the kings of Isreal and Judah, or to name the book and chapter in which certain verses may be found. Such ability may be of some use to the teacher; but what is more needed is an appreciation of the growing revelation of God to be found in the Bible. She must feel as far as possible the throbbing message which God is declaring to men thru each book, and each character of the Bible. This means a comprehensive careful study of the Book of Books. To the above should be added an intelligent conception of the aims of the Sunday School and its natural function in modern life. Such a conception implies a general knowledge of the laws of social development. This brings to the teacher a vision of the place her work has in the whole progress of society. "Where no vision is teachers perish."

It can scarcely be said that we have set the standard too high. Many schools are already attempting to secure just such teachers. Nor need this high standard discourage those who are now faithfully attempting the work of teaching in the Sunday School. It is meant to inspire them and to point the way by which they may gradually come to possess the highest qualifications for their higher calling.

Where Shall We Get Such Teachers?

Unfortunately even those teachers who have had the advantage of training in the colleges of the church have usually had but little training for the special work of teaching religion. We may expect that this will soon be different. The colleges will consider it one of their first privileges to train those who are to return to their communities as teachers in the Sunday Schools. Until that day comes we must look elsewhere for this training. Many churches are looking to the Director of Religious Education in the local church to supply the need. This is a recognized part of the work of such a man. Arthur J. Hall, who contributes an article for this number of the Christian Century, is performing such service with the Memorial Church, Chicago. But there are not many men with such training, and there are not many churches ready to employ such men. Until this office becomes more general we must look mainly to the pastor for the training of teachers. He is already over-worked, I know. But so important is this work that a pastor may well take time from perfunctory calling, and from routine work, to devote to this greatest work of the church. Some churches are sufficiently aware of the importance of the educational work to be willing to employ clerical help for the pastor that he may have more time for the teaching ministry. Some pastors will find ways of getting members of their church to do much work that has usually fallen to the pastor, and thus gain the needed time for this holy ministry. Some way the pastor must find time for training teachers, and thus multiplying his power.

A Suggested Program.

It but remains for me to suggest a program for training teachers which might be used by pastors seeking to secure trained teachers for their Sunday Schools. The program will be based upon the outline of required qualifications named above. The course should provide for a knowledge of the Bible, of the pyschology of religious development, and of pedagogy, together with a general view of the aims of the Sunday School. To provide this, courses should be planned for at least three years' work, with classes meeting not less than two hours a week. The course contemplates one half the time being given to Bible study and the other to psychology and pedagogy.

First Year. The Bibly study for the year might be devoted to the Old Testament, using such a text as "Heroes and Crises in Early Hebrew History," by Prof. Kent, (the MacMillan Co.). If well done this will provide abundant material, and will make the Bible a new book to those who have not had such work. It may be done by those who have had some high school work. For the pedagogical work such a book as "The Spiritual Life," by Coe, and "Principles and Ideals for the Sunday School," Burton and Matthews, (U. of C. Press), will be found helpful.

Second Year. The second volume of the series by Prof. Kent, "The Prophets of Isreal," will be found among the best for the Bible work of this year. The pedagogical work might include some such books as "Education in Religion and Morals," Coe, for the first half year, and in the second half, "The Psychology of Child Development," by King.

Third Year. By the time those in training have come to this years' work they should be prepared to do some teaching, and such work will give them opportunity to test the principles they are being taught. The Bible work of this year might include for the first half,"The Life of Christ," by Burton and Matnews, (U. of C. Press); and for the second half, the life and letters of the Apostle Paul, using some outline like that furnished by the American Institute of Sacred Literature.

The pedagogical work of the year should include a study of such books as, McMurray, "The General Method of Teaching," and his other volume, "The Method of the Recitation," (The Macmillan Co.,), and "The Psychology of Religion," by E. S. Ames. There are many other books available for this work, but these will be suggestive of a program, such as a well trained pastor might work out with any of our better churches.

Should this seem too ambitious a task for the busy pastor; it will be remembered that a little time given systematically to the work will accomplish much, and that no material will contribute more helpfully, to the pulpit work of the preacher than that suggested here.

Such plans as these, of course, can be carried thru only by the pastorate that continues over a long period of time. Though indirect, this may not be one of the least advantages of such a program carried out in the churches where short pastorates are all too frequent.

Promoting Religious Education

A Description of the Work of the Religious Educational Association

BY HENRY F. COPE,

Whether we realize it or not we are now in the midst of a remarkable revival, an awakening of all our educational and religious forces to the keenest interest in the question of character and its development. An entirely new interest exists and we find everywhere the atmosphere of earnest inquiry for the best methods in moral and religious training. This is the revival for which the Religious Education Association is responsible.

The one absorbing, all-dominating question in education is, not, how can we raise the standards or widen the curricula, but, how can we make all our agencies, institutions worthy manhood and womanhood? The educators are catching almost universally the religious spirit and conceiving their work as spiritual. From the public school teacher to the university president this is the great question, how can we foster, develop and conserve the religious values in educational life, keep our young people godly and deepen their piety and their religious social usefulness.

Recent visits to a number of Southern and Western colleges and universities gives convincing evidence that the world of higher education is now thoroughly aroused to the aim which the Religious Education Association set before it at its beginning and that the purpose stated in its inception, "To inspire the educational forces with the religious ideal" is being remarkably realized. Still more recently the writer has been addressing large bodies of public school educators in summer schools. To no other interest or theme do they respond with like interest to that shown in the teacher's duties to the moral and spiritual development of the pupils. No one can trace with precision the results of the work of this association in stimulating the educators to the recognition of spiritual responsibilities.

The measure of the extent to which education accepts the religious aim is, in part, indicated by the realization of difficulties and problems. The very fact that the important question of direct religious teaching and of the reading of the Bible in public agencies of education is now in the courts, shows that there is life in the matter, that the public wakens to recognize the importance of such questions. We have to be grateful also that the very denial of formal religious work to the schools opens up the possibilities of yet more effective religious values in the school room. The Religious Education Association, through its conferences and published material, is aiding thousands of teachers to spiritual efficiency in their work.

A revival of equal importance is still under way in the churches. They have passed from restiveness under criticism to recognition of its justice and to serious endeavor at reconstruction. Of course much of the work in Sunday schools and especially in spectacular teacher training movements is really detrimental. But through all runs a serious purpose on the part of the church to use to their best possibilities her educational opportunities. At the same time comes the wider realization of education as simply the divine laws under which life developes and character comes to its fulness. One has only to cite the widespread and general adoption of the graded lessons by Sunday schools as evidence that the church is ready to follow sane leadership. We cannot quite forget that the Religious Education Association was roundly denounced a few years ago for insisting on graded material for Sunday schools. But its prophetic and constructive work has gone on steadily. Its principles and ideals work like the leaven; they are discussed, adopted here and there, improved, opposed and advocated until they prevail. The leaven does its work though the baker or the grocer may claim all the glory for the loaf.

The Religious Education Association exists to serve, not to supplant, to aid every existing agency, not to create new ones. It inspires, aids, co-operates with the forces that are; not attempting to organize any new machinery. For instance, if one of its departments prepares a course of lessons, that course will be published, not by the Association but by the existing agency which best meets the needs of the institutions represented by the department. The department of Christian Associations published its outlines through the International Y. M. C. A. press. As a result of this policy, pursued along every line, much of the best work done by the association lies to the credit of other organizations. This is desirable. The association desires not so much to do things as to cause things to be done.

Best of all, the Religious Education Association offers every man and woman anxious that our present-day life shall make for character, and we shall not lose our hold on God as a people, that our boys and girls may be strengthened for God-fearing and man-loving, living by their studies and school life, that the church may be sufficient for the great task of this day, an opportunity to express themselves, at the greatest advantage in endeavor to realize their ideals. Membership in the Religious Education Association is a big opportunity to have a share in the largest task before our day.

All persons interested in moral and religious education should visit the exhibit and library of the association in the new headquarters, on the fourteenth floor of the McCormick Building, Van Buren and Michigan avenue, Chicago. There is an especially interesting collection of books open free for the use of all persons and much material on every department of the work. In connection with the exhibit a Bureau of Information is maintained.

Sometimes inquiries coming into this bureau suggest special matters for investigation by the departments. There are sixteen such departments, guided by the leaders in the special interests they represent, for instance, President Frank Sanders heads the one on Sunday schools and Teacher-training; President William H. P. Faunce the one on universities and colleges. The departments conduct investigations through the year and annually hold meetings on their special subjects in connection with the annual conventions. Some of them have produced and published through appropriate channels textbooks, courses of study and much other valuable material. Out of the labors of some departments, plans worked out by members and thrashed out in conferences, entirely new methods have come into use in various agencies.

Recently there has been greatly increased interest in the aims of this association on the part of public school workers. In addition to an important meeting held at Boston in connection with the N. E. A. convention, a large number of institutes and public meetings have been held, particularly in the South, where thousands of teachers from country and grade schools have in many ways manifested deep interest in religious education.

The next general convention of this association is to be held in Providence, R. I., Feb. 14-16, 1911, where in about thirty different meetings, noted men and women will discuss the highly important theme of "The Home in Relation to Religious Education." No one doubts but that this is the fundamental question in the present problems of personal and social character. If the home fails in character development all else is impotent and bound to fail. It is worth everything for the sake of the part we have to play in the world, for the sake of our church and their work, for the sake of our children and their future, to make sure that our homes are saved to us, that they do not degenerate into mere sleeping places or soulless hotels but that they be brought up to their complete efficiency in character development. To this end the Religious Education Association desires to bring together at the coming convention all persons who are in any way interested in the problems of the modern home, to confer with all such persons that some agreement may be reached upon the things most needing to be accomplished just now.

All who are interested in any aspect of religious education, as parents, Sunday school or public school teachers, pastors, college teachers and officers, social workers and others are invited to co-operate in the work of this association through membership, costing $3.00 per annum and entitling one to all its publications. Full particulars at the office of the Religious Education Association, 193 Michigan avenue, Chicago.

Seminaries at State Universities

Shall We Endow Denominationa Colleges, or Bible Chairs at State Universities?

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES.

There are two interesting educational tendencies among the Disciples today. One is the continuation of the effort to equip brotherhood colleges for general courses of study and for ministerial training. The other is the new movement to establish Bible chairs and Bible colleges at the state universities, for the purpose of training ministers and doing missionary work among the university students. Already it is apparent that the brotherhood college confronts almost insurmountable difficulties, while the seminary at the state university has a great opportunity for rapid development and for usefulness. The Disciples have seminaries at the universities of Missouri, California and Oregon, and Bible chairs at the universities of Michigan, Virginia, Texas and Kansas, with plans for others in Illinois and Indiana.

There are many reasons for believing that in every state where the existence of the college is precarious, it would be a statesmanlike policy to center all resources of endowment, necessary teachers, students and educational interest in the promotion of the seminary or the Bible chair.

The statistics show that the state educational institutions are supplanting private schools. In the elementary grade 92 per cent of all pupils are in state schools; in the normal schools, 83 per cent; in the high school, 80 per cent. But in the colleges 33 per cent are in state schools, and in professional schools, 17 per cent. Everyone knows that the states are pushing forward the higher educational work with great vigor. The most striking illustration of this is the way in which private academies and preparatory schools have been abandoned because of the increased efficiency of the public high schools.

There is a similar tendency in college and professional departments. One-third of all the college students in the country are in the fifty-two state schools, while the other two-thirds are in 620 private institutions, of which 417 are denominational. In other words, the state schools average twelve times more students than the others. Why should it require 310 private schools to do the work of fifty-two state schools? The very figures show that the American people are flocking to their government schools. They are voting larger taxes and better equipment year after year.

It is also a matter of common knowledge that the state schools are better equipped with buildings and grounds, libraries, laboratories, and professors. Their advantages over the "small college" in an educational way are so great that the contrast is pathetic. The pathos is increased by the fact that the student must pay tuition for attendance at the inferior institutions while he may have all the superior advantages of the others without cost.

So far as the Disciples are concerned, they have not been slow, in their private judgment, to choose the state schools. It is said that in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and elsewhere there are as many Disciple students in the state university as there are in the brotherhood college. Perhaps they ask themselves why they should not patronize these great intellectual centers for which they pay their taxes and in which, as Christian citizens of the commonwealth, they have a serious and obligatory interest.

People who have been accustomed to send their children to the schools of the state through all the lower grades and through the high school are likely to feel it to be the natural and proper thing to send them through the state college course also. If church instruction is particularly desirable for college students, why not also for high school and grammar school pupils? The Catholics try to adhere to the principle of church schools all the way through. Possibly Protestants should give them up all the way through in order to be consistent.

It needs also to be considered that the

Indirect Causes of Unity

How Events and Forces Conspire to Bring Christians Together

BY REV. W. L. WATKINSON, D. D., LONDON, ENGLAND

Address Delivered at the Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union, held in London, July 4 and 5.

It has been shrewdly remarked that Unity is like Silence; if you speak, it is broken. We all desire Unity, but if we attempt to define or to secure it, it is at once broken by a variety of opinions,—it may be, convictions.

The formal, mechanical unity of the Universal Church, is nowhere in sight of what we call practical politics. The very condition of life and progress in all directions, in religion as much as in any other, is freedom of thought, and variety of thought, and any attempt to imprison the Universal Church within hard and fast doctrinal or ecclesiastical lines, is doomed to failure. In the past it was thought that there was something amounting to sacredness about form; the organization of the various plants and creatures was supposed to be fixed and inveterate. But modern science holds that all creatures are plastic, capable of modification and that they are being continually modified with a view to their survival, efficiency and happiness.

So we believe that Christ has impressed no one fixed and inveterate form on His Church, but that, for the sake of its continuance and prevalence, He has left it elastic and free to suit many widely different peoples and environments. The organization of the church is ever being subordinated to its mission. In our Lord's prayer for the oneness of His disciples, the variety that was destined to exist among them seems equally suggested.—"Neither for these only do I pray, but for them also that believe on Me through their word; that they may all be one even as Thou Father, art in Me and I in Thee, that they also may be in Us," at once declaring the unity of the Father and the Son, and yet implying distinction,—"Even as."

So the unity of Christ's Church implies distinction. We may see the sovereign will and purpose of Christ in the differentiations of His Church, so that the various doctrines of our holy faith may be brought home to men of all nations, climates and types. We distinctly see "the variegated wisdom of God" in the variations of His Church, and nothing can be more quixotic than to seek to bring the whole Christian world to accept the doctrines, system and government of any one Church whatsoever.

The ideal unity is that of Pentecost.—"And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and soul." We may differ in the interpretation of doctrine, in modes of worship, in forms of government, and yet be one in faith, love and service. The enlightened Christian has preferences but no exclusions. "If thine heart be as mine, give me thy hand." In speaking of the way in which Christian Unity will be brought about, we are of opinion that it will result much rather from indirect influences than from direct diplomacy and action. This indirect action is the method of the Sovereign Spirit, and thus, we are persuaded, will the desired result be chiefly brought about.

The prominence given of late years to the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God, has tended in the direction of reconciling us to each other; of course this doctrine has always been held by us, but never so distinctly conspicuously and joyfully as now. This, to some, may seem as if starting a long way off, but the influences that finally prevail, do start a long way off. We cannot repeatedly and vividly bow our knees "unto the Father, from whom every family in heaven and on earth is named," without it telling on the sense of our unanimity.

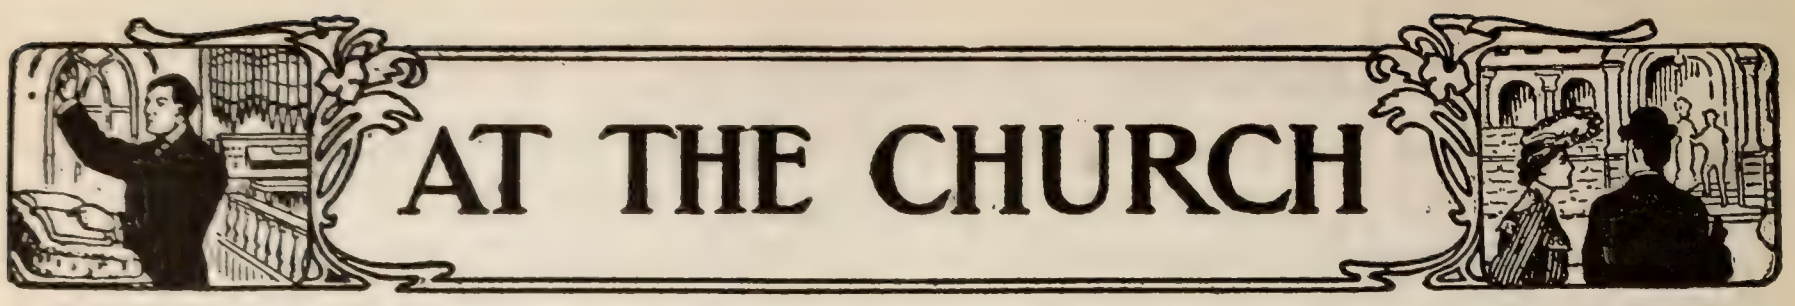
The extraordinary degree to which the person and teaching of our Lord have been brought forth in the modern Church, has directly tended to develope the sentiment of unity. For generations the mind of the Church was concentrated on doctrinal questions; the validity of the creeds was the absorbing moot point; and the influence of these theological studies was to accentuate the differences which exist among us. This generation has largely gone back to Christ and to the simplicity that is in Him. In our life-time the personality of Christ has wonderfully grown on the consciousness of Christendom, and anything like a bitter divisive spirit is impossible in the presence of the Master and in His more intimate fellowship.

We see this brought out in the instance recorded in the Gospel: "And they came to Capernaum; and when He was in the house, He asked them, 'What were ye reasoning in the way?' but they held their peace; for they had disputed one with another in the way who was the greatest." They were ashamed to revive their debate in the presence of the Lord. The whole spirit of the controversy was so contrary to the spirit of Christ; in His presence it appeared so mean and impossible. And today, the more clearly we know our Lord, the more familiar we are with His teachings, the more deeply we drink into His spirit, the nearer shall we be brought together.

We may flatter ourselves that our divisions are purely logical and conscientious, which, no doubt, to a certain extent, they are, but there is a great deal of the carnal mind at the bottom of bitter denominationalism, and there is no way to silence and destroy it like bringing it into contact with the meek and majestic personality of Jesus. Pride, bigotry and self-will cannot breathe in his presence.

The strikingly increased interest in Bible study of late years is entirely in the direction we seek. That there is such an increased interest in the Bible I make no doubt. Alike in this country and still more in America, the Bible is studied with a closeness and steadiness as never before. Our great scholars are now more intensely interested in the Scriptures than in patriotic and mediaeval literature, and the popular intelligent study of the Holy Word is as undeniable as it is remarkable. As I say, all this is in the right direction; from whatever other source it may spring, whatsoever is painful in denominationalism does not come from the Scriptures, and there is no cure for ignorance, prejudice and intolerance, like the vast outlook, the master truths, the broad spirit of the sacred oracle.

Inter-denominational fellowship accelerates union. It is a great thing not only to know our Master better, but to know each other better. Whatever brings us together, makes us personally acquainted, is so much to the good. The zeal that God will not own sensibly abates in fraternal assemblies. It must be recognized that through many years the Evangelical Alliance has rendered immense service in bringing together leaders and members of the various churches. Indeed the existence of the fraternal spirit which so happily marks the modern church, is very largely to be traced to the action and literature of the Evangelical Alliance. The more the denominations unite in worship, in council, in common evangelical action, the less and over less will there be of the exclusive and unkindly spirit which so much dishonors us.



The missionary movement is contributing in an eminent degree to the growth of the spirit of Christian Unity. We spoke of the indirect method by which God brings about His great designs but who would have supposed half a century ago that Christian Missions would prove a main factor in the solution of the problem of Christian Unity! In several ways our Missions react beneficially on the hme-land and the hme churches, but in no way more surprisingly or benignly than in promoting the spirit of concord. There is a spaciousness about the countries to which the missionaries go a vastness in the work they undertake, a grandeur of speculation in their outlook and hope, which forbids littleness of mind and heart and the exigencies of the work call forth in many ways mutuality of feeling and co-operation. All this reacts upon us at home.

We have seen this dramatized in the great assembly which has just broken up at Edinburgh. When men set their hand to the mighty task contemplated by that assembly they cannot long endure that fine points in doctrine and polity should divide and cripple them. The Missionary enterprise is going to be bigger than ever, which is to say that Christian Union is to be deeper, stronger and more practical than ever.

At the present moment all parties are satisfied that a dullness and deadness have settled on the religious communities of this country. There is a strange lack of enthusiasm of which we are all conscious. But need we be surprised? For some years past the various denominations have been engaged in fierce struggles with each other, and bitter attacks and recriminations have been common. It is little matter what have been the causes, or reputed causes of these antagonisms; the world has witnessed them, and their influence upon the world has been exactly what we might have expected.—"And the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelled then in the land." The deriders of religion make capital out of our quarrels. Not only so, sincere men with a bias toward faith and godliness are grieved by the spectacle of our conflicts, and choose to stand clear of them and us; and far beyond this, envy and strife bring a blight upon the churches themselves. I fully believe that the religious stagnation deplored by us all, is very largely the consequence of the ecclesiastical and political battles in which for years past, the denominations have been absorbed.

We may rejoice that something like a cosmic tide is now settling in toward peace. Surely we are never more truly Christian than when we are peacemakers! We must find some better way of settling our conscientious differences than set battles in the world's arena. We must oftener try and make the Sacramental Table a round table. Anyhow, we are all feeling for this, praying for this, striving and hoping for it. May the humble and sweet spirit of the Master fill all His disciples!

"Now the Lord of peace Himself give you peace at all times, in all ways. The Lord be with you all."

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

Palm Sunday*

One of the events in the life of Jesus which can be dated with certainty is his return to the Holy City one week before the resurrection. In the calendar of the church this day has always been observed with a ceremonies appropriate to the events recorded. For if the Easter Sunday with its wonderful story of the risen Christ is worthy of observance as a day of special significance, certainly the Sunday that ushered in the week of tragedy and triumph is not without a value that entitles it to a place in the regard of the Christian world. Because of the joyous character of the procession which accompanied Jesus into the city, strewed palm branches in his path and waved them in a passion of joy, the day has been known as Palm Sunday, and in an increasing number of the churches, even those that care little for the ceremonial side of religion, some appropriate notice has gradu ally come to be taken of the day.

The visit of Jesus to Zacchaeus the publican, and the healing of the blind men are the events connected in the third gospel with Jesus' journey through Jericho. Then as he continued his way up along the road to Jerusalem he spoke the parable of the minae, or pounds, and came presently to Bethany, the home of the three friends who had so often entertained him under their roof. There a feast was made for him in the house of a man formerly a leper, who perhaps had been cured of his malady by Jesus. Sometime during the evening Mary came and anointed the feet of Jesus with the precious ointment, and received the commendation of the Lord for her act.

Popular Feeling.

Then comes the story of that great Sunday in the life of Jesus. His work was all but finished. No longer did he fear to submit the disciples to the hard tests which the future would bring them. He understood the limitations of their knowledge, but he knew that he could trust them to the death in their loyalty to him and to the message which he was committing to their keeping. At an earlier time in his ministry he had purposely withdrawn from the vicinity of Jerusalem to the further regions of Galilee to avoid premature conflict with the authorities of the Holy City. At that time he had still to choose and to train the Twelve. Now that work was completed, and he was prepared to meet the hostility of official Jerusalem, and to put the seal of his own death upon the fact that he had come to his own and they that were his own would receive him not.

He knew how eager the disciples were for the outward demonstrations of that kingship which they were sure he was about to assume. He knew that the people were feverish in their desire to have a leader who could bring them the assurance of triumph over their foes. He knew that the rulers in Jerusalem were nervously apprehensive of any popular uprising such as he could so easily provoke. Perhaps for these very reasons he deliberately lent himself to a public demonstration that must have gone further than anything else he would do to disclose the character of his program as wholly religious and in no sense political.

The Prince of Peace.

The disciples had to be taught the lesson that his kingdom was not of this world, hard as that lesson was to learn. The people had to be shown that they could not trust to an uprising against the government headed by any one of those reckless leaders who were so frequently offering themselves as the means of realizing the Messianic hope. And perhaps Jesus was willing to teach the rulers how easy it would have been for him to overthrow their position in the city and to seize upon the government had he been minded so to do. It was the one moment in his career when he seemed willing to gratify the wishes of his followers for a public manifestation of power. It was almost like the triumph of a Roman general, the glory of a king returning from his wars.

In the second section of the Book of Zechariah, that apocalyptic portion including chapters 9-11, the writer, living somewhere in the late period of Old Testament life, describes the coming of the Prince of Peace to his royal city, Jerusalem. He is meek and lowly, riding upon an ass, as the animal of peace, rather than the war horse. When Jesus sent two of his disciples to bring him such a beast of burden, and then sat upon him to ride in triumph into the city, those of the disciples who remembered the utterance of the earlier Scriptures felt that the words had come to their true meaning, as Jesus made his way in triumph into the city. It is a singular commentary upon the efforts of the First Gospel to make the events of Jesus' career conform to Old Testament oracles, that it departs from the tradition contained in the other three gospels, of a single animal, an ass colt, and speaks of "an ass and a colt," as if the parallelism of Zechariah, "riding upon an ass, even a colt, the foal of an ass," was the warrant for supposing that two animals were employed. These and similar characteristics of the First Gospel in its efforts to explain and adjust the facts of Christ's career to fit the words of the Old Testament, or the local situation, have been pointed out frequently in these studies. Of course there was but one animal, as there was need for but one.

The Triumphal Procession.

The procession that accompanied Jesus was made up of those who were the Passover pilgrims, with whom he had made the journey from Perea, the crowd that still thronged up the ascent from Jericho to Jerusalem and the still greater numbers from the Holy City who came out upon hearing that the Man of Nazareth was approaching with his friends. For the moment his name was upon every lip. Few doubted that the hopes of the nation for a king were about to be realized. Even the conservative element of the city was stirred to deep concern by the swiftly-borne tidings. Those who had seen him in Galilee needed no encouragement to believe that the day of power had come for the Jewish people.

What then must have been the astonishment of the multitude, the relief of the authorities, and the overwhelming disappointment of the disciples, when Jesus, riding up the steep steps of the Golden Gate into the very enclosure of the Temple, and in complete possession of a loyal and enthusiastic following that would have made him instantly the master of the city, and would have armed the nation in defense of his cause—what could have been more astonishing to all than Jesus' apparent indifference to the meaning of his great opportunity? For instead of seizing the golden moment, he merely dismounted from the beast he was riding, looked about as a common spectator on the preparations for the feast, the decorations of the temple and the city, and went quietly out to Bethany! In that one act of self-obliteration he did more to shatter the crass hopes of the disciples than in all the teachings he had been able to give them. Perhaps Judas went out from that scene of disappointment furious at the unhappy turn of events, and determined if need be to force Jesus to take the power he seemed so little concerned to accept.

The Temple Cleansed.

The cleansing of the temple seems rightly placed in this week at the close of the ministry, where all the Synoptic Gospels put it, rather than at the beginning, where John has located it. That there were two such occasions seems unlikely. In Matthew and Luke it is linked directly with the entry into the city. But in Mark it is placed on the following day, and this seems more likely. Now that the die was cast, and he had nothing to lose from the hostility of the rulers, he indignantly raided the places where were stationed the dealers in sacrificial beasts and birds, and the changers of money who fattened off the rich temple franchises, and robbed the worshipers, and he drove them out with a whip of cords. Such an act does not seem improbable when one thinks of the immense following that gave Jesus moral support in his zeal against a public scandal.

He was the hero of the hour. The people were delighted to see someone take a strong hand with the oppressive classes who held the reins of power in the sanctuary. The poor and the afflicted always hailed him as their champion. And the children, with the enthusiasm which the events of those days inspired, lifted their voices, even against the indignant protest of the scribes, in honor of their great and good friend. And Jesus felt that such happiness was justified for the brief moment before his passion. The hour of that passing demonstration would be short enough. Meantime let the praise of the humble be heard, as in the distant future of the triumph of righteousness in the world it would ever be heard. Then, when the day's work was done, he went out to Bethany for rest.

White Hands

BY SUSAN HUBBARD MARTIN.

"I won't. I will not stay!"

Marion brought the words out bitterly, decisively and with finality. She had been for a short walk and was just returning to the little cabin where for six months she had lived. Lived in a manner totally unlike anything she had ever before experienced. She had baked, she had washed, she had ironed, because she would not ask a favor of these people among whom her lot was cast and who wanted to be her friends. She looked up but the lines of unhappiness on her face did not lessen.

About her were the plains just beginning to take on a faint tinge of green. There just above her were the mountains, majestic, silent, immutable. From their seamed and jagged slopes, Marion could almost count the little fir trees. Among them were cabins, huts most of them, where these people lived.

People—Marion's face took on lines of instant rebellion. They might be creatures with souls perhaps, but she would have none of them. "Oh, why was it that she who used to queen it over the inner circle in the old home city, must needs come to this? Kenneth, of course she loved him, but even love could not endure everything. What trick of fate was it that sent on him that incipient lung affection, necessitating an instant journey west? It was the only chance, the physicians had said and so she had come too. What else was a wife expected to do, a dutiful wife." But her eyes waxed stormy. She was not dutiful. She was not affectionate. All the being within her clamored for the lights and the music and the attractions of the great city she had left. Yet here she was, tied down, chained to that miserable little cabin yonder, among these ignorant, uncultivated heathen. For in her blindness and rebellion she deemed them as such. For her, there was no beauty in the wonderful sunsets with their heaped up clouds of crimson, violet and saffron. She saw nothing to admire in the changing scenery of the great mountains, one day wrapped in purple haze, the next enveloped in mists and vapor. The early lilt of the meadow lark brought no music to her sick soul as yet.

She saw nothing, nothing in this terrible west that appealed to her. "True, Kenneth was improving but it would be years, perhaps, before he could go home—if ever. There must be no excitement, no late hours, just quiet and mountain air, the physician had warned them, but in the meantime what was she to do? Eat her heart out, go mad with longing for the things she had left?"

Marion was beautiful, with wonderful hazel eyes, a dimpled chin and white hands. Such was Kenneth Warburton's wife.

And Oh, how miserable she was.

She walked on slowly, nursing her bitter thoughts.

Kenneth stood by the side of the cabin, and close by him was a woman.

"It is one of those dreadful people," thought Marion instantly. "I wonder how I can escape her," but there seemed no way out.

She was a heavily set woman in a short brown skirt and jacket. A veil was tied over her hair, and Marion saw as she came nearer, that she was old. There were seams and lines and furrows in her face, the hair was white as snow. In one hand she carried a stout cane.

"This is my wife—Mrs. Lease," said Kenneth as Marion came slowly to his side, and then he left them together. The older woman extended a hand with a smile so winning, it struck Marion at once.

Marion gave her hand reluctantly. She took it, grasped it, but she did not let it go. Instead, she held it closely.

"What a soft, white hand," the older woman exclaimed, pressing it and stroking it. She made no movement to release it and Marion could only stand there.

"Not much hard work has that little hand done, has it?" she said to Marion with a tender smile.

"Not any until I came here," answered Marion, tears springing to her eyes.

"But it will be a capable hand yet," went on the elder woman still smiling. "It has not yet reached its highest development, and it will always be beautiful. Please God, it will be a hand steady, true, too, following the feet in the path of duty."

Marion started.

"Did those benevolent eyes regarding her, read that insurrection of her soul?"

"How do you know it?" she cried involuntarily.

"It may prove faithless, undeserving—like its unworthy possessor." But the older woman with her inscrutable smile only shook her head. "Impossible—hands indicate character and there is no weakness there." She stroked the white hand softly.

"Such a beautiful soft one."

She still smiled.

"It has been so long since I have seen a hand like it."

"Once, years ago when I was young and handsome, white hands bound my kingdom."

There was a silence. The older woman broke it.

"I see you are a musician."

"Yes." Marion did not ask her how she knew it, and the older woman went on. "My dear, over there in my cabin, is what used to be a fine piano. Won't you come over some time, and play for a lonely old woman?"

"Why do you stay here?" cried Marion. "Oh, I think it is all so dreadful—the great, still, unearthly loneliness of these plains. I can't go on living here."

The older woman looked at her.

"Yes, you can," she replied gently. "My dear, don't you know that this is all a part of God's plan concerning you? If it wasn't best for you to be here, rest assured you would not have come. My dear, I've brought six children into existence. I've buried all but two. I've been a widow for over twenty years. I've been rich and I've been without a penny. I've had periods of health, and I've lain on beds of sickness but never once have I doubted but that God loved me."

"But I don't see what I've done," cried Marion rebelliously, "that I must needs be here."

"Perhaps, you've needed pruning, cutting away—transplanting," said the older woman still gently. "Never doubt but that you are here for some good reason. Perhaps it may be just a little waiting time, a time of preparation for something He wants you to do. Whatever it is, can't you bide content for a bit? You wouldn't want to give up your husband, would you?'

"No," admitted Marion in a low voice.

"Well then, be thankful that you are to be spared that. The world will never look the same when the husband of your youth is gone. I know, I've been through it."

"This mountain air is putting fresh strength into that husband of yours."

"Now dearie, you just go ahead and be as happy as you can. Let God do the choosing. Everything will come out all right. Take my word for it. In the tapestry of every life, runs the golden thread of God's purpose. Don't spoil the pattern. Just be patient. Why, you may live to be an older woman than I am, and I'm sixty-nine coming May. You may look back to this experience someday, as the most fruitful in all your life. You will, if you take things in the right spirit. Just you wait and let God do what he wills with you. He won't keep you here for long, if it isn't best for you."

"Don't you remember how in the Bible the children of Israel had to stand still or go forward but they were never out of His care for all that. 'I will guide thee with mine eye.' That's the promise."

She was still stroking the white hand. Marion looked into the seamed old face with its kindly eyes.

"Why, I never thought of it in that way," she cried.

"You're a Christian though."

Marion flushed.

"Yes—a poor one."

"Be a better one then. Now, dear child, you just go on and make that husband of yours happy and get used to us mountain folks as best you can. I realize we're not what you're used to, but we won't hurt you. We won't harm a hair of your head, and serve you with our last breath. We need you as much as you need us. Why, that old piano of mine hasn't been played on for years because no one here knew how, and we haven't heard a song in I don't know when. Oh, we mountain people have our aspirations and our longings too, though no one ever thinks of us in that light. We've learned to be brave, that's all and then Nature, when one grows to love her, makes up for a lot. But you, you can do so much for us and we can help you. Let our hard, work-worn hands do battle for you and you save your white ones to play for us. And don't go to distrusting Providence for placing you here. You set about to be real thankful about it and you'll be rewarded from now on. I know for I've tried. God does so love his children of resignation. You just get to prayin' and ask God to take the bitterness out of your heart and He'll do it. And that ain't all. He'll make you such a blessing to us that in after years, you'll look back on the time spent here as the most useful of your whole life. You've got fine material in you. It just wants workin' over."

Marion looked into the kind, benevolent eyes.

"Why didn't you come before?" she said brokenly. "Oh, I've been so wicked, so unhappy."

And then Marion did an unheard-of thing.

She bent and kissed the furrowed cheek. She put both arms about that neck. She held her new found friend close. And in that hour, she became a new creature.

A SERIAL STORY

CHAPTER XV.

Waves and Billows.

When Donald had sent off Archie's message he turned away from the telegraph office with slow uncertain steps. He wanted to be alone with his thoughts. His own cozy room at home, with only a match to set the gas fire glowing, was comfort itself compared with the chill air outside. Ah, but his father might call for him at any moment. Now that Elsie was gone, there would be a thorough going over of all the ground again. If he could only tell his father all the truth about John M'Ketridge. But no, that would only make him suspect him all the more. As he reasoned thus with himself, he reached the end of Bothwell Road. He hesitated a moment and then turned into it. It mattered little to him that the landscape was blotted out all around him. The world of trouble that lay within his heart was the only thing that seemed to matter just then. With bent head, and hands thrust deep into his great coat pockets he walked mile after mile, the outer world a blank to him, the inner, a sea of trouble. One beacon light—yes, two, beamed over it, Elsie's trust and his mother's. Hope is an anchor that never fails to brighten life. His heart grew stronger when he thought of these two, whose faith in him, the darkest circumstances had not been able to quench. He had always known that his mother would not fail him. But Elsie—sweet Elsie, what had she seen in him to trust, in the face of all the evidence against him? He trembled as he thought of the feelings she had inspired within him. For if this mystery should remain unsolved, Elsie might still be his pole star, guiding over the restless sea of life; but she would never be any nearer. What was a tarnished name but sinking sands? If he must go down, he would sink alone. At this point he wondered what time it was. Unbuttoning his overcoat, he drew out his watch. Eleven o'clock! He must have been at least two hours on the road. And where was he? The fog was lightening. He could feel it even in his spirits. Peering around, his eyes rested on a great black half-hoop on his right. There was no mistaking it. It was Bothwell Bridge. Though he was all unconscious of it, Donald was a poet. Whatever was beautiful or grand, either in nature or in art, touched him with the sense of pleasure or of reverence. For the moment he forgot himself and his sorrows. He felt himself standing on holy ground. He thought of the true men, and brave, who once fought and died there, for holy truth. Perhaps some forefather of his own had faced that fiery trial, and, on the very spot where he now stood, had given back his soul to God, a willing sacrifice for the Faith. He asked himself, had he lived in those days, would he have been one of the brave Covenanters who nobly faced death, rather than part with the creed of their fathers. A wave of emotion swept over him. Lifting his hat reverently from his head and keeping his eyes steadily fixed on the looming mass of the dark bridge he said softly: "I would." As he uttered the words it suddenly occurred to him that he had a battle of his own to fight. Would he show himself a coward and try to fly from it to the ends of the earth? No. He would fight it where it met him. The God of battles would defend the right.

He turned homewards with a lighter heart than he had known since the shadow fell upon him. The sun was breaking through the mist as he reached home. It was nearly one o'clock. He knew his mother would be waiting for him in the kitchen where his dinner would be kept warm for him in the oven. Yet he could not help a feeling of shame as he neared the shop door, to think that he must steal round by the back door like a guilty thing. His feet were almost at the door step, when words fell on his ears which sent the hot blood coursing through his veins, throbbing with hope. It was his father's voice, not in the stern tones he had used towards him for the past two weeks, but it was a yearning cry that he heard, though the words were few—

"Where's Donald?"

"Here, father," replied the young man, striding into the shop, self and pride in an instant blotted out, by the tone of his father's voice.

"Come here, lad, an' help me. Jamie's taken ill."

"Oh, James, what's the matter?" cried Donald, as he put his arms around him. Mr. Graeme heaved a sigh of relief, as Donald's strong young arms lifted the weight of the half conscious James from his own shoulder.

"Ye needna speak tae him Donald. He's no able tae answer ye. He would hae dropped where he was standin' if I hadna grabbed him. He's in for a spell o' sickness. I hae noticed him no himsel' for a while past."

"Poor James. He's been fretting about me." Donald spoke half to himself, and his father made no answer. The whole household was soon alarmed. Mrs. Graeme came with a small quantity of brandy, a thing never used by her, except in cases such as the present. They forced a few drops between his teeth and he soon revived. Looking round in bewilderment he asked what was wrong. Then he laughed at their grave faces.

"Siccan a fuss aboot naething," he said. "An' what a gommeril ye'll think me for getting weak over a bit headache."

"I wish it may prove only a bit headache, Jamie, lad. But there, say nae more till we see what the doctor will think o't. Here Donald and Archie, help him up tae his bed." The young men stepped forward, but James drew back and tried to draw himself together. Involuntarily he laid one hand on his heart. But it was not of that important organ he was thinking, but of a certain empty envelope which lay in his breast pocket.

"I'm much obleeged tae ye Mr. Archie," he said, "but I'm no needing help frae you. Donald will come wi' me." Archie drew back, crestfallen, but made no reply. Jeanie's eyes were on him. But she was too much concerned for James to let him go to his room without a word from her. Taking one of his hands in hers she said kindly:

"Poor James! How your hands burn. It's no wonder you could take no dinner. But never fear, mother will have you all right in a day or two. She's a great doctor, you know." He smiled with a meaning look in his aching eyes as he answered:

"Ay, Miss Jeanie, everything will be a' richt soon."

When Donald had got his friend safely in bed and made as comfortable as the poor fellow's burning brows would allow him to be his mother came in at once to take charge of the patient.

"Run away, Donald, and get some dinner. If James does not soon sleep he may like you to sit with him awhile. That is if he is allowed to speak. We'll see what the doctor says." While his mother spoke the light of high resolution was shining in Donald's eyes.

"Before I think of dinner, mother, I have something to speak to father about." Then bending over James who was moving his head restlessly from side to side on the pillow, he whispered:

"Don't fret, James, I am going down to the shop to offer myself to father in your place." A gleam of joy lit up James's eyes for a moment. But pain, the tyrant, shot her poisoned arrows through his brain again, and robbed him of thought.

Donald, when he had made up his mind to do a hard thing, did not give himself time to change his mind. When he left the sick-room, he ran lightly down stairs into the shop and straight on to the office. His father was sitting with his head between his hands when he entered. The old man looked up inquiringly, a subdued look in his eyes. There was no look of guilt or fear in his son's face, as he stood before him waiting for his father to speak first.

"My burden is greater than I can bear, Donald."

"Father, I have come to offer myself to you now, while James is sick. I don't want to force myself on you. But if you can trust me so far, sometime you will not regret it." His father held out his hand to him warmly—

"Whatever yer haid may have led you tae do, my son, yer heart's a' richt. I'm real glad o' yer help now, an' even if Jamie hadna taken sick, I was going tae ask ye back tae yer work. But it was Mr. Sinclair who showed me it was only richt, an' Jeanie, too. An' I needna tae add yer mither." Donald's heart bounded with gladness as his father mentioned Mr. Sinclair's name. What if he would come to believe him innocent, after all.

Mr. Graeme was waiting in the hall to see the doctor as he passed out, after his visit to James Douglas.

"Is it serious, doctor," inquired he anxiously.

"I fear so, Mr. Graeme, but cannot decide for a day or two. Has he had anything troubling him lately?"

"Ay, doctor, something has gone wrong in a business matter lately. I daur say he has been foolish enough to worry aboot it."

"I thought so. I may as well tell you I fear brain fever. I have given him a draught just now. Let him be kept perfectly quiet. I'll call again before bedtime."

Mr. Graeme felt sick with apprehension as he slowly crept upstairs to tell Jeanie what the doctor had said.

Archie Monteith was just about to start for Glasgow as his uncle came into the room. The mist was gone, and bright sunshine held sway over air and earth.

"What does the doctor say, father?" inquired Jeanie anxiously. Almost with a groan her father told her.

"Oh, poor James," she said. "Donald's trouble has brought this on him."

"I wonder it is not Donald himself who is ill. I believe him innocent, uncle."

"It's good o' ye tae say it, Archie. An' I'll allow no matter how he may hae sinned, the lad's good at hert. It's no every son could come an' offer tae help an auld faither in time o' need, as he did this day, after the way I hae treated him. It's part o' the load lifted. But on the other hand, poor Jamie's load is mine, too."

"Yes, uncle David, it's a great trial with no hospital in Brigend. Would it not be better to try and get him on to Glasgow? A short time in the train would do." Jeanie's face flushed with anger as she spoke:

"Would we think of sending Donald, if he were ill?" She spoke warmly and he winced under the tone, rather than the words.

"I am not thinking so much about the trouble, Jeanie, as of the care he would receive in a hospital. Besides, if it should be infectious—" he paused. Mr. Graeme answered gravely:

"If there was a hospital in Brigend, Archie, I'll no say but we would send the young man there. But seeing that's not so, we wouldna think o' sending him a journey."

"There will be a great deal of nursing needed. Can I come down sometimes and help Donald?"

"Yer real thochtfu', Archie. But Jamie'll no want for care. If the doctor says there's need we'll hae trained nurses o' the best."

As Archie said good-bye to Jeanie a few minutes later, he whispered tenderly:

"Jeanie, my darling, if this sickness should turn out to be different from what the doctor now fears—if it should be infectious, will you promise me to come to mother at once? Your life is too precious to be left so near what may be a fatal disease." What a selfish creature he was showing himself, she thought. But she answered him with a calm smile:

"You know very little about me, cousin Archie. If I were now with your mother and knew that I was needed at home, no matter what the sickness might be, I would come at once."

"It would be enough for you, if you were his promised wife, Jeanie."

"I am glad that I am no man's promised wife. It seems I have more liberty as I am to do what I believe to be right."

"I only wish to shield you from harm, Jeanie, you know it."

"I know it, Archie. All the same the man or woman who could desert a friend in suffering or in need would be but a poor specimen of humanity."

"You are cruel, Jeanie."

"No, truthful."

"Well, I'll be truthful, too. Whether you like it or not, I'll come soon, just to see how you are taking care of yourself."

The lights had been lit for an hour and a half at least, and there were many customers being served in Mr. Greene's shop, when Mr. Sinclair came in. Ever affable and courteous with all whether rich or poor, he had several people to greet before he noticed that Donald was behind one of the counters, busily engaged putting up parcels. With beaming face Mr. Sinclair made straight up to him and grasped his hand with a grip the young man would never forget.

"Donald, my lad," was all he said. But when he turned into the drawing room a few minutes later his face literally shone.

"So your father has kept his word, Jeanie. Donald is at work again."

"Father was going to ask him this evening Mr. Sinclair. But something better than that happened. Donald went to father this afternoon and asked to be taken back."

"Bravo, Donald. I always knew the young fellow had grit in him, Jeanie. Most young men, whether guilty or innocent, would have bolted rather than submit to such extreme measures as your father adopted towards him. Who advised Donald to take so wise a step?"

"His own kind heart I think." Then she told him of James Douglas' illness and of her father's distress. He was genuinely sorry for James and though she was alone and he had words to say he did not wish other ears than hers to hear, he at once declared he must go and see James.

He stepped softly into the sickroom, and laid his finger on his lips as Mr. Graeme rose from the patient's side to greet him. James did not seem to notice him, but kept tossing restlessly and moaning, muttering incoherently the while. He took the sick man's hand into his own and laid his cool fingers on the throbbing pulse. As he did so James muttered brokenly. He seemed to be half sleeping. Mr. Sinclair softly stole out of the room beckoning Mrs. Graeme to follow him. On the stairhead he whispered:

"Mrs. Graeme you may as well have trained nurses at once. This is no ordinary sickness."

"I fear so, Mr. Sinclair. But he's been strong and healthy and a total abstainer all his life. So we must hope he'll win through."

"All these things are in his favor, Mrs. Graeme. And the issues of life and death are in Good Hands."

"I know," she said.

"Is he very ill?" Jeanie asked when he returned to her.

"Yes, Jeanie, he is ill. But as your mother says, he has a splendid constitution and has never indulged in strong drink. We will not allow ourselves to be afraid."

"I am anxious about mother, Mr. Sinclair. She has not left the sickroom all the afternoon. You know it would be madness of her to attempt nursing him herself, and yet, she says, for a few days at any rate, she will not allow a nurse to be sent for."

"Have no fears, dear child. We will just take the matter into our own hands. The nurse will be here before she knows. I will just speak to your father on my way out. A wire to Glasgow will have a nurse here by ten o'clock. Then your mother will be ejected. So that will settle matters."

"We never seem to be out of troubles lately, Mr. Sinclair. The worst of it is, that our best friends have to suffer with us."

"A true friend is for the day of adversity. But often as not, our friends sometimes suffer with us because of some selfish reason."

"But our best friends are not selfish," she said.

"I am," he answered, with that look on his face she had seen there once before.

"I do not think so," she replied.

"I came here purposely to speak to you of myself tonight, Jeanie, but it is not a time for thoughts of self and happiness when a fellow creature lies so near us in agony. Believe me, dear child, that much as I have loved Donald, it was not solely for his sake that I have grieved over what seems to be his fall, but for yours. Believe me, too, that whether your brother be innocent or guilty, you will always be the same in my affections, the dearest girl in all the world." He could not see her face as she stood before him with bowed head. With sudden impulse he touched her shining hair with his lips and was gone.

Down in the office poor old Mr. Graeme thought the minister for once wanting in sympathy, and wondered how he could look so bright, while any family of his flock was so deeply afflicted.

"So ye think I ought tae telegraph for a nurse at once, Mr. Sinclair?"

"Certainly, Mr. Graeme. James cannot be left alone, and Mrs. Graeme, skilful as she is, must not be kept in the sickroom one moment longer than we can help. If a nurse cannot come tonight, let me know. I will come and sit with him, myself."

"Yer kindness is beyond words, Mr. Sinclair. An' never was a hert in more need o' comfort. The waves an' the billows are going over me."

"Far be it from me, Mr. Graeme, to say that you have been like Jonah, fearing to do your duty like a true man. Because to my mind you have been over-doing your duty towards your own son. Yet you may learn a lesson from Jonah that may comfort you. The same waves and billows that he thought were about to swallow him up, brought with them the deliverer, that wrought his salvation."

progress of the last fifty or sixty years, petuated with a view to keeping a "pure" ministry, in the sense of an exclusive ministry, belong to the past, and have lost the zest of a vital reason for existence.

Everything now is in favor of the seminary allied with the state university. The spirit of these university is more hospitable to religious work, and religious people have attained a better appreciation of the scientific altitude. In many instances these universities give the most marked encouragement to the work of the Bible chairs and Bible colleges. Wherever they are established these chairs encourage young men to think of the ministry as a great field for service, and they exert a leavening Christian influence through the whole student body.

At present the colleges of the Disciples constitute only four per cent of all denominational institutions of this country. If that equipment were all in the form of seminaries at state universities, its significance for the higher life of the youth of this country would be increased fourfold.

The Disciples today need twice as many ministers as they have to enable every church to have a settled pastor. They need men trained in the full tide and glow of the highest culture. They need men in every community who are abreast of the best lawyers and physicians and business men. All these things would be fostered by adequate seminaries at state universities. This plan is cheaper, more democratic, less sectarian and is undoubtedly destined to increase in favor.

A noteworthy book which is announced for early publication by Thomas Y. Crowell & Company is Dr. Charles W. Eliot's "Durable Satisfactions of Life." The well-rounded career of the venerable President Emeritus of &Harvard entitles him to speak with authority on what goes to make up the truest happiness in this world, and his opinions as set forth in this work are certain to be given due weight.

Rev. George A. Andrews, a Massachusetts clergyman, has written a book called "What is Essential?" The announced object it to steady people in their belief in these days of many new creeds and cults. The author, who is fully up to date on lines of progressive thought, takes issue with no church or sect. He simply terms his work an attempt to find the bed-rock bottom of our religion. The book is to be published soon by Thomas Y. Crwell & Cmpany.

Wind of the Rye

There is green on the hill, there is gold on the river,
And the wind on the rye sets my spirit a-quiver.
There's a thrill in the sod
At the touch of the God,
And a song in my heart for the gift and the Giver.

Now the grief that for days to my heart has been clinging
Is gone down the wind on the wings of the singing.
The old sorrows die
In the dance of the rye,
And the joy of the world in my spirit is springing!

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

(We are sorry that on account of delay in mails and the editors being out oof the city part of the time, "The Daily Altar" did not appear last week. We appreciate the interest in this department shown by the many letters received regarding its omission last week.—Editors.)

SUNDAY, AUGUST 20.

Theme for the Day—The Tree of Life.

Scripture—And Jehovah God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man whom he had formed. And out of the ground Jehovah God caused to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for good; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, Gen. 2:8, 9.

In this pleasant soil
His far more pleasant garden God ordained:
Out of the fertile ground he caused to grow
All trees of noblest kind for sight, smell, taste:
And all amid them stood the tree of life,
High eminent, blooming ambrosial fruits
Of vegetable gold.
—John Milton ("Paradise Lost").

Prayer—Righteous God, the Giver and Sustainer of life, we read in the book of nature and in the Book of Holiness the story of Thy creative work. Thou hast made man in Thine own likeness, and given to him all the means of comfort and of growth. But most of all hast Thou placed in his pathway the Tree of Life. Gracious Father, help us, we pray Thee, to ponder well upon this mystery of Thy providence, and to possess for ourselves the best gifts of Thy bestowal. May no lesser pleasures rob us of the dower of life. And may we learn the secret of the inner way, that shall bring us to the Tree of Life, whose roots take hold upon the foundations of the world, and whose leaves are for the healing of the nations. We pray in Jesus' name. Amen.

MONDAY, AUGUST 21.

Theme for the Day—The Help of Prayer.

Scripture—O Thou that hearest prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come, Ps. 65:2.

No help but prayer,
A breath that fleets beyond this iron world,
And touches Him that made it.
—Alfred Tennyson ("Harold").

Prayer—O God, our Help in ages past, our Hope for years to come, we take refuge with Thee from the troubles of life, and from the scorn of the world. In Thee is life and peace. Our days are clouded, but the sunlight is Thine own. Our joys are shaded, but the perfect smile belongs to Thee. Teach us the secret of close companionship with Thee. We would have no day pass onward without its season of prayer. And yet we would not count that prayer alone which frames itself in human speech. Help us to make all our moments prayerful with the sense of Thy presence and love. Then all work will be prayer, and all enjoyment praise. Into this inner sanctuary of Thy mercy take us for all the days of this week. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 22.

Theme for the Day—Life's Building.

Scripture—For we are God's fellow-workers: ye are God's husbandry, God's building. According to the grace of God which was given unto me, I laid a foundation, and another buildeth thereupon. But let each man take heed how he buildeth thereupon, 1 Cor. 3:9, 10.

For the structure that we raise,
Time is with materials filled;
Our todays and yesterdays
Are the blocks with which we build.
—H. W. Longfellow ("The Builders").

Prayer—Our divine and merciful Father, all the springs of life and blessing are in Thee. We bless Thee for the new day, that comes to us out of the treasury of Thy goodness, and bears upon its breast the lesson of Thy glory. In it we mean to do something worthy of Thee and of our own estate as the children of God. May the rich materials of time and opportunity which are put into our hands for daily use be well employed by us in the rearing of the structure of character. We would make no mistake in the building we are fashioning, for we have only a short time at which to work at the task, and its purposes are eternal. Therefore we ask for Thy direction and blessing. In Jesus' name. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 23.

Theme for the Day—Life's Sowing.

Scripture—In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withold not thy hand, Eccl. 11:6.

Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters, Isa. 32:20.

Go, speed the stars of Thought
On to their shining goals,—
The sower scatters abroad his seed;
The wheat thou strew'st be souls.
—R. W. Emerson ("Harvests").

Prayer—Our heavenly Father, Thou hast taught us in Thy holy Word that all life is a field in which we sow the seeds of our own choosing. We thank Thee for the liberty of this work, and the privilege of making the harvest what we will under Thy blessing. We confess with shame that we are not always careful to choose the good seed of the kingdom, and sometimes our sowing is in the soil of the flesh rather than the spirit. Yet we would not forget that the reaping is certain; from the one corruption, and from the other life eternal. Grant us the earnestness of the Great Sower in our work, and such a harvest as shall bring us joy. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 24.

Theme for the Day—The New World,—and the Old.

Scripture—And Jehovah said unto Abraham, Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred and from thy father's house unto a land that I will show thee, Gen. 12:1.

And he went out, not knowing whither he went. . . . For he looked for the city which hath the foundations, whose maker and builder is God, Heb. 11:8, 10.

At length
The land bird and the branch with berries on it,
The carven staff—and last the light, the light
On Guanahani! but I changed the name;
San Salvador, I called it; and the light
Grew as I gazed, and brought out a broad sky
Of dawning over—not those alien palms,
The marvel of that fair new nature—not
That Indian isle, but our most ancient east,
Moriah with Jerusalem; and I saw
The glory of the Lord flash up, and beat
Through all the homely place.
—Tennyson ("Columbus")

Prayer—Our Father, Thou hast called us out of the old life, with its contentment and seeming sufficiency, into a new life of struggle, adventure and achievement. We go forth, not knowing whither we go, save that Thou leadest us, as Thou hast led Thy servants in all the ages. Yet when they have come to the new place, it is the marvel of Thy providence that they have ever found the old again, but more glorious and more enduring. Teach us, our Father, that the things which we love, and which we seem to lose in the departure upon new and nobler service, are after all not lost, but sure to be found again farther down the way, yet with a new glory they never had before. So may we go on our way with courage, and come in due season to the City of God, which we ever seek. Amen.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 25.

Theme for the Day—Sleep's Restoration.

Scripture—The disciples therefore said unto him, Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well. . . . For they thought that he spake of taking rest in sleep, John 11:12, 13.

Then from my wearied brain decay
The feverous fragments of the day,
The thoughts that dance and die;
From life's exhausted cells they flow,
They throng and wander, whirl and go,
And what is left am I.
—F. W. H. Myers ("Sleep").

Prayer—O Lord, we find in Thee the Great Companion of our way. Thou hast given us the courage to enter upon the work of life, and we thank Thee for another day in which it is to be furthered in Thy name. For the blessing of sleep we are grateful. It has refreshed us and made us ready for the daily task. It is Thy loving gift to us and to all Thy children. In confidence we lie down to our rest, for Thou, O Lord, sustainest us. May our trust in Thee be ever such that with cheerful mind, putting away all the fret and worry of the world, we may take our rest. And in the morning do Thou call us to our duties again with unabated good will. Thus may the evening and the morning ever be Thy day, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 26.

Theme for the Day—Gethsemane.

Scripture—Then cometh Jesus with them to a place called Gethsemane, and saith to his disciples, Sit ye here, while I go yonder and pray. And he went forward a little, and fell on his face and prayed, saying, My Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt, Matt. 26:36, 39.

All those who journey, soon or late,
Must pass within the garden's gate;
Must kneel alone in darkness there,
And battle with some fierce despair.
God pity those who cannot say:
"Not mine but thine"; who only pray:
"Let this cup pass," and cannot see
The purpose in Gethsemane.

Prayer—Holy Father, our hearts are bowed in sorrow as we read the story of our Savior's suffering in the garden of anguish. Nor have the years failed to bring to us the knowledge that it was our sin, the sin of a careless and self-seeking world, that brought him to that sad hour. Help us to comprehend something of the mystery and necessity of that experience, and to know that in our lives some part of it must be borne, if we are to share with our Lord in his great redemptive work. In humility and loving obedience may we go forward, even through the gloom of the garden and up the steep side of the mount of sorrow. But may we also know that Thou art with us, and that at the end of the way there is light. Amen.

Church Life

—Orders are beginning to come in for the Bethany Graded Lessons for the autumn quarter. The quarter begins in October.

—This Religious Educational number is sent out in August with the hope that it may bring helpful suggestions to pastors and teachers who are planning for the work of the coming fall and winter.

—Dr. Herbert L. Willett is again in the pulpit at the Memorial Church after a vacation of some weeks, during which time the pulpit was supplied by Arthur J. Hall, director of religious education in the church.

—Mr. and Mrs. Charles Clayton Morrison have returned from their trip through Europe and to the conference at Edinburgh. Mr. Morrison will now be in the office again and will use more space for editorial writings.

Charles E. McVay, song evangelist, has December open. Address him at Hardy, Neb.

September 15 is the day set for the dedication of the new $10,000 church at Estherville, Iowa.

D. W. Moore, Carthage, Mo., is spending the month of August with his family at Camp Clark on the James river.

Jesse Bader will close his work at Troy, Kansas, the last of August and become pastor of the church at Colfax, Iowa.

The church at Lake City, Iowa, where Robert Moore is pastor, is putting in a $3,000 pipe organ and making other improvements in their building.

W. D. Barble has resigned at Corydon, Indiana, to accept the pastorate of the West Park Church, Indianapolis, Ind., where he begins work September 1.

A new church was dedicated at Sumner, Ill., this last Sunday in July, with Charles Reign Scoville in charge. J. L. Fowler is the pastor.

L. F. DePoister has closed his work at Gerlan, Ill., and assumed his duties as pastor of the church at Keithsburg, where the work starts with promise.

Granville Snell preached for eight days in a meeting at DeWitt, Mo., with sixteen additions to the church; then the meeting was continued by F. W. Condit.

Harry E. Tucker, formerly of Chicago Heights, now pastor of the church at Platte City, Mo., is spending the month of August at Wateka, and Chicago, Ill.

Rev. Melvin Menges reports two baptisms at Mantanzas, Cuba, last week. The new mission building which is being pushed to completion will be the best in the city.

Thomas H. Adams, who has been serving as field agent for Cotner University, has accepted a call to the pastorate of the Lyons Street Church, Grand Rapids, Michigan.

The new building of the church at Fort Dodge, Iowa, where L. P. Kopp is pastor, will be ready for use early in September. Dedicatory services will be held September 11.

H. H. Harmon, pastor at Lincoln, Nebr., who for two or three years has been platform manager in the Lincoln Chautauqua, has this year been called upon for the same service at Auburn, Neb.

James Small, Independence Boulevard, Church, Kansas City, Mo., writes: "I know of a preacher, educated and experienced, salary $1,400. Some church should secure him."

The West Street Church, Tipton, Ind., Guy I. Hoover, pastor, recently held a recognition service in honor of those who had completed the first and second year of the training course now in operation in that school.

Earle M. Todd, pastor of the church at Fort Wayne, Indiana, is spending his vacation reading in the libraries of the University of Chicago. Mr. Todd is doing some advanced work in religious education with his church.

Harry G. Hill, of the Third Church, Indianapolis, gave the commencement day address for Rochester College. This is the second time Bro. Hill has performed the service at this place. His subject was, "The Education for Citizenship in a Democracy."

Dr. Ruskin M. Lhamon, son of W. J. Lhamon, recently graduated in medicine from Washington University in St. Louis, and has accepted a position as instructor in anatomy in Leland Stanford University the coming year.

George B. Ranshaw, until last fall secretary of the A. C. M. S., has been supplying the pulpit of the First Church, Covington, Ky. The church has now called him to the permanent pastorate and he will begin service in this capacity the first of September.

H. E. Knott, acting pastor of the church at Cadillac, Mich., returns to Harvard University the first of September. Mr. Knott has done good work at Cadillac, and the church will want a man of the best equipment to take his place.

Thomas J. Thompson has closed his service as pastor of the church at Memphis, Tenn., and is spending the month of August in Carthage, Ill., where he may be addressed "by churches progressive and alive desiring a preacher of experience for full time."

The Sunday school of the First Church, Akron, Ohio, had an average attendance of 738 for the first half of the year. The school is now in a contest with the school at Nelsonville, Ohio, of which R. A. Doan is the superintendent.

Walter S. Goode will preach his farewell sermon to the Central Church, Youngstown, Ohio, August 28, and go at once to his new work with the church at Lakewood, Ohio. Mr. Woode is spending the month of August with his family at the sea shore.

A reconsecration service was held in the church at Cairo, Ill., the first Sunday in August. It was partly in recognition of the one hundred new members that have just come into the church. The Pastor Thompson has just returned from a ttrip to the Holy Land.

The Christian Church, Ottumwa, Iowa, organized about ten years ago with eighty members, by B. S. Denny, DesMoines, is erecting a new house of worship which will be dedicated in September. Z. T. Sweeney will have charge of the service. The church now has a membership of over three hundred.

The Disciples of Stark County, Ohio, recently held their annual picnic at Meyers Lake, near Canton. All churches of the county were represented. I. J. Cahill, Cleveland, state secretary, delivered the address. By unanimous vote, Mr. Cahill was invited to be chief speaker at the meeting next year.

C. M. Pinkerton, chairman of the committee of the Oklahoma brotherhood, sends a ringing call for an attendance of one thousand strong at the state meeting to be held in Tulsa, September 8, 1910. This is the youngest of the brotherhood state organizations. "Let us be the greatest," says Mr. Pinkerton.

J. N. Wooten, Longview, Texas, closed a short meeting at Gun Springs last week, with 23 additions, 21 by confession and baptism. Organized a church with 75 charter members. About sixty of these were baptized by Mr. Wooten in other meetings. Site and material for a new building were donated during the meeting.

H. A. Eicher, of Bilaspur, India, reports that the work is moving along well. The rains are not as abundant as usual, but there have been a few heavy showers. The vegetation is looking fresh and green. Much heavier rains are needed to insure the year's crop. Brother Eicher has had his first fever in India.

It has been definitely decided by the reunited Churches of Christ in Joplin, Mo., that F. F. Walters shall remain as pastor until September 1, when he will engage in evangelistic work. James M. Miller will serve as pastor from September 1 till January 1, when a permanent pastor will be chosen.

We have just received the first general illustrated announcement of the national convention at Topeka, Kans., October 11-17. The work is well done and shows Topeka, with its fine auditorium, beautiful churches, immense commercial enterprizes to be no mean city for the great gathering of disciples that will be held there this autumn.

Dr. C. L. Pickett will be available for addresses between the 18th of August and the 10th of October. Since his return from the Philippines on furlough he has spoken at Lake Geneva, at the Nebraska State Convention in Omaha, and St. Paul. After the Topeka Convention he expects to spend some time in post graduate medical work in the University of Pennsylvania.

Frank E. Boren, recently resigned as pastor of the church at Vicaville, Cal., gave a series of addresses at the Santa Cruz convention in July. His subjects were: "The Emmanuel Movement," "The Sway of Mind"; and "The Realm of the Sub-conscious." Mr. Boren is a careful student, and this tackling of big problems in a systematic way is characteristic.

J. Frank Green, associate secretary of the Christian Missionary Society, during July visited ninteen churches in the interest of Michigan missions, delivering twenty-two sermons and address. Definite amounts were pledged by each church for the state work. In the state of Michigan there are but one-fifth as many churches as in the state of Ohio, or just the same number as in Kansas City, Mo.

Messrs. Moon and Wilson are getting along very well with the reconstruction of the "Oregon." The hull is all together and is no wready to be riveted. Steamboat men who have seen it say that it is the strongest and best shaped hull on the river. Mr. Howell, of the Baptist Missionary Society, tells his friends that if they want a boat built while you wait apply to Wilson and Moon, shipbuilders.

Miss Edna V. Eck, Bolonge, Africa, writes: "This is surely a happy place in which to be located. The one unhappy thing to me is that I am unable to do more work that is to be done. School work has been given me and with the help of the native teachers I am getting along very well. I have never had a more pleasant work in my life, and expect to find more pleasure when I have more of the language."

Harry G. Hill, of Indianapolis, will be platform manager at Weldon Springs Chautauqua, Clinton, Ill., where he served in a similar capacity last season. In addition to his duties as superintendent he will give a seies of morning lectures on the following themes: "The Evolution of the Social Consciousness." "Social Service the Measure of Worth." "Our Institutions and their Social Interest." "Social Sin and the Crimnaloid," "Social Problems in Our Country."

The Moody Bible Institute will hold dedicatory exercises on Tuesday at noon, in connection with the breaking of the ground for the new woman's building they are erecting on the corner of LaSalle avenue and Chestnut street. This building, of which Mr. H. B. Wheelock is the architect, is to be seven stories in height, and to harmonize in design with a similar one erected last year on Institute Place for the accommodation of the men students.

The churches in Australia are opening a work in the New Hebrides on the Island of Oba. On this island there is a population of over 67,000. In the mission there are fifty schools with sixty teachers and about one thousand pupils. The property owned by the mission is worth $1,625. The Australian churches are to pay $750 annually to support the teachers and defray other expenses. There is a great missionary future for the churches in Australia.

F. M. Rains, of the Foreign Society, writes: "We regret to announce a loss in receipts for the month of July of $1,027. The churches made a gain of $1,253. This is encouraging. The individual contributions fell behind $2,145, due to the fact that the brethern were sending in contributions for the steamer "Oregon" last year. It is hoped that the churches and Sunday Schools will make remittances during August that will more than overcome the loss of July."

The Sixth Conference of the Young People's Missionary Moveemnt held at Conference Point, Lake Geneva, Wis., July 1 to 11, was the largest ever held at that point. Two hundred and fifty delegates were in attendance. Of this number only seven were from our people. These conferences are remarkable from a spiritual and intellectual standpoint. The atmosphere is missionary first, last and always. May another year see fifty of our young ladies enlisted.

The annual county meeting of the Christian churches of Tipton County, Ind., was held near Haobb's Station, August 7. The program consisted of preaching and communion service at 10:30, and preaching at 3:30. James Burkhardt of Frankfort was the preacher of the day. Guy Hoover of Tipton was presiding officer of the day. "Larger things for the cause of Christ in Tipton County" is the watchword for the year.

There seems to be no slacking of pace with the South Broadway Church, Denver, during the summer. Sunday, July 24, one person who had recently been baptized was received into the fellowship of the church, two others were received by letter, and seven persons made the confession of their faith in Christ. The same evening Peter Ainslie, president of the American Christian Missionary Society, gave an address in this church on "The Importance of Christianizing America." This address appeals so strongly to the audiences where it is delivered, that Mr. Ainslie has been requested to print it.

Laurence Fenninger, pastor of the Sixth Church of Philadelphia, has resigned to take a course in Union Seminary. He has been pastor of the church for four years, during which time he has completed his course in Princeton University, graduating with honors and receiving a fellowship in philosophy. He is spending the summer at Bird-in-Hand, Pa. The church is in a prosperous condition and is contemplating enlarging its building. It is looking for some young man who would like the privilege of taking a course in the University of Pennsylvania to take charge of the work.

A new home is being erected at Bolenge. C. P. Hedges has charge of the printing press, the oversight of the teachers and is looking after the new building. As the others are away all the work of the station has fallen on him. In addition to that he has considerable printing on hand. He writes: "But what good is a man if he is not willing to inconvenience himself that his mission may be performed. To bear the message to Garcia we do not have to be spectacular. I am glad that I can do this. The work can go on a great deal better here without experienced workers than at some of the outposts.

The First Church, New York City, which was organized October 10, 1810, will hold its centennial celebration October 2 to 9. A fine program has been prepared for the occasion by the centennial committee of the board of officers, of which Jacob H. Banton is secretary. The services begin on Sunday with a sermon at 11 a. m. by B. B. Tyler, Denver, and at 8 p. m. by J. H. Garrison, editor of the Christian Evangelist. Dr. Garrison preaches again Monday evening. Tuesday evening there will be a reading of a historical sketch of the church by Robert Christie, and greetings from old members of the church. Wednesday evening will be given to a social reception. Friday evening and Sunday morning Dr. Herbert L. Willett will be the preacher, and Sunday evening the sermon will be by Miner Lee Bates, president of Hiram College, thus closing a week of delightful fellowship and inspiration. W. L. Fisher is pastor of this church.

David H. Shields, pastor of the church at Eureka, Ill., supplied the pulpit of the Englewood Church Sunday morning and evening, August 7. W. W. Sniff of Paris, was the preacher August 14.

The church at Irving Park, Chicago, has not yet arranged for a successor to Alva W. Taylor. A call was extended to Clarence E. Rainwater, but he accepted the work of superintendent of the Hamilton Park playground instead.

Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Keller, well know workers in the Englewood Church, celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding at their home, 6818 Normal Ave., August 6th. The day was spent quietly with only a few members of the family as invited guests.

The Central Church, Des Moines, Finis Idleman, pastor, will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary October 5-9. The opening address of the program will be by Charles S. Medbury, pastor of the University Church. H. O. Breeden, who was for twenty-three years pastor of the church, will preach the sermon on Sunday. One of the early addresses of the program will be that by B. J. Radford

When Nelson Trimble was placed in charge of the work at Gary, Ind., last June, by the American Christian Missionary Society, there were but thirty members of the church that could be brought together. Since then there have been fifty additions to the membership. Besides this Mrs. Trimble has opened a mission in the city where she speaks every Sunday afternoon. Chicago Disciples rejoice in the success of the church in this magic city, and in Mr. Trimble's achievements.

Follow the International Lesson Committee

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine month or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

Churches Reunite

Seventeen months ago F. F. Walters went to the pastorate of the Central Church, Joplin, Mo., for the express purpose of bringing together the two congregations that had a year or more before divided. This work has now been accomplished and Mr. Walters writes: "We are all happy over the outcome." According to agreement both pastors have resigned and another move will be chosen for the United Church. Mr. Walters will for a time give himself to evangelistic work, perhaps later taking up the pastoral office again. Mr. Walters is a graduate of Drake University, with post graduate work in the University of Chicago. For five years he was pastor and evangelist in Colorado. For five years he has been in Missouri, at Springfield and Joplin. His first meeting will be with the church at Dexter, Mo., where E. J. Church is pastor. F. J. Held will be leader of song. The following note from Mr. Walters' predecessor at Joplin will be of interest:

Three years ago while I was minister of the First Church where I had served many years, serious trouble arose in the congregation numbering then nearly 1,200 persons. It did not center round the minister, neither did it pertain to any one's life or character but had to do with methods and organization. The result was that some 200 members withdrew and formed an organization under the name of the Central Christian Church. Meeting first in a hall they later erected a basement of a proposed new building where they have since worshipped. L. L. Combs, Dr. Thos. L. Cooksey and James M. Miller have in turn served the new congregation. After a year and a half had passed I felt that a readjustment would be reached more quickly if I left. So I arranged and came to the Central Church here at Peoria. F. F. Walters of the Central Church, Springfield, Mo., was chosen as my successor. Brothers Walters and Miller have for several years been my warm personal friends and also friends of each other. To those who know their spirit it is not surprising that a movement began soon after they were both in the city for union. It is not necessary to recite details but suffice it to say that under the wise leadership of Brother Walters the First Church made overtures to Central to return and that under the equally wise leadership of Brother Miller Central voted unanimously to do so and on Sunday, July 1st the happy consummation took place."

My last infrmation was that Brother Miller would likely be called to serve the united church till January 1, 1911, and that Brother Walters would for a time at least evangelize. Both men are equipped to do a fine work in any field they may choose. Brother Miller is a graduate of the College of the Bible of Kentucky University and has done a really remarkable work at Diamond, Mo., his first charge.

Fraternally,
W. F. TURNER.

Peoria, Ill., August 1, 1910.

New England Message

Our missionary work in New England progresses slowly but surely. We are in need of funds and must raise $200 more before Sept. 1st, in order to carry on our work as planned. We urge all our churches wherever located to help the cause in New England and send liberal subscriptions at an early date. He who gives promptly gives doubly.

Our annual convention meets in Brockton, Mass., Sept. 8, 9, 10 and 11. We want the largest convention our New England churches have ever had. Let all our brethern plan to be there ready to work for the cause we all love. For further information write to John A. Gardner, Cor. Sec., 176 South St., Boston.

Front Rank Statement

There have been issued from the national office seventy-two certificates to date, August 5. The ranking by states is as follows: Kentucky, 18; Indiana, 13; Iowa, 9; Oregon, 8; Colorado, 5; Nebraska, 5; California, 4; Illinois, 4; Ohio, 3; District of Columbia, 1; West Virginia, 1; Oklahoma, 1; total, 72. The new Front Rank Schools this week are: Brownville, Neb., First Dorchester, Neb.,Cynthana, Ky., Crestwood, Ky., Butler, Ky., Oxford, Ind., La Harp, Ill., Mosier, Ore., University Place, Enid, Okla. Kentucky still holds first place; Nebraska makes a good gain, and Oklahoma is initiated. Missouri promises to be in the race within a week. Kansas has started a campaign for "Sixty Front Rank Schools in Sixty Days." It remains to be seen which state will lead in this splendid campaign.—Robt. M. Hopkins, Bible School Secretary, A. C. M. S., Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Home Missions

The American Christian Missionary Society goes steadily forward through the hot season. Our missionaries report in the last month, baptisms, 634; accessions by letter, 250; by statement, 450; total additions to the church, 1,336. That is a wonderful work, and the results justify sending many fold more men and money into destitute fields. Six new churches were organized. Such labor is worth while. The cost of it all was only about $4.00 per member, with the church thrown in.

The total receipts of the Home Society to July 31, were $92,737.66, a gain of $8,485.64 over the same period last year. Eighty-nine churches gave in July, which made no contribution last year. Many churches, however, have deferred the offering to Home Missions till fall. August and September alone remain before our books close. If every church wil make its contribution, however large or small, to Home Missions, that contribution will be an investment yielding dividends annually to every enterprise of the Church of Christ; and it will set the pace for itself in the second century of American history.

Money is not the first consideration in our missionary work, but the expansion of the circle of influence, and the number of fields cultivated—and there are thousands of square miles under the American flag where we have no church—requires money. Every lover of his native land and true follower of Christ, will be glad, if his attention is called to it, to share in the glorious religious conquest of our home land. Send all remittances to the A. C. M. S., Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

I. M. McCash,
Secretary.

News from the Foreign Society

Dr. C. L. Pickett is encouraged over the work in the Philippine Islands. Many converts preach without any idea of compensation. Many have turned completely from the drink habit. As they come to appreciate the real teaching of God's work, joy comes into their lives. The gospel is always and everywhere the power of God unto salvation. Dr. Pickett has about twenty native evangelists associated with him in his work.

Dr. W. E. Macklin opened our great mission in Nankin, China, in 1886. He soon began his important medical work. Last year he treated 13,508 patients. While working for all classes the Doctor gives unusual attention to the very poor. Last year he treated, housed and fed in all two hundred and forty-nine paupers. His expenses for that special work are mostly met from medical fees or donations on the field. Besides his great medical work the doctor has done a vast amount of literary work.

Secretary F. M. Rains started on his visit to the mission fields the night of July 24. He will be at the Long Beach, Cal., convention August 4 to 6, and sails from San Francisco August 9. The month of September will be spent in Australia where he speaks about every day during the time.

Three years ago our missionaries in Japan began work at Yonezawa. The first man baptized was a teacher in the public primary school. Almost immediately he was transferred to another place entirely removed from Christian influence. Last year we began work in the place to which he was transferred, and he was found still strong in the faith. Last month he led two to Christ by his faithful life and teaching.

One of the very weakest churches in our Sendai District, Japan, reports the baptism of three young men. C. E. Robinson is the evangelist in that district. He is supported by the Tabernacle Church, Columbus, Ind., of which W. H. Book is the pastor.

C. E. Benlehr, Damoh, India, reports the baptism of six boys. He has been offered a government position to take up industrial work in the agricultural department.

J. C. Archer, who went out from Ohio, has begun to preach some in the Hindi tongue at Jubbulpore, India. He is supperted by the church at Mansfield, Ohio.

D. O. Cunningham, Harda, India, says that the missionaries have just concluded a two months' evangelistic campaign in the villiges with very encouraging results.

Dr. A. L. Shelton, Batang, on the border of Tibet, always writes in a cheerful mood. He says: "We are all well and the work goes fine. The Lord is certainly prospering us."

The new school praperty in Shanghai, China, will be transferred to our mission August 31. It will be remembered that we have had a school for boys there for many years. We have been greatly hampered for an enlargement, but $6,000 for additional grounds was raised for this special purpose and has been forwarded. This will be good news for H. P. Shaw and others.

Dr. W. N. Hardy on his way to Batang stopped for a day in Japan, and then hurried on to Shanghai, Nankin and Wuhu. His purpose was to leave Ichang on the first day of August. Traveling through China is somewhat risky in the hot season, but as Dr. Shelton wishes to come home on furlough, Dr. Hardy is hurrying on to relieve him.

Bruce L. Kershner reports that he baptized seven during the month of June. The Loretto congregation has conceived the idea of renting a place for regular out meetings. In the central district the evangelistic work is going on as usual.

A university is being established in Manila for the Philippine Islands. This will be a great institution and will be supported by the government. The missionaries in the Philippine Islands are planning for some kind of work in connection with it, principally dormitory work. The founders of the university have made no provision for advanced Bible work. They have made no provision to meet the crowning need of the Philippines.

James Ware writes: "Yesterday I had the pleasure of baptizing ten girls from the Shanghai Door of Hope. These are lovely Christian girls. I am glad and grateful for the measure in which I am able to co-operate with the workers and to know that my assistance is much appreciated."

George B. Baird states that at Lu-chow-fu, China, in the midst of the hot summer weather the waiting room at the hospital, which is used as a church, is crowded to overflowing at the morning service, as it has been all during the last year. A suitable chapel, which will cost about $3,000, is needed, at that place. There is no room large enough to accommodate those who wish to hear. Maybe someone whom the Lord has prospered will furnish the funds for this purpose.

James Ware, Shanghai, China, is fifty-one years of age. Goodness and mercy have followed him all the days of his life. He is particularly thankful because he has, besides good health for himself and family, a deeper and more solid interest in the work than ever before. His trust is that by God's grace he shall find the best part of the work before him.

Dr. George E. Miller of Mungoli, C. P., India, writes that the work moves on in much the same way. The missionaries are busy day after day trying to prepare apostles and teachers for the Master's service.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon, of Lacag, Philippine Islands, reports 1,277 medical treatments in the month, 29 surgical operations, 10 visits to outside towns, 356 sermons, 200 houses visited, and about 1,000 tracts distributed, three marriages and 38 baptisms. He and several of the helpers were out a week preaching to the people in the mountain region and baptizing.

The missionaries at home on furlough are preparing to start back to their fields. Miss Bertha Clawson returns to Tokio, Japan; Dr. and Mrs. Wm. Macklin to Nankin, China; Dr. and Mrs. Paul Wakefield to Chaohsien, China; Mr. and Mrs. R. Ray Eldred to Bolenge, Africa, and Mr. and Mrs. M. B. Madden to Sendai, Japan. They will receive a most cordial welcome on their return to their homes.

The S. S. "Mongolia" sailed from San Francisco on the 12th. She was delayed three days on account of an accident on her previous trip. Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Rains are among the passengers. They go on the "Mongolia" as far as Honolulu and transfer to the "Mariposa" for Sydney, Australia.

James C. Ogden, of Batang, reports the arrival of a new missionary at that station. His name is James Clarence Ogden, Jr. He cannot speak the language and has a very slender outfit, but he is most welcome and is a help already. He makes friends for the work and for the workers.

The Foreign Society recently received $1,200 from two of its most loyal supporters. They are living-links. What a blessed privilege to have your representative working for you,

DRAKE UNIVERSITY

Drake University is twenty-nine years old, has eleven buildings devoted exclusively to school purposes, employs more than 150 instructors, and has an annual attendance of more than 1,800 students The University is located in the best suburb of "Beautiful Des Moines," with easy access to every point of educational and religious interest in the city. Library facilities are unexcelled in the West, living expenses are moderate and opportunities for remunerative employment are unusually good. School is in session throughout the year.

THE COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE

The Bible College of Drake University was established at the opening of the school in 1881. It is

Free from the limitations of man-made creeds and sectarian domination; has a faculty of earnest scholars, each an expert in some branch of Bible study; maintains that spirit of loyalty to Christ which leaves the mind free to "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good"; has organic union with a large and rapidly growing university and affords an opportunity of hearing in lecture or recital many of the most famous world characters. Des Moines is an educational, artistic, industrial and religious center.

MEDICAL MISSIONARIES

Drake University has more Medical Missionaries in the field than any other of our schools. No other institution in the Brotherhood offers the advantages to be found at Drake University. The College of Medicine of Drake University is standard by every test applied to such institutions. The training of the medical missionary in the College of Liberal Arts, the College of the Bible and the College of Medicine assures the best preparation for complete service.

Scholarships for Bible College Students

Free scholarships are provided by the university and its friends for all students preparing for the ministry or the mission field.

F. E. Hagin, Tokio, Japan, writes: "I have traveled quite extensively already among my mission points and had the joy of baptizing a fine young man at Toride a week ago. Am so glad to be back and my work needed me."

STEPHEN J. COREY.

A Belated Letter

Editors Christian Century:—Evidently the last word has not been said on the subject of "Union and Baptism," as your "Readers' Opinions" in "The Christian Century" abundantly show, and you will perhaps allow a "Small" word on the subjects in your columns.

I have read all that has been written on the "Union and Baptism" question that has appeared in the past few months in your paper, and on the whole, the correspondence has certainly been interesting and profitable. Our "Readers' Opinions" is now a necessary part of the "Century's." I wish to add this word, which has been emphasized again and again in our history, viz: "Let us call Bible things by Bible names" whereever it can be done. For instance, in this week's issue, June 9, 1910, W. H. Thomas writes about "Water Baptism," and argues against its spirituality by it being a material element. We shall have something to say about the spirituality of baptism later, but at this point will simply content ourself with remarking, in all kindness, that when a man in this dispensation and in this age, conceives it to be his duty to discuss "water baptism," he betrays by his very use of the term his incompetence to discuss the subject of baptism from a scriptural standpoint. The term, "Water Baptism" is an old dodge of the denominations to cast aspersion on the institution as a saving ordinance, and ought to be forever abandoned by our writers.

Baptism in the New Testament, as the writer in question knows very well, is never divorced from faith. Indeed, if Mr. Thomas was to call it "faith's baptism" and say that faith is "for the remission of sins," he would come much nearer the truth.

We only know living things by their expression or manifestation. Faith is a vital thing, and must express itself in obedience.

God's thoughts are expressed in the rose, and in all created things. Every great thing was once a thought. If we want to make civilization great outside, you must give it a soul inside.

You cannot keep faith and love in the heart, they must express themselves. We see the spiritual through the material. Even God's revelation of love is in the incarnate Christ. The climax of Paul's concluding phrase is, "Through Christ Jesus." This is the key to Paul's philosophy. All abstractions become concrete in Jesus. Heaven and earth meet in him.

"Life and immortality," Paul says, "were brought to light through Christ." Look anywhere and the unseen is manifested through the seen. Take the unseen out of this world and you have a dead world, a mere material world. Take the unseen out of baptism and you then have water baptism—Infant baptism, for instance.

Take away the interior of obedience and you have no obedience. The only evidence that man can have of our faith, or that God requires, is our obedience. In this view of the matter, there are two sides to faith. Faith is the foundation of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen; and there is faith expressed in action.

In a word, there is obedient faith, and disobedient faith, according to the Scriptures, and the Bible knows of no other kind. Weak faith and strong faith, obedient or disobedient—that's all.

Faith is perfected in obedience. Baptism is faith "actualized." Weak and strong faith are illustrated in the chief rulers and Paul. Weak in the former, and strong in the latter Faith must take hold of the whole machinery of life, before it can be said to be saving faith.

In the light of all this, then, it is faith all the way through. The "Confession" is faith speaking. Baptism is faith acting. Prayer is faith petitioning. The Christian life is faith serving. These are steps, to be sure, but they are the steps of faith.

As I have written so much already on the baptismal phase of the question, I will not take your space for anything I have to offer on union. Suffice it to say, as I see it, we have no union basis to suggest or invent. We have a union to keep and guard. Union is like the Gospel, we have not to invent a Gospel, but to preach one.

JAMES SMALL.

Editors of Christian Century:—I was more pleased and edified by the address of Walter Rauschenbush published in your paper than I am able to tell you.

I enclose price for the Christian Century another year. You are giving us much of the best things. J. S. HUGHES.

Holland, Mich.

The Federal Council of Churches in the United States reports that it has found in Colorado alone 133 places, having from 150 to 1,000 inhabitants, without any Protestant religious service of any kind, 100 of them not having even Catholic service. Every one of these places, however, has plenty of saloons and other evil resorts.

—Jean Finot, one of the leading French editors, says: "The twentieth century will be women's centruy, as the eighteenth and nineteenth were the centuries of human rights." He says with conviction that women will soon have the right to vote and that they will assume a much greater place of importance in the history of the present century than in past years.

Annual Offering for Church Extension

Begins

FIRST SUNDAY IN SEPTEMBER

Church Extension Supplies should be ordered at once so the orders can be filled promptly from the office at Kansas City.

THE FOLLOWING SUPPLIES WILL BE SENT:

Ist, Collection Envelopes; 2nd, A four-page pamphlet, "Church Extension and the New Century Before Us," which ought to be circulated by the thousands among the members of the church; 3rd, Pastoral Letters; 4th, Church Extension Subscription Cards.

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS THIS YEAR

is the amount we want to secure for the current Missionary Year for Church Extension. If we can raise FORTY THOUSAND DOLLARS in September we will reach the $100,000. Is this not worth working for? The Board trusts that every minister of the gospel and every elder in the church will take an interest in enlisting the congregation, over which he has charge, in the Annual Offering.

ATTRACTIVE FEATURES OF CHURCH EXTENSION

1. Church Extension money comes back to go out again every five years. Loans are returned in five annual payments.
2. Churches do their best to help themselves and come to this Board in their extremity for loans to complete their buildings.
3. The Board loans about one-third the cost of the lot and church building. The church aided, therefore, raises two dollars for every one loaned.
4. Many congregations to whom we promise loans do not need them in the end. Yet they would not have had the courage to begin except for the offered help.
5. A loan from this Fund makes it possible for a congregation to erect the first building in a new town or ward of a city and thus gain immense advantage.
6. Our Board encourages churches to erect up-to-date buildings by furnishing church plans that are modern and useful and that are perfect as to heating, lighting, ventilation and acoustics.

Send all orders for supplies to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 603 New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

INTERNATIONAL COURSE

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR

Purpose—The purpose of the Graded Lessons is: To meet the spiritual needs of the pupil in each stage of his development. The spiritual needs broadly stated are these:
1. To know God as he has revealed himself to us in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ..... 2. To exercise toward God, the Father, and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, trust, obedience, and worship..... 3. To know and to do our duty to others..... 4. To know and do our duty to ourselves.

Second Year	5		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Large Pictures (9x12 inches) Beginners' Stories—(Illustrated folder for pupils) Part I, II, III, IV	Ready (October, 1910)
PRIMARY		To lead the child to know the heavenly Father, and to inspire within him a desire to live as God's child: 1. To show forth God's power, love, and care, and to awaken within the child responsive love, trust, and obedience. 2. To build upon the teachings of the first year (1) by showing ways in which children may express their love, trust, and obedience; (2) by showing Jesus the Saviour, in his love and work for men; and (3) by showing how helpers of Jesus and others learn to do God's will. 3. To build upon the work of the first and second year by telling (1) about the people who chose to do God's will; (2) how Jesus, by his life and words, death and resurrection, revealed the Father's love and will for us; (3 such stories as will make a strong appeal to the child and arouse within him a desire to choose and to do that which God requires of him. The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.

The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year.

The Lessons for the Summer Quarter beginning July 3, will prepare the school for the greatly enriched course beginning October 1. Send today for order blanks and samples.

Oklahoma Christian University

E. V. Zollars, President.
O. N. Roth, Chancellor.

A New School With a Phenomenal Record: Third Session Just Closed.

The fourth school in our brotherhood in ministerial attendance. Eighty-two ministerial students enrolled last year, including five pastoral helpers. Forty-nine graduates from all departments. The following schools and colleges in successful operation:

1. College of Liberal Arts.
2. The College of the Bible.
3. Teachers' College.
4. University High School.
5. College of Business.
6. College of Music.
7. School of Oratory and Expression.
8. School of Fine Art.
9. University Hospital and Training School for Nurses.
10. Post Graduate School.

Splendid Ladies' Home, modern in all its appointments. Board at actual cost. Sixty pulpits in Oklahoma and Kansas now being filled by ministerial students. Room for as many more within easy reach of the school. Young men wanting preaching points to pay expenses, address C. C. Taylor. Send for catalog to Miss Emma F. Hartshorn, Registrar. All communications should be addressed: University Station, Enid, Okla.

Important Statement.

If young men who can preach acceptably, and wish to make further preparation for their work, would have faith enough to come here and enter school, they would be able to get preaching points in a short time. There are a hundred churches or more within reach of the school that are now ready, or could be worked up by a little effort, to support ministerial students.

Eureka College Letter

As we approach the opening of the school the prospects for a good attendance are increasing. Eureka College ought to have the best attendance for years this fall.

Many improvements have been made on Lida's Wood, the girl's boarding hall, during the summer. We are now prepared to compete with the best schools in the land in this respect. All the rooms have been refrescoed and many of them refurnished. We would like for our people who have daughters to send away to college, to give us consideration before a decision is made.

The Illinois State Convention will be held in Springfield, Sept. 12-15. A full half day is given to the cause of Christian education. Professor Arthur Holmes, of the University of Pennsylvania, will deliver the principal address, and the entire campaign committee will speak in the interest of the endowment proposition. Rev. David H. Shields, pastor of the Eureka Church, will deliver the address for the Illinois Christian Educational Association, and judging from what we have heard from Brother Shields, it will be a "hummer."

The representatives of Eureka College have returned from the Educational Congress at Winona Lake, enthusiastic over the prospects of a permanent educational association. We are glad that time has been taken to deliberate upon the matter, and we sincerely hope the meeting in Lexington, Kentucky, in February, 1911, will result in a permanent organization.

Eureka College will get $5,000 from the estate of Brother Rodney Mitchell, of Minier, who passed away during the past month. Brother Mitchell was one of the really great men of Central Illinois and has always been a good friend of Eureka College.

The Endowment Campaign is progressing. We have added quite a bit during the past month. We now have $65,000.

Men at Springfield

The annual meeting of the Illinois Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ, is at hand. We have an afternoon and evening session on Tuesday, Sept. 13, 1910, at Springfield. This is in connection with the Illinois Christian Missionary State Convention.

The program is carefully arranged and will present a well thought out plan for the entire Brotherhood movement. The three afternoon addresses will deal with "The Origin and Significance of the Brotherhood Movement," "The Relation of the State Organization to the Local and General Brotherhood," "The Practical Activities of a Local Brotherhood." Following this a Round Table and Open Parliament will furnish opportunity for the freest and widest discussion. The Brotherhood movement is in its second year and Illinois should be in the front rank among the states in this line of church activity.

At 6:00 o'clock a banquet will be served. The talks for this hour have been assigned to the national secretaries, and they will speak to our men with an uplift from their wider experience.

In the evening Dr. Arthur Holmes, of Philadelphia, will deliver the address. Every man in the Illinois churches ought to hear him.

The men in the Christian churches in Illinois should not be satisfied with less than 1,000 men at this great meeting. Let everyone who reads this begin now to get ready to come to Springfield, Sept. 13, and to talk to every man he sees about the meeting. It is a good theme for the Men's Bible Class, and should receive attention in the church announcements on Sunday morning.

H. T. SWIFT, State President.

New England Convention

The 45th annual convention of the Disciples of Christ in New England will be held at Brockton, Mass., Sept. 8 to 11, in the Wendell Ave. Congregational Church, located on Wendell Ave., between Center and Crescent streets, ten minutes' walk from the depot, or take the Center street car at the depot, and get off at Lyman street, two minutes from the church.

Pastors are requested to notify the undersigned as to the probable number of delegates expecting to attend so accommodations can be arranged. Those having delegate certificates properly signed, will be furnished lodging and breakfast free of charge throughout the convention.

Any printed matter for distribution at the convention should be sent, charges prepaid, to W. H. Wallace, 31 Elm Court, Brockton, Mass. JOHN A. GARDNER, Cor. Sec.

Our Perennial Problem

And a Passing Solution

Throughout all the years of their history the Disciples of Christ have been perplexed and confused, not to say annoyed, by one persistent question: What shall be our relationship with the various denominations of Christendom?

From the days of Alexander Campbell's Millenial Harbinger through the years of Isaac Errett's editorship of the Christian Standard and Benjamin Franklin's editorship of the Review, down to the very latest issue of the Christian Standard, the Christian Evangelist and the Christian Century, this has been the most discussed theme in the columns of the Disciple press.

It has come up in the form of discussions concerning our participation in union ministerial meetings, in union evangelistic meetings, in the application of the principles of comity on the mission field, in the Federation movement and in the attitude of our local congregations toward unimmersed members of other churches who may apply for membership with us.

The last named has been by far the most acute and persistent form in which the problem has emerged. There has always been a restlessness in the brotherhood due to an irritating sense of inconsistency between our plea for Christian unity and our denial of fellowship to the great majority of Christian people.

This restlessness has been increasing with the years, as the Disciples have come to take more seriously than they did a generation ago their plea for unity. In all parts of the brotherhood there are men—ministers and laymen—who assert that they can no longer in good conscience preach against human creeds as tests of fellowship and at the same time impose one.

In a recent issue of the Christian Century (July 7) Professor E. S. Ames, pastor of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, contributes an article reciting the history of seven years' experience in an earnest attempt to solve this paradox. Dr. Ames' plan grew out of the suggestion that churches in college communities provide a form of associate or affiliated membership for students bringing letters from their home churches. It was not thought desirable that the student should sever his responsible connection with his home church while absent only temporarily, but that he should be given a home and a status in the church of his choice, whether of his own or another denomination, in the college community. This associate membership plan was heartily endorsed by a number of Disciples, and met with the approval of at least two of our papers.

Beginning with this plan the Hyde Park Church, located in the midst of university students, has gradually extended it to include all candidates for membership who are not Disciples and who do not see their way clear to be immersed.

Dropping the title "Associate Membership" the church has adopted "Membership in the Congregation," to express the relation of fellowship into which they invite other Christian people and even those who hitherto have made no profession of religion. There are thus nominally two classes of members in the Hyde Park communion—Members of the Church and Members of the Congregation. But the distinction, Dr. Ames says, has never had any significance "except to those who have a subjective feeling about it."

Since the appearance of Dr. Ames' article we have received a number of inquiries as to The Christian Century's view of the "Membership in the Congregation" plan. The Christian Century has the deepest sympathy with the motives underlying the Hyde Park plan, but it does not seem to us to offer an adequate solution of our perennial problem. It is a plan that can be utilized successfully in such a community as that in which the Hyde Park Church is located and with such a leader as Dr. Ames, but it is incapable of general use. The average pastor would find it impossible to explain to the immersed applicant for membership that membership in the "Church" conserved all his traditional convictions, and at the same time to explain to the unimmersed applicant that there was really no significant difference between the two classes of membership.

The plan can hardly fail to impress the sophisticated as more or less of a trick. Its very complexity calls for a casuistical explanation. And it would be a constant temptation to insincerity in the minister who tried to utilize it.

In the Church of Christ simplicity and transparency are cardinal virtues. A cumbrous mechanism like this is inappropriate in an institution wearing Christ's name.

Moreover, this plan of two memberships is absolutely artificial. There is in reality no such distinction as that between the Church and Congregation. There is no church except the congregation. The church is a congregational thing. One of the New Testament truths to which the Disciples have happily accustomed themselves in their thinking is just this congregational character of the church. It is doubtful if the full significance and value of this insight has been appreciated, however, even by the Disciples, and any shuffling of words that will make a distinction between church and congregation is every way to be deplored.

Furthermore, Dr. Ames' statement of the Hyde Park plan for union is weakened by the connection which he makes between it and the practice of baptism. "Among the Disciples," he says, "there is a growing realization of the futility of advocating union on the basis of immersion." He goes on to quote the utterances of the distinguished layman at the Centennial convention who argued that the churches which practice three methods are nearer right than we who practice immersion only.

The Christian Century believes the Disciples of Christ are right in their practice of baptism. Therefore the proposal to receive non-Christians into a so-called Congregation between which and the Church proper there is no difference "except to those who have a subjective feeling about it," is one which we cannot approve.

Finally, there is in the Hyde Park plan an evident conservative purpose which is in itself admirable. Those who know Dr. Ames know his loyalty to the Disciples. There is a strong vein of conservatism in his nature, despite his radical reputation. We opine that the conservative motive played as great a part in creating this device for practicing Christian union as did the radical motive.

But therein is the weakness of the plan. The Hyde Park Church wishes to remain a Disciple church and yet practice Christian union in some real fashion. So it ingeniously devises a scheme which will allow the larger liberty and at the same time conserve the traditions. It undertakes to keep itself conservative by a "plan."

But conservatism is to be maintained not by devices but by principles. The Christian Century believes that the simple principle of Christian union is one which may be absolutely trusted without any protective device whatever. This single ideal of practicing Christian union has in it conservative implications which neither the conservative Disciple nor the radical has yet discovered. Probably but few conservative Disciples would object to the freest practice of Christian union if they once perceived the limits which the highest devotion to that ideal would impose. And quite certainly the radical would see that such devices as this at Hyde Park are not only superfluous but positively in the way.

The Christian Century holds that any solution of the Disciples' paradox that is based upon a "plan" however ingeniously devised is a passing solution, a mere makeshift. The solution that will really solve will be based upon principle, and this principle will be fundamental enough to be trusted without fear that it will trick us into the surrender of those things of conscience which constitute Christ's authority in us.

Chapters from a Travel Journal

An Afternoon Tea

Not the least interesting of my experiences in Scotland was the privilege of stating the position of the Disciples of Christ to eager minds unprejudiced by either the errors or the misinterpretation of our hundred years of history in America. Very few people in that very religious country know who the Disciples are or what they are trying to do. Often the most intelligent of persons would not have even heard of them. In some cases the title "Campbellite" would awaken a gleam of recognition in my interlocutor's face. But I used this device only in extreme cases, partly on account of the instinctive aversion I feel for the title, an aversion bred in me from the cradle, and partly on account of the misconception and prejudice I felt sure the word would arouse if it conveyed any meaning at all.

As a rule, I found both ministers and laymen very inquiring and attentive while I put forward the plea for union which the Disciples represent. And in no case did my words meet with indifference. There has been so much talk of Christian union in Scotland, and so much has actually been done there for union, that any person pleading for the extension of the union idea throughout all evangelical Christendom is sure of a respectful, if not eager, hearing. Besides, the Edinburgh Conference was urging union every day. The theme was in the air.

On an afternoon in Edinburgh my host and hostess and "their delegate" were invited to one of those Scotch functions known as an afternoon tea, of which we enjoyed so many during our stay there. This time we were invited to the beautiful home of Professor W. P. Paterson, of the department of Divinity, the University of Edinburgh. Dr. Paterson had been one of the "big" speakers of the Conference, having a few nights before delivered a great address on the "Uniqueness of Christianity Among the World's Religions." I had met him on one or two occasions, but had as yet no opportunity of conversation.

After the greeting amenities were over, Professor Paterson asked me if I were a Presbyterian. I assured him that I had not progressed that far yet in ecclesiastical status, and in reply to his further inquiry I said that I was as yet only a Christian or a Disciple of Christ.

"And to what religious body do you belong?" he asked.

"To the Disciples of Christ," I replied.

"'The Disciples of Christ.' I never heard of them—that is, as a separate denomination. What are the tenets of your people? Are you the same as the Bible Christians?"

"Well," I said, "we surely wish to be Bible Christians, but probably in no sense that would distinguish us from you Presbyterians or any other Christians. I suppose all of us believe the Bible and are striving to be true to its teachings as we understand them. I am not acquainted with the sect you call "Bible Christians," but I am quite sure the Disciples, as a distinctive movement, are not identical with them. We have very few congregations in England, and I do not know of one in Scotland." (At that time I was not informed of the presence of two congregations of our Conservative or British Brethren, right there in Edinburgh, and of a considerable number scattered throughout Scotland.)

"You, I suppose, are the only delegate of your denomination in this Missionary Conference," Professor Paterson continued.

"By no means," I answered. "We have, I think, nearly thirty delegates, and there must be forty-five or fifty Disciples in attendance at the Conference, most of them from America."

"Is that true? Then your people must be more numerous in America than in England, to warrant such a representation here."

"Yes, indeed," I responded with characteristic Disciple eagerness, for besides being glad to inform him of our rapid growth and formidable size, I felt that a discussion of the doctrinal aspect of things would be somewhat awkward at an afternoon tea, especially when my host had his hands full entertaining many other guests. So I told him that the Disciples numbered about a million and a third in the United States, ranking about equal to the Presbyterians in size and twice as large as the Congregationalists. He was amazed. I went on to tell him of our marvelous growth in missionary giving and intelligence in the past twenty-five years, how that we now give a million dollars a year for the propagation of the gospel beyond our local parishes.

"Well, now, that is strange," he said, "that there should be so large a denomination in America and I have never even heard of it. You must tell me what your creed is, what are the doctrines you teach, and your polity."

I began with the easiest first, saying that in organization we were like Congregationalists and Baptists, each local congregation being the unit of authority with no episcopate or presbytery above it.

"Yes, and what of your creed, your doctrines," he persisted. I saw that I could not escape the theological point, even if it were "talking shop." I had not yet fully appreciated the avidity with which these Scotch people talked theology. I listened furtively to another group of guests and, catching a word or two, concluded that they were discussing religious doctrine, so I reassured myself and studiedly made my reply.

"The Disciples do not have any creed, in the sense that you Presbyterians do," I said. "We make no further test of fellowship than faith in Christ, and we have no special articles to which candidates for the ministry must subscribe. If you were to ask me concerning the theological temper and spirit of the Disciples, I think I would characterize them as a liberal-evangelical people. They hold with all the evangelical denominations to the accepted verities of Christian experience, and are intensely evangelistic. They refuse, however, to fix these verities in a formal creed to be bound upon all Christians, holding rather that each individual guided by the Spirit of God is capable of and responsible for formulating his own creed from the data of the Holy Scriptures and his own experience. On this account the Disciples are a liberal people, progressively re-stating divine truth from time to time, as fresh light breaks from the Word of God. They are an open-minded people, not afraid of a teacher of new truth, but rather welcoming him, and possessing few if any heretics."

"That is very interesting, very interesting, indeed," said the Professor, as he excused himself to greet another guest. I thought the demands of the social hour would claim him and that our conversation about the Disciples had ended. So, as I was passed from guest to guest in introduction, I kept regretting that I had allowed the form of his question—his use of the word "creed"—to determine the form of my answer, instead of just starting out with the flat statement that the Disciples were the company of those who believed in Christian union and strove to practice it. I felt that the fragment of an answer I had given would be misleading, implying, as it would, that the Disciples were just another sect separated from the rest by some a priori objection to creedal formulas. It was a cause of satisfaction, therefore, when my host came up to me a few moments later and said that he had been thinking of what I had said and wondered in what respect we would differ from the Congregationalists.

"In our individual faith we are much like the Congregationalists," I replied, "as much like them, perhaps, as any denomination, unless it be the Baptists. But no comparison of the Disciples with any denomination does justice to their fundamental and essential character. I feared a moment ago that my statement would not be clear, for I gave you what you asked for: the position of the Disciples on the question of creed. But that is not fundamental with us. We are not a doctrinal people essentially, but a practical people. It is in our practical purpose that our distinctiveness is to be found. We are deeply interested in the union of all Christians. We believe it is possible in the present state of religious thought for at least the leading evangelical bodies to become one. We have, therefore, laid upon our conscience our Lord's prayer for unity and we have determined that we will strive to practice this unity ourselves and persuade others to practice it. It is in line with this practical purpose that we wear no divisive name, impose no divisive creed, and practice no divisive ordinance or ritual. We therefore do not conceive ourselves as a denomination at all, but an illustration of the common denominator to which all must come who would coöperate in answering our Lord's prayer."

"You are the Church, then," he interposed, somewhat restlessly, but not offensively, with a good-natured twinkle in his stern eye. I had had to screw up my courage quite consciously to assert to one of Scotland's greatest theologians that a religious body of over a million people, with organized machinery of all sorts, was not a denomination.

"By no means," I replied, positively. "We are only a small and humble part of the church. We believe Presbyterians and Congregationalists and the rest are just as truly Christians as ourselves, and their churches just as truly churches of Christ as our own. Our reason for refusing to be classed as a denomination is not that we think ourselves better than the rest, but that we believe denominationalism is a sin, and wish to do all we can to break it down and bring all Christ's people into one body, in which all denominational distinctions will have disappeared. Ideally, all denominational distinctions have disappeared from us. You will mark that I say "ideally." For it is not easy to bring our practice up to our purpose. But we strive ever that we may attain that goal where in the fullest sense we may practice Christian union."

Our talk continued for several minutes further, during which, I must say in justice to myself, I allowed my friend to have more "say" than my report above would indicate to be his proportion. He was much interested in the problem of union and told me of a joint commission on union representing the Established Church of Scotland, of which, of course, he was a member, and the United Free Church, which was soon to sit and discuss the possibility of uniting the whole of Scotch Presbyterianism. Afterward, seeing that other guests were claiming him, he took me into a little group the center of which was an elderly lady of apparently extraordinary intelligence. She was, if I am not mistaken, an aunt or some other relation of the Professor's.

"Here is a gentleman," said Dr. Paterson, after the introductions, "who belongs to a church as large as the Presbyterian church in the United States, and almost as large as both the Free and the Established churches of Scotland put together, and I, a professor of Divinity, never heard of the church before!"

"What is the name of the church?" asked the elderly lady at the center.

"The Disciples of Christ," he answered. "Did you ever hear of the Disciples of Christ?"

"No, I confess I never did, and I shall be right glad to have you tell me about your denomination," she said, looking at me.

"Well," interposed Professor Paterson, "I want you to ask Mr. Morrison all the questions you can about the Disciples, if I have not already exhausted his patience."

Before either I had time to reassure him on that point or he to turn to leave us, a lady in the group spoke up in a Yankee drawl, "Why, I guess I know who you mean by the Disciples of Christ. We call them 'Campbellites' in our country."

I had time only to ask her what her country was and she to reply, "Virginia, in the United States," when my attention was drawn to the transformations chasing themselves across the Professor's face. CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

The House of God and the Presence of Christ

"Heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have builded." The notion that the house of God was the actual dwelling-place of the deity prevailed in ancient time. The inspired teachers of Israel knew a God too great for any earthly house. They spoke contemptuously of the temple at Jerusalem when the unspiritual Israelites made of it a fetich that protected them from destruction at the hands of the great world powers. Even in the time of Jesus the Jew felt that God was nearer to him at Jerusalem than at any other place, and the Samaritan believed that God had his special seat on Mt. Gerizim. Jesus showed that it was the heart in which God dwelt, rather than in buildings of wood and stone.

The house of God for the Christian is the place of assembly. It is built with reference to the accommodation of the worshipper. God is found wherever men meet for instruction and inspiration. The holy places of the earth are those at which the saints have wrought righteousness and have worshipped God. And those are holy because of their power to suggest noble thought. God is not partial to them. He will show himself where no sanctuary has ever been if the right sort of persons are gathered in the name of Jesus. The groves are still God's temples for those who have eyes to see the glory of God and hearts that revere creative energy. To carouse under the shade of great trees is sacreligious as much as it would be in a cathedral.

In the house of God the children receive training. Jesus loved them. We cannot think of him at present in any church that has no welcome for the children. In his youth the temple was to him the Father's house. He was pleased to go to it and to talk of the questions of religion. God was not for him a distant and awful Being, but a Friend and Companion. In any building dedicated to his religion, there is profound reverence for the holiness and majesty of God, but the essentially pagan terror of the Almighty is banished. The blood of barbarian ancestors runs in our veins and we need the gentleness and the restraining influence of Jesus to make us worthy teachers of children.

The presence of Christ is indicated by the democracy of the church. The democracy of Christ levels up, not down. It increases intelligence, self-respect and hope. There are some men who seem to think that the way to democracy is to disregard the ideals that humanity has formulated for itself with the agony of centuries and to drop back to the life of beasts. But that means the rule of brute strength. It means the loss of the intelligence of which these lovers of liberty boast. The democracy of the church is that of common aspiration and mutual aid. It is not a gift, it is an achievement. The church itself has only faint glimpses of what it really is. Yet such is the power of Christ that few companies of people calling themselves by his name are entirely destitute of the democratic spirit.

If Christ is in the midst of a group of worshippers, they are learning what justice and mercy are. Competition in business and in labor tends to harden the heart and to exalt the dollar standard of manhood. It is hard for us to recognize the human in the competitor. We utter words about a rival that would sound well in the mouth of the ancient avenger of blood on the track of the murderer of a relative. If the church has the spirit of Christ, it is able to remind us of what is due to one man from another, regardless of business, social, and political rivalries. In the presence of Christ we have our eyes opened to the needs of the other man. We discover that he, like ourselves, has sorrow and a sense of failure, and when we know him, we have no desire to add to his burdens.

The house of God is a center of optimism. Christ encourages men to face the facts. His disciples are not blind to the sin and sorrow of the world. They probably have a better appreciation of both than any other class of men. Their optimism is of a nobler sort than that of ignorant innocence. It is born of faith in the wisdom and goodness of God. It survives defeat and ridicule. The disciple is aware that the world may be on the road to spiritual victory, even if his particular schemes do not succeed. The ignorant optimist demands the success of his little plan and renounces God if the universe is bigger than he is.

Song

By Grace Agnes Timmerman.

Sunlight smiles where the rose is blowing,
Soft is the hymn of the waters flowing,
Blithe the sweep of the free winds blowing—
(Sweet is life, and long!)
Swift the hours, and their gifts are golden;
Good is all our eyes beholden;
Care, that pales to a memory olden,
Slain by a wild bird's song.

Soon, too soon, will the light be waning,
Breath nor bloom of the rose remaining,
Winds and waves of their loss complaining—
(Sad is life, and brief!)
Summer's dream but a vanished glory,
Summer's tale but an ended story,
All her wealth, when the fields are hoary,
Only a withered leaf! —The Circle

GOLD DUST.

It is not the deed we do,
Though the deed be never so fair,
But the love that the dear Lord looketh for,
Hidden with lowly care
In the heart of the deed so fair.

The love is the priceless thing,
The treasure our treasure must hold,
Or ever the Lord will take the gift,
Or tell the worth of the gold
By the love that cannot be told.

Behold us, the rich and the poor,
Dear Lord, in thy service draw near;
One consecrateth a precious coin,
One droppeth only a tear;
Look, Master, the love is here!

"Turning Sands into Gold"

"Ownership turns sands into gold" said Sir Arthur Young in writing of Ireland's troubles one hundred and twenty-five years ago. The modern publicist, Sydney Brooks, who has studied the Irish problem closely for English and American journals, says, "Ireland's only hope is the Irish people cultivating the Irish soil." Lord Dunraven, a landlord, a Protestant and a Conservative, says Englishmen can never understand the Irish temperament in such an intimate way as to rule them equitably and that the two nationalities, because of the difference in temperament, can no more mix politically than can oil and water. He looks to ownership as a solvent.

Ireland's main trouble, since the repeal of the Penal Laws,—whereby Catholic Irishmen were deprived of the right to own soil, to practice their religion openly, to vote, and of every other freedom—has been more economic than political. Before their repeal the Irish Catholic was treated as Russia treats the Jews of the Pale. Since their repeal he has been, little by little, given every right possessed by English citizens as a subject of the United Kingdom and has home rule in all local, municipal and county matters. He needs today but to propose a sound basis for Home Rule to be given a provincial legislature. So long as he insists upon disunion he will never receive it but English public opinion is ready to grant him a local legislature with autonomous local powers. The Scotch radicals are beginning to demand the same for their land. To an American it looks reasonable for each province to have a legislature for purely local affairs while Parliament cares for imperial affairs. Gladstone, ever humanity's friend, the one statesman who in a marked way discharged all his state duties as a Christian before all considerations of policy, was instrumental in bringing Ireland many boons of freedom. None of them was more valuable than the one that put her under the same franchise laws as was England and thereby added two hundred thousand to her voting power and so increased her representation at Westminister that her Nationalist party could and did even defeat Liberal policies. But to the Grand Old Man right was right and the question was less about immediate and personal results than about what was right.

The Cause of Irish Poverty

The question of Home Rule was linked to that of Land Purchase by the genius of Michael Davitt. Davitt was a genial, brilliant Irishman of very radical temperament. He had no hope for the righting of any Irish wrong but by force, and thus lay many years in prison because of his advocacy of it. It must be sadly acknowledged that one finds few changes made in Irish policy at any other time than after some form of force, or trouble-making, had made peace under the old regime impossible. Special privilege is tenacious of its "rights" and no Bourbon surrenders until the flood has engulfed him. Special Privilege in the form of landlordism has been the bane of Ireland for seven and one-half centuries. It did not fix its tentacles tightly until in the days of Cromwell though Elizabeth did much to cast its dread form across the land. Cromwell brought the rebellious and freedom loving chieftains under the yoke by his fearful reprisals of slaughter. He razed cities and literally followed the Old Testament example of dashing the heads of their little ones against the stone. He massacred thousands, put the land under martial law, confiscated property from Derry to Cork and parcelled it out among his faithful lieutenants. Thus came the real beginning of landlordism in Ireland—an absentee landlordism that has skimmed the cream from Irish economic life these centuries and left her to feed on the blue milk of poverty.

"All the Traffic Will Bear"

It was the alienation of the soil that brought Irish poverty; It is the restoring of ownership that is "turning sands into gold" and will in time heal the wounds and make her a loyal factor in the affairs of Great Britain. The real enemies of Britain have not been the Irish but the landlords. They have been the anomaly in British politics that has denied to freedom-loving Ireland the rights that have been accorded freedom-loving England.

The policy of landlordism has been that of "all the traffic will bear." If a holding increased in earning power because of the industry of the tenant the rent was increased. If the farmer found how to increase the productive power of the soil, how to make cattle pay better than potatoes, how to rotate crops, or how to plant a little orchard and increase income—the landlord raised the rent. If he drained a bog, cleared up a stony patch, exchanged oats for flax, built a little neighborhood blacksmith shop for odd working hours—the landlord raised the rent. If he added a room or a story to his cabin, built an extra hedge, exchanged his thatch for tile, erected an extra outhouse or in any way by his own labor and out of his own earnings increased the value of the farm—the landlord raised the rent. If his sons grew up and found work in the neighborhood or went to sea while their families stayed behind or did anything else that they could do by building a cabin as a home for wife and children on the father's life long holding—the landlord raised the rent. If crops were extra good for a series of years, if the farmer found that by the help of growing children he could work away from home, if the Department of Agriculture taught how to increase income by extra cultivation or any one of many methods science knows, if anything added to Pat's income—the landlord raised the rent. His policy was "all the traffic will bear." He "was not there for his health" and "business was business" with him. Thus all Ireland was cursed with "rack-rent" and a black hate of England and rebellion was ever rife and "coercion" became a governmental policy under even a Gladstone who felt law must be respected even though most of the laws were bad.

Undoing the Wrongs of the Past

Today England is trying to undo the wrongs of the past. She is turning out the landlords and she is taking the "rack-rent" out when she sells the tenant his little farm—as we shall see in a later article. The story of her efforts for Ireland's weal is as heartening as the story of landlord tyranny is disheartening. There are no annals written of any such stupendous governmental enterprise for social well-being since time began. What the French got by revolution and what the Irish would fain have battled for in the same way, England is today granting by her historic methods of evolution. The story is full of anomalies and strange survivals of things ancient, of systems within systems, of burdens that seem great and useless, of painfully slow processes, of Irish impatience and English impassivity, of irritating precedents that hinder and burden, but it all belongs to evolution and the slower processes of progress that build up the new without first so shattering the old that the foundations of order are shaken. It is a fascinating story and we will try to tell it later.

Here we wish to give a concrete illustration of how "ownership turns sands into gold." It is a concrete ilustration of the effectiveness of Land Purchase. It is a story that marks the difference in the course of two streams. The difference is not so great as we stand at their sources as it is when we see their directions. The one flows away toward a marsh, stagnant, fetid and death-dealing; the other flows away towards green meadows and rich valleys where contentment sings her songs of peace and plenty.

The Story of Two Estates

It is the story of two estates, lying side by side. The conditions are practically the same on them and their history dates back to Cromwell's days. They have both borne their share of burdens and told their like stories of poverty, oppression, "rack-rent," famine and misery. Today one is telling the tale of promise while the other is yet under bondage to the old era of toil without hope, though hope is dawning for it through the promise of action by the authorities. Each have sent their sons and daughters, their best blood, to America. Both are peopled today by the aged and the young with but few young men and matrons. The children and those with silver in their hair toil on, both for their poor sustenance; but for the children hope dawns and on the morrow many of them will remain in the land that is loved fervently by a greater number of expatriates than any other in the world. And all the difference lies in the fact that on one "Irishmen are now working Irish soil" as their own free right, with the profit applied toward making the land their own; and on the other they are toiling on with the hope that the government will soon intercede to compel their landlord to sell them the land on which they and their forefathers have toiled for centuries while another has lived in luxury off their toil.

"Look on This Picture—

The first is the Bantry Estate. It lies along Bantry Bay, as fair a sheet of water as indents a verdant shore. Some writer has said that were it on the Mediterranean or along the English Coast it would be the trysting place of two continents. Cromwell gave it to a trooper who had performed valorous deeds in his Irish campaign. The hero started to walk across the island to lay claim to his prize. The roads were rough and the weather variable and some two days journey before arriving he met a farmer from the island that lies just off Glengariff in the Bay and who told him the place was but a rock that goats fed upon and worthless for farming. This farmer was a man by the name of White. He was carrying wheat to a distant mill and offered the trooper his horse for a return to Dublin in place of his sore feet, and the corn for money to pay his way; so the trooper turned over to the thrifty native his deed and claim. In the late troubles with Napoleon the French sent a fleet to this harbor and the White who then held the estate lit the signal fires on all the hills and warned the English force. For this he was made a peer, taking the name of the Bay and thus came the title Lord Bantry. Today the nephew of the late Lord Bantry, one Leigh White, owns some one hundred thousand acres along that shore. It is rocky and mountainous but vast and would be profitable for the grazing of sheep. But cattle are more profitable on the rich lowland pastures and men are more profitable on the rocky mountainous uplands in Ireland, and when the landed heritage of a people is surrendered to a few as a private domain it may be expected that it will be turned to the greatest profit, though men be sent to the goat-fields while the farms are delivered to cattle.

On this estate the people live in hovels. A few years ago Lord Bantry had a guest from London. In the interstices of time between hunting trips this gentlemen took quiet walks to the homes of the tenants. When he returned to London he wrote to his erstwhile host offering him two thousand pounds if he would live only two weeks in one of the hovels he provided for his people. The offer was not accepted—nor was the hint sufficient to bring any improvement. The traveler must go on foot to visit these tenant's cabins for they are in the very nooks and crannies of the rocks where the garden patches are made by rock dams across the ravines. Little groups of cabins cluster here and there along the roadways and stony by-paths. Here and there the stony soil stretches out into a broader field but the stone huts are no better, for the rent is just so much higher. We visited one cabin in which lived a poor widow and her two children. She had been evicted and the parish priest had collected enough to build her a miserable hut by the road. It had but one room, low eaves and no floor, and was only eight by twelve feet in size. There the poor woman lay ill in her filthy bed with her ragged children "keeping house" by means of some tin cans, an old pot, a box and a cheap unpainted table. Here we found houses with no windows, and fields only goats could climb, but rent was paid for it all and women and children labored for it while the bread winner spent the profitable months in the Welsh mines.

There was no hope in the people's faces and no enterprise in their activities. There was no profit from their labors and bare existence was all they could expect when times were favorable. They lived as their forbears had lived for two hundred years, and sons in America were piecing out the incomes in many a cabin. The parish priest told us he was unable to get one of them to make an improvement. He was chairman of the board that is empowered to make gifts for the betterment of the homes, but none on this estate would profit by it. They had no traditions of ever doing anything better but that the rent would be raised, and now they thought that should they improve it would but be charged up to them when the Land Commission finally compels the sale of the holdings to them. In a word this was a sample of the Old Ireland, the Ireland of the old landlord regime.

—And Now on This"

Now let us climb over The Esk and see the other side of the picture. It was Sunday morning and we hoped to get to the little country church just over the line in County Kerry in time for mass and for an after chat with the priest, who cares for that congregation and this one at Glengariff. It is a coach road constructed by the government and worn smooth by tourist travel. We pass the village church, crowded to the doors and out onto the walks in front. The climb leads us through as beautiful scenery as could charm the eye and please the senses. Far below, the little brook dashes and ripples along, the yellow furze is radiant on the hedge-rows by the roadside and the birds make the cool June morning musical with their melodies. Up we climb until a path leaves the road for a short cut over The Esk. An old man joins us for the climb and tells the eternal sad story. His children are all in America, his wife has gone on before, and he has but to wait as best he can with only a shelter over his head and a pittance from his daughters who are working folk with families of their own in The States. But he thinks, "It is God's will, sir" and is patient as well as thankful for the "tupence" given him, "for it will buy me a little baccy, sir, and baccy is very high of late."

We are too late for the mass but not for a lunch with the sober-faced, rosy-cheeked parish priest. He was a man of intelligence and seemed to bear the weight of his peoples sins and sorrows. Of what he had to tell us later mention must reveal. but he pointed out from the height on which his parish manse stood a score of houses that had profited by the cottage fund spoken of, and told with good heart of the improvements that purchase had brought to the homes on this estate. This was the Landsdowne Estate. It belonged to the Lord Landsdowne who is now Conservative leader in the House of Peers. It consists of 120,000 acres and for years the noble Lord has drawn an annual stipend of over $400,000 from Ireland. Six years ago it was purchased by the Land Commission under the terms of the Wyndham Act and is now being paid for by the tenants. The other side of the picture is in heartening contrast to that seen on the Bantry side. Here cabins have become cottages. Floors are being laid, roofs are being changed from thatch to tile, the one and two rooms grow to three, a story is added, the manure heaps are removed from the doors, the hedges are repaired, the roadways are in better condition, the fields are cleaner, the crops are being rotated and the cattle are being improved. Everybody wears a hopeful and cheery look. One farmer even expressed doubt about the necessity for Home Rule—since he had his own miniature home rule on his little holding. Here the stream flowing toward the rich meadows had reached the first fertile soil on the mountain side at least and one could see in the people's faces that it was to be a stream of prosperity for them as the years go on and the results of ownership gathered profits into their garner and brought gold out of the sands. The children will no longer go to America as a matter of course but stay to improve the mother country by their industry and independence. Here mere existence has ceased and real living has begun. This is New Ireland in the signs of its promise.

In our next issue we will tell of a trip through the lowlands and a visit to an Irish fair.

Death

By the Right Rev. William Croswell Doane.

We are too stupid about death. We will not learn
How it is wages paid to those who earn,
How it is the gift for which on earth we yearn,
To be set free from bondage to the flesh;
How it is turning seed-corn into grain,
How it is winning Heaven's eternal gain,
How it means freedom evermore from pain,
How it untangles every mortal mesh.

We are selfish about death. We count our grief
Far more than we consider their relief
Whom the great Reaper gathers in the sheaf,
No more to know the seasons' constant change;
And we forget that it means only life,
Life with all joy, peace, rest, and glory rife,
The victory won, and ended all the strife,
And Heaven no longer far away or strange.

Their Lent is over, and their Easter won,
Waiting till over paradise the sun
Shall rise in majesty, and life begun
Shall grow in glory, as the perfect day
Moves on, to hold its endless, deathless sway.

—The Outlook.

Truth

To thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.

A Visit to the Mission Field

Letter Number One from the Foreign Society's Secretary

Enroute: Cincinnati to San Francisco.

This visit embraces all the mission stations we have in pagan lands, except Batang, on the border of Tibet. The trip was begun July 24, in company with Mrs. Rains A brief call at St. Louis and Moberly, Mo., enabled us to greet relatives and friends. At Keytesville, Mo., we stopped one day with my aged father who lives on a farm. He moved from Kentucky to Missouri before I was grown. Father is seventy-eight years of age, in good health, cheerful and busy. He has been a faithful member of the Christian church for fifty-six years. William Garratt, one of the pioneers, baptised him in 1854, the year in which I was born. Samuel Rogers, one of the heroes of the reformation, was doing the preaching This good man was the father of W. C Rogers, Cameron, Mo., and also of the lamented and gifted John I. Rogers, both able preachers. Seventeen years after my father's baptism in a small stream known as Grassey Run in Grant County, Ky., I was baptized at the same place by W. K. Asbill of Columbia, Ky. My father helped to plant a number of churches in that county.

When we reached Kansas City, Secretary E W. Allen of the Foreign Society, who resides here, met us in company with his wife and showed us kindness. He is a strong advocate of missions and is ready to serve the churches to the utmost. His good record as a missionary pastor is well known. Already he is being kept quite busy by the managers of conventions, by the church and in rallies.

A short stop at Waco, Texas, enabled us to be present at the marriage of our oldest son, Ernest. Here it was a pleasure to shake hands with E. E. Faris, who, in company with Dr. H. N. Biddle, opened our great mission station at Bolenge, Africa.

We must needs pass through San Antonio where Hugh McLellan late of Richmond, Ky., ministers We remained a day. He and his good church showed us great kindness. This is a mighty city. This is a mighty city. We have three churches here now. Brother McLellan has just started one. I miss my guess if our cause does not make great advances here in the next few years. It was a pleasure to meet friends of other places and other days. Dr. Kline of Houston, Texas, met me here for a conference looking to the mission field as a medical missionary. He is fine timber, indeed. He is a man of good body, clear head and a warm heart. It is joy to find such a man ready to devote himself to world-wide field. After one or two years of special preparation he will no doubt go far hence to the heathen

This was my first visit to El Paso. For many years it has been my purpose to visit this church so near a foreign land. P. J. Rice, late of Minneapolis, Minn., is the preacher. He is planning for another church and a new building. This church is a living-link in the Foreign Society and is growing in all usefulness. It gives $1,000 to missions this year besides wiping out all indebtedness. Here I had the pleasure of meeting Professor W. E. Garrison, who is president of the State College of New Mexico. He wields a fine influence for our cause in this new and growing country. F. F. Grim, the secretary of New Mexico, was in El Paso meeting with the board of missions, located in and near this city. He is planning for larger things in that new state. I heard only words of praise of the man and his work. This is the home of Mrs. W. K. Homan, whose husband did so much for our cause in Texas. It will be remembered her daughter is the wife of E. E. Faris, and she also spent a time in Bolenge, Africa. Dr Robert Homan and other sons of Mr. and Mrs W. K. Homan reside here and are helpful to the cause. W. [illegible] young son of T. R. Byrau, treasurer of the board of Church Extension, also resides here. He married a sister of B. A. Jenkins of Kansas City. This is a charming Christian home. W H was a little boy when I went to Winfield, Kansas, in 1880, to preach for the church. His father was one of the elders. And like his father his home is the preacher's home. There is a bright outlook for our work in all Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and all the great and growing southwest. The Texas brethren are doing well in their work, but they could wisely place ten dollars in the hands of J. C. Mason and the Texas state board where they now expend one. We can take the new states if our A. C. M. S. is enabled to enlarge the evangelistic force. I was pleased to learn that this society is dealing generously with New Mexico.

Our next stop was Long Beach, Cal. The annual convention of southern California was in session. It was a great gathering. A. C. Smither presided well. He knows how. F. W. Emerson is the new but popular and efficient secretary. He succeeded Grant K. Lewis, now of the A. C. M. S. The number of churches in southern California is only seventy-one all told. But they do things! They have a membership of 13,504. They are served by sixty pastors. Last year these seventy-one churches raised $32,495 for missions or $459 from each church! What do you think of that? And this does not include a number of personal gifts. These seventy-one churches gave $8,765 for foreign missions, or an average of $123. This is a company of great disciples in southern California. They are growing in all the elements of true greatness. Peter Ainslie, president of the A. C. M. S., was the chief speaker this year. He won all hearts. He spoke a number of times to the profit and delight of all. The brethren pressed me in for two addresses. Time would fail to mention all the old friends I met here.

From Long Beach I pressed on to San Francisco, where I was booked to speak in the First Church, August 7. This is the church served by Frank L. Ford for the past fourteen years.

The evening of August the 10th the churches in San Francisco and about the bay gave us a farewell reception at the West Side Church. It was to us a very delightful occasion. H. O. Breeden is serving the church for a short time while resting from a great evangelistic campaign. He presided. Quite a number of pastors and others spoke. About seventeen years ago, when H. O. Breeden was serving the Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, that church became a living-link in the Foreign Society, our first living-link church, and Professor H. H. Guy was the first living-link missionary. It was interesting to have both of these brethren present at this meeting. They cheered all our hearts. How the living-link plan has grown in these years! There are now more than 125. H. O. Breeden and the church he served so long planned wiser than they thought. There are great things for almost any church when there is faith and vision and daring. Dr. Breeden has led a number of churches into the living-link rank in his evangelistic labors. Nor does his interest stop here. He is hoping to make a visit to all our mission stations in foreign lands.

Good word comes from the office of the Foreign Society in Cincinnati. I beseech the friends to stand by the great work. A. McLean, president, S. J. Corey, secretary, and C. W. Plopper, treasurer, are all men tried and true. They walk in the garments of white every day. They need and deserve the cordial support of every friend of the gospel in all lands. To help them is to help the 170 men and women who are at the distant parts of the earth. There is no more efficient organization in the world than our own Foreign Society. It is a word power. Its business methods are almost perfect. Its standing in the business community of Cincinnati is the highest. Its splendid history and record is founded upon the lives and leadership of a great host of intelligent consecrated preachers and churches. The executive committee is composed of twelve as true and faithful men as live. Help them to reach $400,000 this year. And then set the mark at $500,000 for 1911 and reach it while I am away. The Lord bless all who seek to extend his gospel to every creature.

A Square Deal for the Horse

A square deal for the horse is the petition which the Western Pennsylvania Humane society has put into a fervent equine prayer, and has posted in stables all over the city of Pittsburg. It reads in part as follows: "To thee, my master, I offer my prayer:

"Feed me, water and care for me, and when the day's work is done, provide me with shelter, a clean, dry bed and a stall wide enough for me to lie down in comfort. Talk to me. Your voice means as much to me as the reins. Pet me sometimes, that I may serve you the more gladly and learn to love you. Do not jerk the reins, and do not whip me when going up hill. Never strike, beat, or kick me when I do not understand what you want, but give me a chance to understand you. Watch me, and if I fail to do your bidding, see if something is not wrong with my harness or feet. Examine my teeth when I do not eat. I may have an ulcerated tooth, and that, you know, is very painful. Do not tie my head in an unnatural position, or take away my best defense against flies and mosquitoes by cutting off my tail.

"And finally, oh my master, when my useful strength is gone, do not turn me out to starve or freeze or sell me to some cruel owner, to be slowly tortured and starved to death; but do thou, my master, take my life in the kindest way and your God will reward you here and hereafter."

Our Readers' Opinions

Heresy! Heresy!! Heresy!!!

I am not a heresy hunter. I am something of a heretic myself. But there is a bit of sure enough heresy in the usually sound columns of The Christian Century, so gross, that I cannot permit the utterance to pass without a word of correction.

This heretical utterance is on page 8 (670) of August 11, 1910, under the caption, "Is There Room?"

The following words are unworthy of the pen of one who bears the name of a prophet of Jehovah—unworthy of a scribe instructed in the things of the kingdom. The following objectionable language is quoted: "He does not believe what we believe."

Now, the New Testament certainly teaches that the object of Christian faith is a person.

Paul said: "I know him whom I have believed. Whom, not what! Jesus said to a man who was born blind: "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" Faith in a person. To the affrighted prison-keeper in Philippi two servants of the Most High God said: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." This personal faith is a fundamental condition of salvation. The Christian faith is personal, not doctrinal. The question usually propounded to candidates for baptism, by the Disciples of Christ, has to do with the belief of the applicant in a person, "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life." Believeth on him. Whom, not what. "He does not believe what we believe!" Does he believe in him in whom we believe? This is a more pertinent statement or inquiry.

Here is another bad thought. "How an honorable man can occupy a pulpit in any religious body and live on the money of that people while he cannot believe and preach that for which they pay their money, is an unsolved problem."

This insinuation is on a low plane. It is thoroughly and degradingly commercial. The writer of this sentence may be a hireling. He may serve in the ministry for pay. He may receive pay for preaching what the people want. It is said that "business is business." This is low down business. It misrepresents the ministry as a whole.

I am not on that level. I do not belong to that fellowship. I do not receive financial "pay." I am under no contract obligation to please any person, or company of people on earth. I spurn the insinuation, for myself and my brethren, with scorn. I am in partnership with Jesus Christ, I am doing business with and for him. I am not in the service of any sect, or party, or cult, or denomination, or "movement," known among men. I am the Lord's freeman, nor do I speak for myself alone. I live in Denver and serve the people of Denver, as I have opportunity, without reference to creed, color, or condition. Those who are served out of gratitude provide food and raiment for the servant—these and nothing more. Having food and raiment I am content. Now is this a novelty in my experience? It is, with me a life long custom. The Lord has, through the gratitude of the people, and their reasonable generosity, which he has inspired, kept me, all these years without an anxious thought or contract.

The scribe, whose sectarian fulminations is the immediate occasion of this writing, seems to "have it in" for some person who appears to be out of harmony with somebody's notions as to the manner in which the dismembered fragments of Christ's holy church will ultimately be joined together in harmony with the evident desire of the Head of the Body.

Well? What of it? Is the question of just how, that is, in what manner, according to what program, Christian unity and union are to be effected to be made a test of fellowship?

This is one of the most difficult problems, at present before the church. Is there no room for an honest difference of opinion on this great question, among those who truly believe to the saving of the soul?

To assume such a position is to take the stand of the narrowest kind of a narrow sectarian.

The problem of the reunion of Christendom has not been solved, the matter is under consideration. There is room for differences of opinion. The outlook is bright.

Associate Membership

Editors Christian Century: Inasmuch as E. S. Ames has written a rejoinder to my article criticizing the associate membership, I wish to pursue the subject a little farther. Its importance demands the most careful discussion. My third proposition was scarcely touched in his rejoinder, viz., that the associate membership is far from final and is at best a makeshift. It is claimed that the associate members are Christian in every sense as real as the regular members, that "there is no difference." I ask, then, why make them "associate members"? Why should they not be placed on exactly the same basis in every respect as the regular members of the church? To one occupying the position of Dr. Ames, that is the only consistent thing to do. If the unimmersed are Christians in the New Testament sense the same as the immersed, then the only right thing to do is to open wide the door and receive them as freely and completely as those who have been "buried in baptism." To do otherwise is to deal with them unjustly and to place them, theoretically at least, in an inferior position. I say "theoretically" because the contention is that practically they are on the same basis, but by theoretically placing them in an inferior position it is hoped that those who have an immersionist conscience will feel satisfied, and so the problem of Christian Union will be solved. This is the most temporary kind of a makeshift. The only brave thing to do is to face what he evidently thinks must be the final program and stop at no half-way point. If I understand it aright, this final program is really the same as that held by the old Christian Connection. They would receive anybody, preferring, of course, to immerse them, but not making it a condition. It was about as liberal a platform as could well be conceived. But what of the results? Did it solve the problem of Christian union? It has about run its course and makes no appeal to either the immersed or the unimmersed. There are several optionist bodies, but these have not reached any large numbers of people who have an immersionist conscience, which is evidence that the program is not likely to be satisfying to believers in immersion.

It is said that it "solves the baptismal controversy." Does it? The Unitarian says his program solves the controversy concerning Christ, by allowing people to think as they please concerning Him, but does it? The Agnostic says his program solves the controversy concerning a divine revelation, but does it? The liquor man is zealous in his advocacy of "personal liberty" on the ground that it solves the saloon question, leaving each one to choose for himself, but does it solve it? The baptismal controversy would have been solved long ago if that program would have solved it. Just here I wish to say a word concerning baptism. Making all allowances for the results of Biblical criticism, baptism is a part of the New Testament teaching. It is in the life of Jesus both by practice and command. The universal consciousness of the church has recognized this. Even though it be an "external rite" and "legalistic," is there any good reason why people should not practice it as it was in the New Testament? Is it not possible that we may presume too much concerning the "equal sincerity and intelligence" of those who decline to obey the New Testament teachings upon this subject, even as we may presume too much concerning the sincerity and intelligence of those who reject the claims and revelation of Jesus? If we believe immersion to be the teachings of God's word, let us bear our witness faithfully to that fact. Christian union is desirable, but as Bishop Anderson said, "We do not want a union upon minimums, but upon maximums." The prayer of Jesus was for union of those who believe in him "Upon their word," the word of the apostles. So their teachings are not to be passed over in our consideration of the problem of union. Paul made baptism a plank in this union platform when he said, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." The issue is perfectly plain. Shall we regard the Bible teaching concerning baptism as of sufficient importance to hold to it faithfully, or shall we regard it as of no great significance? If the former, let us be consistent and hold to it. If the latter, let us also be consistent and make no artificial distinctions. The associate membership program has been tried repeatedly and abandoned and has attained no large success as yet.

Chicago. Austin Hunter.

Editors Christian Century: I have read with interest the article by Austin Hunter in the Christian Century of July 21. I am likewise interested in what my former college instructor, E. S. Ames, has to offer. He has some visions of shorter methods to the cardinal virtues of Christianity that many of us do not have. I have received many good things from him. I wish only to mention an instance where there have existed very cordial relations and hearty co-operation between a woman of a religious communion other than that with which she worked. Nearly three years ago, on account of oil developments, the person referred to came to live in the community. She chose to meet with and render aid in the Christian Church. She is a capable woman and has for two years been organist. Her attendance and interest in the Sunday-school and the service which followed gave impetus to our work. She cared only to be member of that congregation "without any formality." The church was saved the embarrassment of explanation and the almost certain result of being misunderstood by our religious neighbors, near by, who use the term "Christian Church," and receive people into fellowship without baptism, if persons so desire. The safest course is to follow the New Testament and have something definte.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY AUGUST 28.

Theme for the Day—Looking to the East.

Scripture—His windows were open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, Dan. 6:10.

My soul waiteth for the Lord, more than they that watch for the morning, Ps. 130:6.

Lean out against the dark with vague surmise:
Shadows weigh down the world, and heavy night
Gives no dim promise of a heavenly light;
Yet turn, O soul, toward the east thine eyes.
—Margaret Deland ("As One Who Watcheth").

Prayer.—Our Father, who art in heaven, our eyes we lift to Thee, from whom cometh our help. Upon the darkness of our way Thou dost arise with light and healing. We praise Thee for the blessing of Thy love, that comes as the clear shining of the sun to make bright all the dim places in life. May we watch for Thy coming with eagerness, even as those who wait for the day. And may this day, the day of all the week the best, be a day of blessing to us, in our homes, in the sanctuary, and in all the wide way in which we go. For we ask in the name of our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY, AUGUST 29.

Theme for the Day—The Victory of Patience.

Scripture—In your patience ye shall win your souls, Luke 21:19.

We ourselves glory in you . . . for your patience and faith, 2 Thess. 1:4.

Imitators of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises, Heb. 6:12.
Why are we so impatient of delay,
Longing forever for the time to be?
For thus we live tomorrow in today;
Yea, sad tomorrows we may never see.
We are too hasty, are not reconciled
To let kind nature do her work alone;
We plant our seed, and like a foolish child
We dig it up to see if it has grown.
—Phoebe Cary ("Teach us to Wait").

Prayer—Divine Friend, Thou Comforter of all who put their trust in Thee, we bring our lives to Thee again at the dawning of this new day. It is fresh from Thy hands, and it is ours to shape into uses of strength and beauty with Thy help. Give us patience to work consistently at whatever task Thou hast set before us. May we be glad that we have some work to do, and be willing to give it our full measure of skill and enthusiasm. Save us from the fret and worry that so greatly weaken our powers to do good work. And may we learn the lesson that the future is in Thy hands, and we may in patience and confidence commit ourselves and it to Thee. Amen.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 30.

Theme for the Day—The Children's Friend.

Scripture—But Jesus said, Suffer the little children, and forbid them not to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven; and he laid his hands on them, Matt. 19:14, 15.

They brought him their babes, and besought him,
Half kneeling, with suppliant air,
To bless the brown cherubs they brought him,
With holy hands laid on their hair.
Then reaching his hands, he said, lowly,
"Of such is my kingdom"; and then Took the brown little babes in the holy White hands of the Savior of men.
—Joaquin Miller ("Beyond the Jordan").

Prayer—Holy Father, we are all Thy children, and in constant dependence upon Thy care and good will. We give Thee the praise of our hearts for the blessings that life brings us through Thy grace. And when we read the story of our Savior's love for the little children who were brought to him of old, we are moved with an earnest desire that we may have the same sympathy for all that are weak and in need of care that we find in Thee; for He has made Thy life an open book to us. We thank Thee for the little children in our homes. Give us wisdom so to rear them that we may bring them straightaway to Thee. For Jesus' sake. 9men.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 31.

Theme for the Day—The Fire of Coals by the Sea.

Scripture—So when Simon Peter heard that it was the Lord, he girt his fisher's coat about him and cast himself into the sea. . . . So when they got out upon the land, they saw a fire of coals there, and fish laid thereon and bread. So when they had broken their fast, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, Simon, son of John, lovest thou me more than these? John 21:7, 9, 15.

'Tis long ago, yet faith in our souls
Is kindled just by the fire of coals
That streamed o'er the mists of the sea;
Where Peter, girding his fisher's coat,
Went over the nets and out of the boat,
To answer, "Lovest thou me?"
Thrice over, "Lovest thou me?"
—Alice Cary ("Fishers of Galilee").

Prayer—Our gracious Lord, we are glad that we possess the record of the Life of our Savior, which reveals Thy love for the world in such tender and impressive forms. Our hearts burn within us, and our eyes grow dim with the pathos and the beauty of that story of old. May we stand with the disciples by the sea, as in days gone by, and hear the words of the Master as he asks us today, "Lovest thou me?" Then with gladness enable us to make the great response, "Lord, Thou knowest all things. Thou knowest that we love Thee." We ask for Thy name's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 1.

Theme for the Day—The Call for Men.

Scripture—They and their sons and their brathren were able men, in strength for service, 1 Chron. 26:8.

Be of good courage, and let us play the man for our people, and for the cities of our God, 2 Sam. 10:12.

God give us men! A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking.
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking.
—J. G. Holland ("The National Need").

Prayer—Our heavenly Father, Thy call is upon us, for Thou hast summoned us into the highest service which the universe offers to mankind. We see on every side the work that is to be done, and we know that only those who have seen the vision of God's purpose can accomplish it. We join our voice in the prayer for men of faith and courage to take up the tasks of leadership in the age which is upon us. And as we join in the call, we know that by the right public service we can help to bring the answer to pass. Make us true citizens, that we also may be worthy of a place in the City of God. Amen.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 2.

Theme for the Day—The Sunrise of Hope.

Scripture—And the sun rose upon him as he passed over Penuel, Gen. 32:31.

As the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, a morning without clouds. 2 Sam. 23:4.

The blush of dawn may yet restore
Our light and hope and joy once more.
Sad soul take comfort, nor forget
That sunrise never failed us yet!
—(Celia Thaxter ("The Sunrise").

Prayer—Father of Light and Life, in Thee we have our being and our hope. Apart from Thee there is only darkness and death, but in the glory of Thy presence there is fulness of joy, and at Thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore. Make our day bright with Thy goodness, and may no cloud obscure the brightness of Thy face. We are anxious to do our best work, for all that we do is in Thy name. We bring Thee the offerings of gratitude, and take Thy name in thanksgiving upon our lips. Fulfill all Thy purposes for us and through us this day, O Father, and lead us in a plain path, for Thy mercy's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3.

Theme for the Day—Separation.

Scripture—I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan; very pleasant hast thou been to me. Thy love to me was wonderful, 2 Sam. 1:26.

Some are fallen asleep, 1 Cor. 15:6.

But we would not have you ignorant brethren concerning them that fall asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as the rest, who have no hope, 1 Thess. 4:13.

Thou art not here, thou art not there,
Thy place I cannot see;
I only know that where thou art
The blessed angels be,
And heaven is glad for thee.
—J. G. Whittier ("Sea Dreams").

Prayer—Our Loving God, safely through another week Thou hast brought us on our way. We count it as the constant evidence of Thy tender care that our lives are lengthened, and our way made straight. Yet we know that life is uncertain at the best. Some have gone out from our circle and walk with us no more. But they are in Thy keeping, and we know that not one grain of wheat will be lost when Thou dost make the pile complete. May we bear the pain of separation with the calm and patience of those who know the Father's heart of love and have felt his tender mercy through the years. And in the end of the day may we find all that we have lost in the safe-keeping of God. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

A SERIAL STORY

CHAPTER XVI.

A Dark Deed.

Archie Monteith kept his promise. Whether Jeanie liked it or not, his visits to Hopefield became more frequent than ever. The illness of James Douglas was a grand excuse for these visits. Archie hoped to rise in favor with Jeanie by his professed interest in the sick man. He thought nothing of running down from Glasgow, if only to stop an hour. But it took away considerably from his pleasure to find, that Mr. Sinclair appeared to be more frequently at Hopefield now, than he had ever been before. The two men met so often, indeed, that it was difficult for either to hide his feelings from the other. Mr. Sinclair, studiously polite. Archie, with hatred, half veiled, gleaming in his eyes. It was a trying time for Jeanie. A new dignity seemed to have settled down upon her during those weary days. When poor James Douglas lay upstairs fiercely battling for life, with the terrible fever-fiend. Mr. Graeme did not allow either Jeanie or Donald to enter the sick-room. It was clearly Donald's duty not to go there, he being in the shop, customers must be considered. For though there was no danger of infection, some of them might not think so. As for Jeanie, she superintended both her mother's department in the household, and her own as well. But there being no music, gave her more leisure than was good for her. So it was little wonder that she welcomed such a break in the monotony of life, as was afforded by the frequent meetings of these two men, who wasted so little love on each other. Nurse Greene, a bright, capable woman, took entire charge of the patient at night. Mrs. Graeme relieved her of all duties during the day, and Jeanie saw only a glimpse of her mother now and then. During the first stages of the disease there was little to report. It was useless asking how the patient was. The sickness would run its course. Mrs. Graeme never mentioned, even to her husband, the wild ravings of the sick man during the restless delirium of those early days. She wondered in herself, to hear the incessant mutterings and disjointed sentences proceeding from the disordered brain. Donald's name was often on his lips, and Jeanie's, coupled with words that brought compassionate tears into Mrs. Graeme's eyes. But when the fury of the delirium was greatest, it was Archie Monteith's name that was most often on the sick man's lips, and that of Richard Smith, mixing up both names, most unaccountably with a donkey's head, and and an empty envelope. It was a great relief to the weary watcher, when the delirious days passed by, and were succeeded by that dull lethargy which must end either in calm, refreshing sleep, or in the cold embrace of death. One way or other, the weariest watching time comes to an end.

Nurse Greene came smilingly into the breakfast room one morning, and cheerily informed them all, that the crisis was happily past. Her patient was sleeping as peacefully as a little child. He had woke up during the night, the light of reason beaming in his eyes. Weak as an infant, of course. He had taken some nourishment and gone off to sleep again. Time now, and care, would do the rest.

Mr. Graeme laid down his knife and fork, and devoutly bent his head.

"Thanks be to God for this news," he said. Jeanie's face shone with gladness as she added, "It is good, indeed." Donald seemed to have a cold in his head, as he was using his handkerchief freely. At last he managed to say:

"When shall we be allowed to see him, Nurse Greene?"

"In that Mr. Donald, everyone must be guided by the doctor. Mr. Douglas is simply weak as a new born babe, at this moment."

"I'll trust you nurse, that nae veesitors are permitted tae enter the lad's room, we'oot due leave."

"I'll see to it, Mr. Graeme, that they do not."

"It is a pity that it is winter time," said Jeanie. "When he gets strong enough change of air would have been so good for him."

"Where is his own home?" inquired Nurse Greene.

"Awa' up in the neighborhood o' Oban. But we'll no think o' lettin' him go there, strong or no."

"He's sure to gain strength quickly. He has a fine constitution," replied the nurse. Sarah at that moment came in with fresh tea.

"Sarah, do you know that the crisis is over? That James is out of danger?" Jeanie said.

"Lash me, Miss Jeanie, but I'm glad in ma verra hert. An' Mr. Sinclair, he'll be much pleased aboot it."

"Father, would it not be well for me to run over to the Manse and let him know? As Sarah says, he will be real glad."

"You are right, Donald. Nae man leeving cares mair for his people. Tak' yer bicycle. Good news ought tae travel fast. He'll tak' his breakfast wi' a' the mair relish for hearin' o' Jamie's well doing."

Jeanie envied Donald for being the first to tell Mr. Sinclair the good news. But she wisely kept her feelings on the subject to herself. She guessed too, that the day would not be very old before the minister would be with them to show his thankfulness in person. But it happened that morning that a sick call in another part of the parish had taken Mr. Sinclair from home at an early hour, and it was not until past midday that he found it possible to come to Hopefield.

Archie Monteith had arrived, half an hour before him. Jeanie had received him kindly. With quiet thankfulness she told him of James Douglas. He was heartily glad, he told her, not for James' sake only, but for all of them.

"As for yourself Jeanie," he said, "you have grown pale as a ghost. The strain has been too much for you. The moment your mother can be spared from nursing James, you will come to Kelvinside for a long visit, won't you, Jeanie? Your health demands it."

"Don't you think mother is much more in need of change than I, Archie? Think of all those weary days of watching by the bed of suffering. I wish you could coax her to go to Aunt Eleanor as soon as she can be spared."

"Mother will be very glad if she can come, too, Jeanie. But why not both of you? Sarah could manage splendidly, I am sure." Selfishness again, thought Jeanie, as she answered him calmly.

"We could not both go at once, Archie. It would be simply impossible. Very careful dieting must be meted out to James for a good while yet. This we could not leave to Sarah. Besides, I have done nothing to make a change needful for me. But mother is worn out. If she can be induced to leave home for a time, I shall be very glad."

"You don't want to come to us now, Jeanie that's all too plain," he said, gloomily.

"No aunt could have been kinder to me than your mother was, Archie, and no cousin kinder than you. I shall always be grateful to you both."

"You know I do not want gratitude from you." His persistence had ceased to embarrass her. Looking calmly and steadily at him she replied:

"I have nothing else to give you, Archie." As she uttered the words, Mr. Sinclair, unannounced, came into the room. In a moment her face was suffused with rosy color. Archie glared in malicious rage, as Jeanie hastened to meet her visitor. He saw the triumphant look on the minister's face, as he took the young girl's hand. But Archie was too clever to let his rival see into his heart. Advancing to meet Mr. Sinclair with outstretched hand, he exclaimed:

"It is a day of rejoicing for us all, Mr. Sinclair. None of us know how many real friends we have, until we have passed through trouble of some kind. When James gets well enough to hear, he will be greatly pleased, I am sure, to know how anxious we have all been about him." The speech was too long, Mr. Sinclair thought, for genuine feeling. But at the moment he felt too happy to criticize, even Archie Monteith.

"James would have been too good a man to lose, Mr. Monteith."

"Apart from the business," Jeanie said, softly, "we would have missed him deeply, as a friend."

"And I too, Miss Jeanie. For years he has been a great help to me in the Sabbath School."

"You are a very religious people here in Brigend. I suppose it's the only excitement you indulge in." The sneer was ill-timed. Jeanie looked pained. But Mr. Sinclair turned the remark off, with a smiling rejoinder.

"We go in for the excitement of motoring, too, you know, Mr. Monteith, when we get the chance." Archie's eyes flashed with eager expression. Did some fiend take up the suggestion and urge it on the man to his undying shame?

"I am at your service for an hour, Mr. Sinclair. The day is fair. I shall be most happy to drive you in any direction you wish."

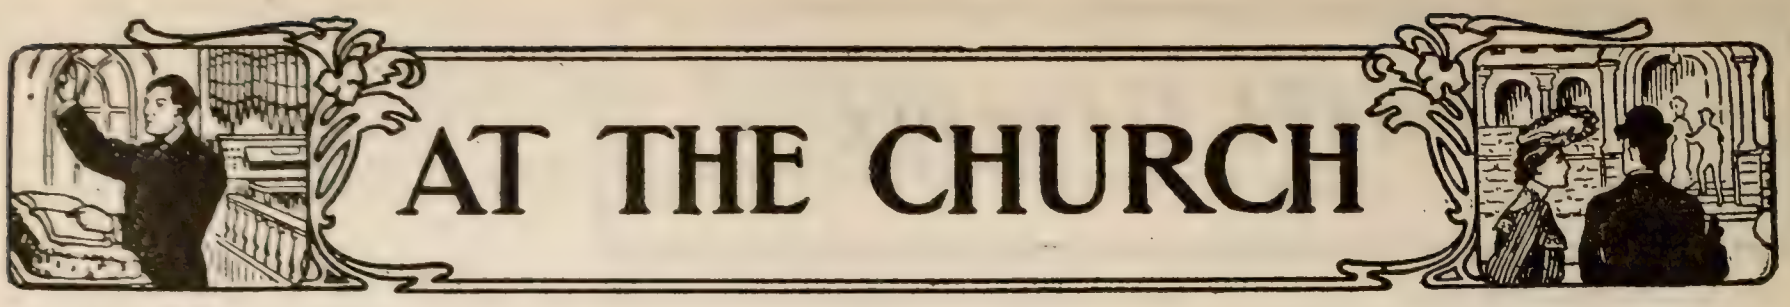
"You are most kind, Mr. Monteith, but I have much sickness in my parish at present. I have only called here now for a few moments to offer congratulations on James' recovery. I have still to make a sick call to a distant member of my flock. So I cannot afford to indulge in pleasure today. Accept my thanks for your kind offer."

"In what direction does your duty call you, Mr. Sinclair?"

"Towards Motherwell."

"A splendid road. What is to hinder your going in my motor? I shall be delighted to take you." He threw so much apparent kindness into his manner, that Jeanie thought the offer was made in the kindliest spirit.

"No other mode of locomotion could take you to your destination so quickly, Mr. Sinclair," she said.



"I know it, Miss Jeanie. But you understand I may wish to spend a considerable time with my sick parishoner. I could not think of keeping Mr. Monteith waiting."

"My steed will not take cold, sir," said Archie laughing.

"No, but you might. Besides the days are so short now. And you may wish to return to the city before dark."

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Vineyard*

The events of the final week of Jesus' public ministry have been preserved for us in somewhat fuller detail and in more definite order of occurence than other portions of his work. This was no doubt due to the intense interest which the disciples felt in those incidents which brought out the deeper meanings of his life, and the entire contrast in which it stood to the ideas and ambitions of the Jewish rulers.

On the Monday he returned to the city from Bethany, and on the way there occurred the incident which took form in the narrative as the cursing of the fig tree. It is difficult to conceive of Jesus as actually pronouncing a curse upon a tree and destroying it, even for so good a purpose as the instruction of the Twelve. But it may be conjectured that the sight of a fruitless tree would lead to the prediction of its speedy death, and that was the lesson he wished to teach. To the disciples there would be no inconsistency in an act of vengeance on any object which failed to fulfil the expectation of the Lord. And this may account for the baldness of the representation we have. But the Christian world has always found difficulty in believing that Jesus destroyed even a fruitless tree. He came not to destroy, as he said, but to save.

The Events of Tuesday.

The cleansing of the temple, which seems to have occurred on the same day, is placed by the First Gospel in immediate connection with the triumphal entry on Sunday. Then on Tuesday morning, on the journey into the city from Bethany, the withering fig tree was noticed, and the lesson of its death still further enforced. On arrival at the temple, which was the center of the public life of Jerusalem, being at once a citadel, a sanctuary, a university and a bazaar, Jesus was met by the various groups of the religious leaders and questioned on various points in the hope that in some manner he might be entrapped in his speech. This was the great day of controversy in the life of our Lord.

The contest with the authorities of the temple began with a question regarding the right of Jesus to teach in a public manner, which was usually reserved for the men who held the credentials of the temple school. Jesus silenced them by demanding of them in turn their undeerstanding of the work of John the Baptist. They dared not answer his question in public, and so he compelled them to drop the entire matter. But this gave him an admirable opportunity to drive home the lesson of the official unfaithfulness of Judaism. And this he did, in the three parables of warning which followed.

Three Parables.

These three stories were those of the Two Sons (Matt. 21:28-32), the Unfruitful Vineyard (the present study, with its parables in Mark and Luke), and the Marriage Feast (Matt. 22:1-14). By what seems a singular error, the lesson committee has given the title "Two Parables of Judgment" to the lesson we are considering. In fact it includes but one of the three parables, with an allusion to the ancient tradition of the corner stone, which, however, is in no sense a parable.

The picture of the vineyard given by Jesus seems taken almost completely from the admirable description given by Isaiah in one of his public discourses in Jerusalem (Isa. 5:1f). The culture of the vine both for wine and raisins was so common as to be familiar to all the members even of a city audience. Isaiah told of the careful selection of a fruitful hill for the vineyard. Jesus gives all the other features of the preparation for the place, the protecting hedge, the pit in which the wine was to be trodden out, and the tower for the watchman to stay on guard during the vintage time. Everything was done to make the vineyard a profitable possession.

Isaiah and Jesus.

But at this point the parables of Isaiah and Jesus differ wholly. The prophet pictured the owners waiting in vain for the ground that had been so carefully prepared, to bring forth its crop. Only wild grapes appeared. There was no value in the place, and it had to be abandoned. But in the parable of Jesus the fault is not with the vineyard, but with its keepers. They will not turn over to the landlord the produce of his land. So they must be dismissed, and other men more faithful put in their places. The two parables of Isaiah and Jesus start with the same description, and end with the same condemnation. In both instances it is the Jewish nation that is charged with being profitless to God, its possessor. But in the former the people are compared with the vineyard itself which is unfruitful, and in the latter they are likened to the dishonest keepers, who refuse to make accounting to their employer.

No picture could be more lifelike and convincing than that which our Lord here presents of the long process by which God sought to secure the rightful returns of his care and generous love. One after another he sent his messengers to summon the husbandmen to make report to him of their work, and to turn over to him the produce of the soil. The Old Testament is the pathetic record of the efforts made by God through the prophets to bring the leaders of Israel to some just sense of the divine ownership of the nation. But the treatment they received at the hands of Israel was precisely that of the parable. Stephen in his defense before the Sanhedrin made this clear. "Which of the prophets did not your fathers persceute?" cried he, and pointed out the fact that the history of Israel was one long line of martyrdom and persecution for the servants of God.

The Peril of Truthfulness.

Such conduct could have only one sort of ending. Such men would not hesitate at anl act of defiance. Even the son of the landowner would fare no better than the servants who had preceded him. Jesus knew full well all that lay before him of suffering and death as the result of Jewish malice. He could only make clear to them the fact that the future would hold a reckoning for such conduct, and that the proud name which the nation had borne as the people of God would be taken from them and bestowed upon Gentiles, who made better proof of their opportunity. The history of the New Testament church and of Christianity in the generations that followed, to our own time, is the commentary on this prediction.

In Psalm 118:22 there is a reference to Jerusalem, so often best by enemies, and despised by the nations, as the cornerstone of the kingdom of God, marvelous in the eyes of the Hebrews themselves, and of the astonished nations who come at last to see the truth. It is this passage which the Master quotes, as applicable alike to the sacred city of God in ancient times, and to the sacred Messenger, who nom comes in the name of the Highest. For the structure which is rearing this neglected corner stone is essential. The talmudic traditions in explanation of this passage in the psalms are worthless. They insist that when the temple was built the workmen repeatedly overlooked a small and apparently inconhequential stone in their search for the great corner stone of the edifice. But that they were compelled to come back at last and take the stone which they had overlooked and put it in the chief place. The figure is sufficiently clear without the labored explanation.

Present Meanings.

It is easy to see how unobservant and dull of mind the Jewish people were in the days of the Christ. But the lesson will have little value if it is a mere complacent review of Jewish annals. The question that is alone worth the asking is this, In what sense are we today as dull of mind and as profitaless to God as tre Jews of old? It is easy to charge them with folly, the more so as they are not here to defend themselves; and with far more wonderful endowments than the Jews ever received, we are too often content to keep back the fruit of our land from the Great Possessor. Only as the present duty and the present danger are made clear will the story of the Vineyard have value.

Americans never need fear a boycott of their more important exports by the Chinese, according to W. H. Wickham, a business man oi Hongkong, who is on his way to London, after passing twenty-two years in China. "The principal products the Chinese get are flour and kerosene," said Mr. Wickham. "They cannot place a boycott on either product, because they cannot get it in any other country. China is becoming a great cigarette-smoking nation, cigarettes being substituted for opium. The tobacco is shipped from the United States and manufactured in China. Cigarettes are carried on men's backs far into the interior. The prices are high, but the Chinese pay them."

—It is estimated there are 10,000 automobiles in use in the state of Kansas.

Church Life

—To get a good start on the new year, let every pastor come home from his vacation and take an offering for Church Extension.

—Have you read the advertisement of the Bethany Graded Sunday School Lessons? Do not overlook it. Study it in detail. No series of lesson helps of such artistic, scientific and simple excellence has ever been offered the Disciples of Christ, or is likely to be offered.

—Springfield Disciples are making extraordinary preparations for the Illinois Convention next month. All the state will be welcomed. Chicago, especially, will try to send a good delegation. The date is more convenient than it has been for some years. Let us tax the generous hospitality of the capital city brethren!

Bert Wilson has resigned the pastorate of the church at Cook, Neb.

W. D. Barth has resigned as pastor at Corydon, Ind. He will leave September 1.

The association of Mason county, Ky., churches held its annual meeting at Sardis recently.

By the will of Mr. Nelson A. Mansfield, the Christian church of Niantic, Ill., is bequeathed the sum of $1,000 and a town lot.

E. S. Farmer, of Rochester, Ind., preached the baccalaureate sermon for the graduating class of Rochester Normal College on Aug. 7.

The Evanston, Ill., church has set Sunday, September 18, as the date of dedication of their new church. O. F. Jordan is pastor there.

George B. Ranshaw, formerly secretary of the American Missionary Society, has accepted the pastorate of the church in Elyria. Ohio.

The Salamonia, Ind., church celebrated its sixty-seventh anniversary August 14. A number of the former pastors of the church were present.

B. W. Tate, pastor at Homer, Ill., and his wife were given a surprise party, a nice purse and a godspeed on their vacation by their congregation last week.

The church at Virden, Ill., is about to erect a twenty thousand dollar house of worship. The pastor, H. J. Hostetler, is pushing the enterprise.

Secretary Edgar W. Allen, of the Foreign Society, and his father, H. W. Allen, occupied the pulpit of the Elyria, O., church jointly on August 14.

The home of E. J. Willis, pastor of the Kirksville, Mo., church, is sorely afflicted in the critical illness of his wife. Many prayers will ascend for her recovery.

Wesley Hatcher of Kentucky has been called to the pastorate of the West Side Church of Dayton, Ohio. It is expected by those in touch with him that he will accept.

Congregations at Knox City, Truscott and Benjamin, Texas, are coöperating in a camp-meeting at Truscott. A large attendance is reported. W. S. Haynes is the evangelist and C. E. McVay the singer.

The Little Flat Rock, Ind., church will celebrate its eighteenth anniversary by a "Home Coming" on September 4. Secretary Stephen J. Corey will be the principal speaker. M. S. Long is pastor.

Milo T. Atkinson, recently pastor of the Fifth Street Church, Cincinnati, was stricken ill following a funeral service at which he officiated. He was removed to the hospital for an operation.

Dr. Bruce Brown, pastor of the Dean Ave. Church, Spokane, Wash., is conducting a series of outdoor meetings these summer evenings. His subjects are popular, announced with clever alliteration, and the services are attracting large audiences.

The church at Corning, Iowa, under the leadership of Pastor O. W. Winter is progressing through the summer despite the hot weather. Additions are reported frequently. A meeting will be begun September 18, led by C. E. Chambers of Ottumwa, evangelist.

F. D. Ferrall, who has done an admirable work in leading the church at Bloomfield, Iowa, during the past five years, has resigned to accept the pastorate of the church at Shenandoah, same state. More than 300 persons have been added to the church in Bloomfield during Mr. Ferrall's ministry.

N. L. Collins preached on the subject, "Where does the soul go immediately after death?" to his congregation at St. Augustine, Ill., recently. In the evening a special service for farmers and threshers was held. This sounds as if this pastor was connecting the life that now is and that which is to come in a wholesome ministry.

The congregation of the Central Church, Youngstown, Ohio, has invited W. D. Ryan, late of Ashland, Ky., to its pastorate. Mr. Ryan is among the most efficient of the younger pastors among the Disciples and will do a large work in the new field in case he accepts it. W. S. Goode was formerly pastor there.

One of the fruits of the southern California convention, held this month in Long Beach, is the resolution of the churches of the state to aid in building a big house of worship for the Long Beach congregation. This is the annual convention city, and the present home is not adequate to the needs either of the convention or of the local congregation. F. M. Rogers is pastor there.

H. H. Peters of Eureka has served as superintendent of Christian Endeavor in Illinois for three years. He has been handling this work in connection with his work as field secretary of Eureka College. He closed his work as superintendent of C. E. August 1. His successor will be chosen by the state board at the next regular meeting. This office is non-salaried and the funds for expenses are never adequate for an aggressive campaign. Just what will be done with the work is a question.

J. P. Rowlison takes the church at Tiffin, Iowa. Mr. Rowlison has been supplying this pulpit in connection with his work in the University of Iowa the past year. He has now bought a strip of ground, he says, and will put up a home on it. The Tiffin church is one of Iowa's strong rural congregations. Mr. Rowlison recently received the compliment of a vote by the Perry, Ia., church board recommending that he be re-called to the pastorate of that church. He was pastor there a dozen years ago, following Editor C. C. Morrison, now of the Christian Century.

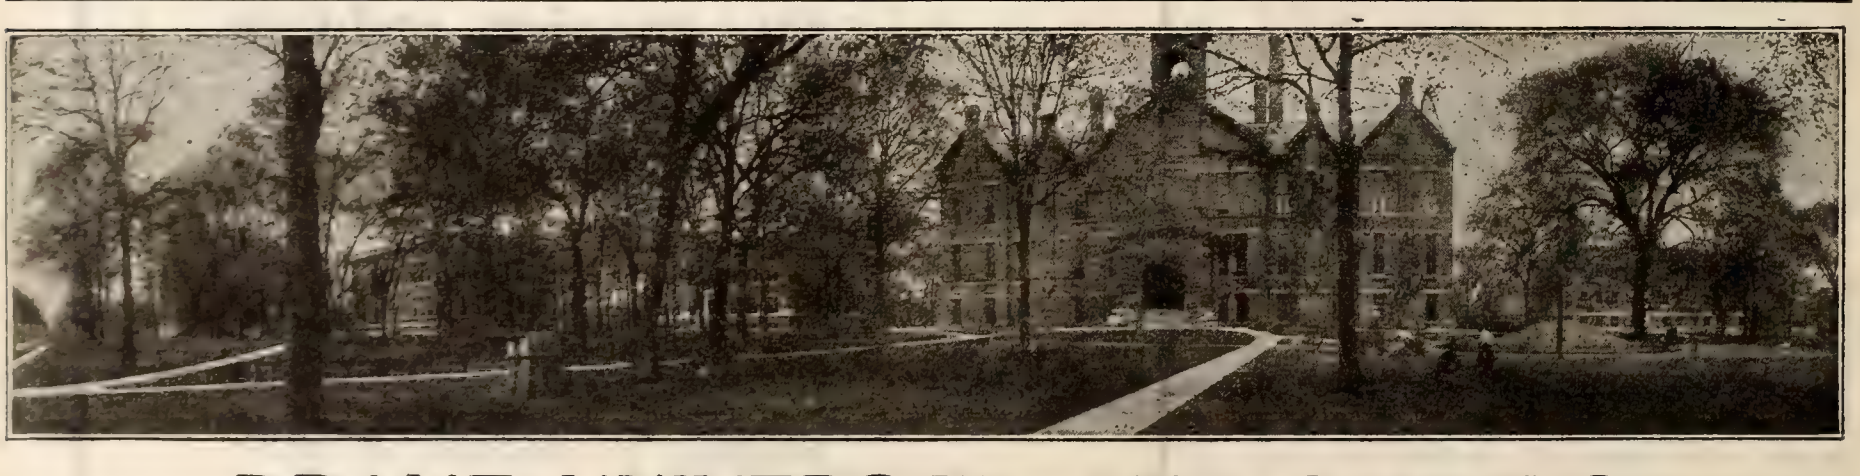
The publicity committee of the Illinois convention, to be held in Springfield, September 12-16, has made arrangements with the daily press of the city to report the doings and sayings of the convention in systematic detail. This is admirable enterprise. Every church board is asked to send the names of the heads of families of its church to J. W. Street, Chairman Publicity Committee, with 25 cents for each name, and the daily paper will be sent each day to each address. Here is a chance to bring the convention to the entire congregation of every church in the state.

The officials of the church at Sheridan, Ind., used an entire page in the local newspapers advertising the laying of the corner stone of the new Christian church structure for Thursday, August 11. The page was of standard size and in the advertisement was featured the appearance of the special chorus formed for the occasion. It is believed the use of newspaper space at paid rates for this particular purpose is original with this church. The board which had charge of the advertising feature reports that good results were received, and it is probable that the page ad will lead to further use of the newspaper in that section to advertise church affairs.

An interesting diversion from the regular series is that adopted by the church at Petersburg, Ill., B. H. Sealock, pastor. Instead of the sermon of the pastor a lawyer spoke one Sunday evening on "The Law as a Life Work." On subsequent Sunday evenings the County Superintendent of Schools spoke on Teaching; an editor spoke on the Newspaper; a doctor on Medicine; and a politician on Public Service. The last number of the series will be Mr. Sealock's address on "The Challenge of the Ministry." This is the true spirit in which the church's work is to be done. Mr. Sealock is planning progressive things for the Sunday-school the coming year.

E. H. Clifford, minister of the Fourth Church, Indianapolis, has resigned and will close his work there in October. The change of population in the immediate vicinity of the Fourth Church caused by the moving in of a large number of colored people has so limited the field of the church that it will no longer attempt to support a man in the field. Mr. Clifford is a graduate of Butler College and has been prominently connected with the Christian Endeavor movement in Indiana in both the Disciples' church and in interdenominational work. He is at present state superintendent for the Disciples for Indiana. Some good church will do well to call Mr. Clifford to its pastorate.



It seems right that especial attention should be called to the self-effacing program carried on by F. F. Walters, pastor of the First Church, Joplin, Mo., in seeking to bring about a reunion of his congregation and that of the Central Church, the latter a congregation which had become disaffected in the First Church three years ago. By eliminating himself in the interest of reunion, Mr. Walters consummated the purpose which he had set himself some seventeen months ago. The pastor of the reunited church will likely be Mr. Miller of the Central Church. Mr. Walters' purpose to enter the evangelistic field will result in many calls, no doubt. to good opportunities for meetings. We hope, however, that he may shortly be located in a pastorate.

Casper C. Garrigues, pastor of the Hammett Place Christian Church, has decided to withdraw his resignation tendered a month ago to his congregation and remain with the congregation indefinitely. The pastor offered his resignation because he thought the congregation was not aggressive enough in getting a more serviceable church plant in keeping with its growing needs. The congregation woke to this fact and made every possible effort to induce Pastor Garrigues to withdraw his resignation. The final inducement was the appointment of a church building committee, consisting of Chairman. W. D Cree, W. W. Dowling, H. M. Lineberger and Edward S. Baldwin. It is the intention of the congregation to sell its present church site, which is valued at $10,000. A new church site will be selected and building plans will be pushed.

The official board of the Mt. Healthy, Ohio, church of Disciples has recommended the following resolution to the church for action:

"Be it resolved that the church of Disciples of Christ in Mt. Healthy receive into full membership those of other Christian denominations who present satisfactory evidences of Christian character and good standing in other bodies, irrespective of their mode of baptism."

This is an encouraging sign. The church there has discussed this step for some time with much deliberation. The proposal to really practice Christian union with other Christian people is now presented to the church by the officers with a clear understanding of its significance. The church regrets that the pastor, N. L. Sims, is determined to relinquish the work there that he may pursue his studies at Columbia University. Mr. Sims is thoroughly in sympathy with the proposed step in the direction of Christian union.

DRAKE UNIVERSITY AND CAMPUS

Drake University is twenty-nine years old, has eleven buildings devoted exclusively to school purposes, employs more than 150 instructors, and has an annual attendance of more than 1,800 students The University is located in the best suburb of "Beautiful Des Moines," with easy access to every point of educational and religious interest in the city. Library facilities are unexcelled in the West, living expenses are moderate and opportunities for remunerative employment are unusually good. School is in session throughout the year.

THE COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE

The Bible College of Drake University was established at the opening of the school in 1881. It is

Free from the limitations of man-made creeds and sectarian domination; has a faculty of earnest scholars, each an expert in some branch of Bible study; maintains that spirit of loyalty to Christ which leaves the mind free to "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good"; has organic union with a large and rapidly growing university and affords an opportunity of hearing in lecture or recital many of the most famous world characters. Des Moines is an educational, artistic, industrial and religious center.

MEDICAL MISSIONARIES

Drake University has more Medical Missionaries in the field than any other of our schools. No other institution in the Brotherhood offers the advantages to be found at Drake University. The College of Medicine of Drake University is standard by every test applied to such institutions. The training of the medical missionary in the College of Liberal Arts, the College of the Bible and the College of Medicine assures the best preparation for complete service.

Scholarships for Bible College Students

Free scholarships are provided by the university and its friends for all students preparing for the ministry or the mission field.

Notes from the Foreign Society

George W. Brown reports a safe voyage back to his station at Jubbulpore, India. The workers are very glad to have them back once more.

Dr. Jennie V. Fleming states that the attendance at the hospital in Damoh has been large. There is much sickness there right after the rainy season.

D. O. Cunningham, Harda, C. P., India, writes that they are having a scourge of cholera. Those attacked live from twelve to twenty-four hours. The suffering is intense. He adds that the missionaries are all well

A conference of missionaries, of both the Foreign Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, was held August 9 to 11, at the Missionary Training School, Indianapolis. Thirty-five missionaries were in attendance. The conference was most helpful for inspiration, plans for future work, and association.

The Foreign Society will have a splendid exhibit of literature and curios from heathen lands at the Topeka convention.

F. M. Rains and wife sailed on the 12th to visit Australia, India, Philippine Islands, China, Japan, and Africa. The missionaries are eagerly looking forward to their coming.

Annual Meeting in Pike County, Illinois

I recently had the privilege of attending the county meeting of the Christian churches of Pike County, Illinois. More than 100 delegates registered, and quite a number that did not come as delegates were present. Pike County has nineteen churches of our people and these churches exert a great influence throughout the county. They are thoroughly missionary and interested in every good cause. The county meeting was held in Milton. This is the house of Mr. C. E. Bolin, who is a kind of lay bishop of Pike County among our people. He was an honorable member of the last session of the legislature in Illinois. He will be re-elected and ought to be. The Pittsfield Christian Church is the strongest religious organization in Pike County. W. H. Cannon is the pastor. Pike County is his boyhood home. He knows everybody and is universally popular. The Pittsfield church is raising $1000 toward the endowment fund of Eureka College. Mr. Bolin of Milton also made a good pledge.

Church Extension Notes

During the month of July the board paid the following loans: West Liberty, Ky., $1,800; Coffeeburg, Mo., $1,000; Harvey, Ill., $4,000; Tacoma, Wash. (Roosevelt Heights Church), $400; Brooklet, Ga., $350; Pecos, Texas, $4,000. This makes 99 loans closed this year for the first ten months aggregating $172,740. This is a larger number of loans and a greater amount of money than the board has ever put out in any single year.

On the first of August there was $813,212.07. A little over $40,000 is needed to reach $850,000 of a permanent fund by the time of the Topeka convention. If we get $40,000 in our annual offering we will reach $100,000 of new receipts this year.

On account of the low condition of our treasury at our board meeting on August 11 the following churches asking loans had to be carried over: Irving Park, Chicago; Sixteston, Mo.; Alamogordo, New Mexico; Chester, W. Pa.; Nampa, Idaho; Oak Grove, Mo.; Madras, Oregon; Eugene, Oregon; Ellsberry, Mo.; Figuoora St. Church, Los Angeles Calif., and Bennett, Neb. Several churches asked for an increase of loan which could not be granted.

At this meeting August 11, another good friend of church extension proposed to give the board $10,000 on the annuity plan. The annuity fund has received 281 gifts and amounts to $283,550. This amount is included in our total assets of the permanent fund. Our annuity fund has now built 151 churches.

The gain in individual receipts is $31,305, principally in annuities, new name funds and bequests. Most of these gains are regular, showing a deeper interest in church extension work by our business men.

A great many brotherhood societies are ordering literature for their men's meetings, showing that they are interested in working up good offerings. Some of them are having debates on the subject, "Resolved, That Church Extension is a Failure." It is hoped that the negative side will win. It would be about as hard to prove that the Church of Christ is a failure as to prove that church extension is a failure.

During September the corresponding secretary will address the conventions of Eastern Pennsylvania, New England, Delaware, Maryland and District of Columbia, West Virginia, Tennessee and Kentucky.

Great interest is being shown in the annual offering in September by the number of churches that are ordering supplies. Many encouraging words are being written by our pastors to the board at Kansas City. We trust that the offering will sweep ahead of last year. There is need of gains because only 1,318 churches participated in the offering last year. We should have 2,000 contributing churches this year.

G. W. MUCKLEY, Cor. Sec.

"STRENGTHENING THE CORDS"

By E. L. Powell

Church Extension means "strengthening the cords and enlarging the borders of Zion." To build a church or to help others to build one is to furnish an environment for spiritual life. It is to establish a "plant" whose output is character. It is setting up an establishment for the transaction of the King's business. I do not see how it is possible to overestimate the importance of the work of Church Extension. It appeals to the practical man, for as a business proposition its claims are beyond dispute. It appeals to the sentimental man, for the pathos of the homeless goes straight to the heart. It appeals to the enthusiastic man, for as he thinks of its possibilities his heart beats quicker and the vision of a world conquered for Christ becomes more real. It summons us by its logic, its pathos, its practical achievements, its possibilities. No congregation, knowing the blessings of a church home, and what it means for the individual and the community, has a right before God to withhold hearty and generous support. We dare not sidetrack this great enterprise. It stands on an equality with any undertaking in the kingdom of God's work. Let us not be indifferent to the tremendous responsibility which rests upon us as respects this supremely important business.

Louisville, Kentucky.

The Essential Significance of Graded Lessons

RULING PRINCIPLE

The new education puts the pupil at the center and requires the instruction to be adapted to his needs. The history of education shows that the pupil for a very long while was denied this central position. The question of interest belonged to the instructor, not to the instructed. But modern education entirely reverses this. The nature of the pupil, and the consequent needs of the pupil, receive first consideration. Modern psychology, particularly the study of the child-mind, has shifted the educational center from subjects to persons.

BEGINNERS

The series begins where the child's conscious thought always begins, with the parental idea, and presents God to the child-mind as the heavenly Father, and leads it to the conception of this divine fatherhood through the simple and familiar relations of the child to its earthly parents. The very reading of the topics which are the subjects of the lessons in the course for Beginners is like sweet and simple music, and to any heart capable of appreciating the simplicities of truth it will indicate how natural and simple religion is as belonging to the very nature of the soul, entering into its most germinal development and working itself out in all the processes of growth.

PRIMARY

In the Primary grade the same simple but great themes touched upon in the Beginners course are continued, but just sufficiently developed to correspond to the growing capabilities of the child's mind, including, but not going beyond the widening circle of the child's extending associations and experiences. Nothing is forced in upon the child that is unchildlike in character; truths which the child can comprehend and that have natural place in his life are presented and repeated with that reiteration which the child's mind requires, while the teacher is content to wait for the germination and silent growth of the simplest seeds of truth in the child's heart.

JUNIOR

In the Junior lessons the pulse of life begins to throb more strongly. The great subjects of religious thought begin to enter; the simple introduction to the great story of history begins; the wonderful stories of the Bible begin to exercise their fascination; duties growing out of natural relationships are recognized; the choice of good and evil, and the fateful results of such choices, are made to be seen and felt; and the thought of God's providence over individual life is given manifold illustration in the biblical stories. In the fourth year of the series a more careful study of the briefer of the four Gospels is entered upon, followed by a study of the most striking incidents described in the book of Acts, and closing with stories from that larger book of Acts, the lives of later Christian missionaries.

INTERMEDIATE

Here we find ourselves where adolescent life begins, when the child ceases and the man begins; when the stirrings of those ambitions which are to issue in great deeds begin to manifest themselves; when the sympathies and affections become more intense; when the great choices and decisions are made; when the heroic spirit becomes dominant and when ideals are set up; when the great temptations open their deadly assaults; when the reason begins to exercise itself: a period of strife, and tumult, and strain, of high resolving, of deadly peril, of glorious victory. To this fateful period our new series of lessons comes with definite and intelligent understanding. Christ forever knocks at the door of life in every stage, but more distinctly and strongly does he knock at the door of the heart of youth at this period than at any other time.

SENIOR

This is the period for constructive study. It is the altruistic period of life and its spirit is optimistic. The individual begins to define his relations to others and the duties growing out of those relations. The sense of obligation and responsibility grows, purpose becomes more definite and the formulation of a life program is undertaken. Consequently the steady aim of the study and instruction in this period is to help the pupil to find his place and work in the world.

NEW CONCEPTION

The new movement is the outgrowth of the larger conception of religious education. According to this new conception the factors entering into the process are much more varied than was formerly supposed. All truth belongs to religious education, from whatever source it may be derived. Moreover, the aim of all genuine education is the production of sound character, and all instruction must be directed to this purpose. Consequently into these new courses is to be introduced the study of great characters other than those included in the Scriptures. And the moral heroes of every generation will be summoned to illustrate and impress the great elements of noble character.

THE BIBLE

The Bible is used as the most valuable material in moral and religious instruction; and it is used with discrimination, with a clear understanding that we must select from it in the progressive education of the child such material as answers to the needs of the child at the various stages of his growth. The Bible is a great storehouse of spiritual food, but in its stores is food for the little child and the strong man. Henceforth we are to give to the child only that which belongs to the child and to the man only what belongs to the man.

Dustless Housecleaning

Terrific Air Suction. Rushing, whirling, sucking air cleans, carpets, rugs, mattings on floor, without sweeping or dusting. No motors, no electricity. Constant suction. New Home Vacuum Cleaner. New principle. One person operates. Child or weak woman can handle easily. Weighs nine pounds. Simple—powerful—effective. It's the constant suction that does it—terrific, irresistible, sure. Sucking, drawing—gathering up into itself dirt—dust—grit—germs and grime from the very warp and fibre of carpets, rugs, mattings. Does same kind of work as high priced machines. Price so low all may enjoy its benefits. Unlike anything you've seen or heard of. Makes carpets look like new. Better than if taken up and beaten. Raises no dust, so no dusting required. Does what days of sweeping and pounding could never do. Mrs. Jane Shully, Neb., writes. "You don't claim half enough. I wouldn't part with my cleaner for any price, if I couldn't get another. My ten year old girl operates mine easily and enjoys it."

SAVES MONEY, STRENGTH, HEALTH and TIME. YOU NEED IT.

MAKES DUSTLESS HOMES

You Can Abandon Brooms, Brushes and Dust Cloths.

They don't clean your rugs and carpets. Brooms and sweepers fill the air with clouds of unhealthy disease-laden dust and germs and remove only surface dirt. New Home Vacuum Cleaner sucks up not only surface dirt, but all dirt, dust, grit and germs from in and beneath. Disturbance and upheaval of house-cleaning unnecessary. Stop short! Put drudgery behind you—leisure and health before. In New Home Vacuum Cleaner lies your salvation from household slavery. Adopt the new—easy—modern—sanitary—scientific way of cleaning.

An Issue Not to be Evaded

The Disciples' Duty to Conform Practice to Plea

In the Christian-Evangelist of August 18 a writer expresses with intimate frankness the pain of his heart in the consciousness that there is a paradox at the center of his ministry. The false position in which he constantly finds himself—pleading for the union of all Christians and yet hindered in the practice of union—has compelled him to speak out. It was not until recently that he realized his thoughts were unstable as to the conventional practice of the Disciples. But new light has broken in upon his mind through the contemplation of the indisputable Christian character of the members of other churches. In the following paragraph he states the gist of his reflections:

> If the life of the baptized [immersed] gives proof of the forgiveness and the indwelling presence of God, does not the life of the unbaptized [unimmersed] too? And if God has forgiven and dwells within our unbaptized [unimmersed] brother, should we insist upon any additional test of fellowship? If God receives and blesses these thousands daily, should we reject them? Alexander Campbell said, "I dare not be a party man for these reasons (1) . . . (2) Because no party will receive into communion all whom God would receive into heaven." But to my mind, a congregation that excludes unbaptized [unimmersed] people bearing the fruits of the Spirit excludes those whom God receives. This conclusion is forced upon me until I am able to see that it is unreasonable. My congregation does not know that I feel thus, nor do I want them to know now. I prefer to wait for more light upon this whole matter.
> He has been studying afresh the ministry of Jesus, and feels how incongruous the themes of much of our preaching would be in the mouth of the Master.
> If our Lord stood in the pulpit of today, limited as we frail, human ministers are limited, what course would he pursue? Would he preach a sermon or two on baptism, showing that the only proper form is immersion (that the unimmersed are unbaptized, that baptism is for the forgiveness of sins, that the unbaptized may not be forgiven), that it is linked inseparably with the promise of salvation (that those only sprinkled may miss heaven), that the word of God demands conformity in this point, regardless of the strife it engenders? From all the tremendous problems (political, social, individual) that confront the church, would he turn and call upon the church to confront this question of baptism? What would he say? What would he do? What should I say and do? I can not answer these questions for myself; I dare not try to answer them for others. But every man must think. These thoughts are forced upon me. Before long I shall be compelled to a decision, and whatever that decision be I must speak and act accordingly. Being a minister in a Christian church, I could not keep my convictions private if I would. I am too often consulted upon this subject by members of my own congregation and by others as well.

Following this article an unsigned contributor makes reply. What he is replying to it is hard to say. Certainly he misses the essential point raised by the first writer as far as if he had turned and aimed in the opposite direction. Like most of the replies to the statements of this paradox by honest and burdened Disciples he resorts to a lengthy repetition of our history, beginning a hundred years ago, and recounts our great achievements and our present strength. This sort of sectarian jingoism, however, is not an answer to the profound problem with which the distressed contributor (and, we might add, a host of others like him), is struggling.

The signs are multiplying daily that the editors of our newspapers will have to face this question squarely. Hitherto it has not been faced squarely, either by the conservative or the liberal wing of the Disciples. We do not regard the statement in the first paragraph quoted above as a full or adequate statement of the contradiction in the customary practice of some Disciples of Christ, but it at least presents one aspect of the paradox with great lucidity.

In looking through the alleged "reply" to the position advanced in the article from which we are quoting our eye is caught by a paragraph containing three questions which we are at a loss whether to characterize as purblind or just naive. They are worth examination anyhow. The paragraph is as follows:

> Is not all the divergence of practice [in the administration of baptism] due to misunderstanding of our Lord's will? If all today understood the will of the Lord alike, is there any doubt what the practice concerning baptism would be? And is it not the declared mission of the Disciples of Christ to bring the Christian world to that common understanding of our Master's will which will lead to our common doing of the same?

The first two questions deal with what ought to be axioms in the baptismal controversy, but unfortunately are not. The implication in most of the literature and preaching on this theme is that those who practice immersion only, are more loyal to Christ than those who practice affusion.

A negative answer to the second question above ought to result in the revision of a good many sermons on the Lordship of Christ. It is a simple impertinence to assume that Baptists are more loyal to Christ's authority than are Presbyterians. They simply differ in their understanding of what the will of Christ is, that is all.

As to the third question, there remains yet much to be said. We must be content just here with but a word or two. If the question were taken out of its context there could be but one answer to it, and that the one the writer intends shall be given. But in sequence with question one and two it cannot but receive a negative answer from those who know the primal impulses of the Disciples and the great ideals of our history.

It is not the mission of the Disciples of Christ to bring the Christian world to a common understanding of our Master's will with respect to the administration of baptism, or with respect to any other item of biblical interpretation out of which creeds are made and over which the church is divided into sects. Question number three describes the Baptist denomination, not the Disciples of Christ.

It is the mission of the Disciples of Christ to bring the Christian world to a common understanding of our Lord's will with respect to the unity of his church, to such an understanding as will impel all Christians to the real practice of union.

The Disciples believe that our Lord's supreme commandment is found in his prayer for the unity of his followers. They believe that among many evangelical bodies there is today a common ground of agreement upon which, as a basis, union may be established without violating the conscience of any. Instead of its being the mission of the Disciples to establish a certain understanding of baptism as a means to union, it is their mission to plead for the practice of union despite our creedal differences on baptism or predestination or any other question of Scripture interpretation.

Christian union is a long way off if it has to wait until the baptismal dogma is settled on the field of controversy. The one and only distinctive note in the message of the Disciples of Christ is that our differences over dogmas ought not and need not stand in the way of the union of Christ's people. The Disciples are the only people in the world organized for the especial purpose of saying that and proposing to live up to it in their practice.

Even our differences over the baptismal dogma, the Disciples say, present no insuperable barrier to union. We do not need to postpone union pending the settlement of the baptismal controversy any more than we need to postpone union pending the settlement of the Calvinistic controversy or the Trinitarian controversy.

These controversies will continue so long as men have a conscience upon one side or the other, but it is the supreme will of Christ, the Disciples say, that they be continued, if at all, within a united church.

Chapters from A Travel Journal

At Henry Drummond's Grave

Our trip through the Trossachs and the beautiful Scottish lake region, made famous to readers of English literature in Scott's story of Rob Roy, brought us toward evening to Stirling, where we were planning to spend the night, going on in the morning to Edinburgh in time for the opening session of the Missionary Conference that afternoon. Stirling proved to be an intensely interesting place. The long twilight in Scotland at this time of year would give us until after ten o'clock to look about the town. We made first of all for the old castle at the top of the long steep hill on the side of which the town is builded. Whether because of its intrinsic points of interest, or because it was the first castle we had visited, or simply because the guide was one of the best we had met with in all our trip, the impression remains with us that Stirling Castle was by far the most interesting of the score of venerable castles we visited throughout England and Scotland.

Here was the coveted point of vantage held alternately by the Scotch and English in the intermittent warfare of the days before both kingdoms passed under a single crown. In its broad esplanade stands a grand statue of Robert Bruce, and from the wall one can see the field of Bannockborn where Bruce in 1311 gained his decisive victory over the forces of England. The far-stretching plain, clothed as it was that evening in the golden glow of a wonderful sunset, and backed up in the distance by mighty Ben Lomond, Ben Venue, Ben Ledi and Ben Voirlich, left on our minds a landscape impression least likely to be effaced of all the glorious views of our trip.

Leaving the castle we gained admission to the old Greyfriar's church a little way down the hill and coming out we strolled each according to his own whim through the park-like cemetery stretching up the hill almost to the castle. I had no notion of finding any grave of particular interest and was remaining in the place more for the enjoyment of the landscape than for communion with the spirits of the great dead. Moving toward the church in the direction of the exit gate I happened to descry the name DRUMMOND on a stone, and, looking carefully, made out that it was a simple monument to none other than the world-beloved author of "The Greatest Thing in the World."

A hush fell upon my soul. I was more grateful to see this simple slab than the heroic statue of Bruce or the great monument to William Wallace yonder on another hill, more grateful to behold this spot of earth than the landscape which had fascinated my eyes for the past two hours. For this man more than any other stood to me as the symbol of my spiritual experience in the most strategic period of my life. The past twenty years stood before me in vivid panorama. My early ministry, dealing, as I see it now, with an aspect of life too far beyond the reach of my callow experience to be real, was fertilized by his exposition of the Thirteenth of First Corinthians. How my hand inevitably reached for "Natural Law in the Spiritual World" when the early sermon-making process went hard! It seems to me now that what life, what flesh and blood, my early sermons had, they got from these two books more than from the Bible. For, I must confess, the Bible was not revealed to me as a Book of Life until some years later. I thought of it as a book of law, divided into "dispensations," and I defended its authority and "inspiration" with much ambitious logic. Only as life deepened and I came to feel the need of the Bible in my own soul did I come to realize that it was my business as a preacher to communicate to others the life I myself was able to draw from the Scriptures. So I always think that Drummond saved me in those embryonic years from a wholly lifeless ministry.

But perhaps I exaggerate. One is prone to be unjust to one's earlier self and it may be so in my case. There was one point, however, at which the mind of Henry Drummond touched my own with an influence so vivid and gracious that, as I stood there at his recent grave among those weather-born tomb-stones, I recalled it with indisputable clearness.

After two years of preaching I entered college a sub-freshman. I brought with me a fair intellectual stock, consisting mainly of a thorough knowledge of the Disciples' theology and a finished system of the universe! During my entire college course I preached on Sundays in a town not far away. It was the custom of the churches of that county to hold a "basket meeting" at the county seat sometime in the early fall, and in my Sophomore year I was asked to preach the Sunday evening sermon on this annual occasion. I carefully prepared a sermon on the Dignity of Man, taking my text from the first chapter of Genesis. It must have occupied a good hour in its delivery and more than half of the time I spent on a single one of the divisions of the sermon, viz., the dignity of man's origin. I was delivering a diatribe against the evolutionary theory of man's origin and defending, as I conceived it, the notion of his divine origin. The Scriptures, of course, I arrayed against Darwin, and sought to show that evolution robbed man of his essential dignity.

Next day on returning to the college, I met my best friend on the campus, a man who is today one of the most efficient pastors and preachers among the Disciples, and, as our Monday custom was we exchanged our preaching experiences of the day before. After I had set forth the outline of my sermon and had dwelt at some length on the section which had mainly occupied me in the evening's presentation he asked, rather irrelevantly, I thought,

"By the way, Morrison, have you ever read much on Evolution?"

"O yes," I replied, confidently,

"What have you read?"

"Well, I've read—" but for the life of me I could not think of any significant book or treatise on the subject I had ever read. He interrupted my reflection.

"Have you ever read the 'Origin of Species' or the 'Descent of Man?'"

"No," I admitted, "I have not." And yet I had said quite a bit about these books in my sermon, all in condemnation, of course.

"Have you read Fiske on The Dignity of Man?"

"N-no," I replied, and I felt that a book of that title would have aided me greatly in the preparation of a sermon on the same theme. My friend was not ungentle with me. Yet, in a tactful way, he got me to confess that I had never read anything authoritative on evolution, but had simply formed my judgment on the basis of religious newspapers I had read and sermons I had heard and a certain book on "Christian Evidences" we had used together as a text book.

"Now, look here," he said finally, "you ought not preach that kind of a sermon without reading at least one book on the other side. It isn't candid, not to say honest."

"But the case against evolution is closed," I said, "and I do not wish to waste my time in reading atheistic books."

"You have no right to pronounce them atheistic until you have given them a fair reading," was his reply. He overcame my doggedness and won my consent to read the book he would select for me. Next day he brought me Professor Drummond's "The Ascent of Man." It had only recently been printed and was at the moment being widely discussed by preachers and the newspapers.

I took the book home and devoured it in three days. I neglected my lessons during that time. The book opened a new world to me. It presented to me the possibility of believing in the scientific doctrine of evolution and in God, too—a possibility I had not entertained before. It brought me many problems. It started my mind on a course of thought which was accompanied by much pain for a year or more, but which ended in a new faith, deeper and firmer, as it was richer, for having found God in his work and world without losing Him from his word.

The anguish of that year I can never tell. I used to lie awake at night wondering if I should become an "infidel," or if not an "infidel," a Unitarian. I read everything I could get my hands on bearing upon the modern view of the world. I was much impressed with Benjamin Kidd's "Social Evolution," a "critical" review of which I wrote for a club to which I belonged. I came upon the withered manuscript of it before leaving home for Edinburgh and it revived the struggle of that period of my college life. But there were two things that saved me to my evangelical faith.

One was my Sunday appointment to preach. I didn't want to preach. My mind was in chaos. I used to look with envy at the students who had enough money to go to school without working. I had none. It was preach or give up college. I am glad now I had to preach. I tried to be honest, but I kept my doubts in the background. Nobody knew I was struggling. Fortunately, there was a newly founded Unitarian church in the town. Involuntarily I found myself taking a critical view of the doctrines of this church. I preached much against them. And when they would charge us with standing for the more crass doctrines of orthodoxy, I found my chance to deny that these crass views were essential to Christianity.

So a constructive process was going on in my mind. With the Unitarians as a foil I was rebuilding my own faith and, perhaps, liberating my church from some of its traditions. I feel quite sure that if the Unitarians hadn't been there my ministry would have been destructive and whining. I would have talked more about my doubts than my faith.

I have often thanked God for that one Unitarian church, at least!

The other saving influence in my experience was Drummond himself. He had introduced me to the new world, and he made my faith feel at home there. I came back to his books again and again. The two principles in his "Ascent of Man" that were full of spiritual suggestion to me were the struggle for the life of others which he found in nature as well as the struggle for life, and the idea of *In*volution with which he met the charge that Evolution was atheistic. There is nothing evolved that is not first *in*volved, he said. And if all this world of beauty and love and self-sacrifice and moral ideals has been evolved it was first of all folded into the cosmic order by some rational and spiritual being. If I had the book by me now I should like to set down in this, my travel journal, a great paragraph or two which sent a shaft of light into my unaccustomed mind.

But quite as much as by what he said in his books, Drummond's own personal faith was my stay and support when arguments failed. It is strange how much our faith is based upon somebody else's faith! Henry Drummond always seemed to me a holy man. He was my ideal Christian before I knew him as a "heretic." I had known his life-story, his wonderful evangelistic power, his great love for the sinful, his illimitable faith in men's possibilities of recovery with the help of Christ. And when my faith wavered before some argument, my heart would say, "But there's Drummond; he believes!" and somehow I could not get my consent to make denial.

It seems a long time since then. Much water has flowed under the bridges since "The Ascent of Man" was published. I have come to think of evolution not so much in terms of biology as of logic, now. This scientific conception of the world dominates all modern thinking. Children in the lower grades are being trained to think in the terms of development, of evolution, today, as well as the youth in the university. Happily those scholars who stand in relation to troubled young men similar to that in which Drummond stood to me, are a great host. I suppose that Drummond will not be written down in the impartial history of thought as a philosopher of the first rank. But in the history of my thought he is first, for he did in me what Copernicus did in the solar system and Kant in psychology—he turned the world inside out, which is to say he turned it right side out and right side in.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

Should Children Be "Seen and Not Heard"?

How often have mothers in admonishing their children to be "polite" in the presence of company, repeated the dictum that "children should be seen and not heard"? This, of course, was in the interest of the adult, for it was felt that what the child might have to say would not be interesting to "grown ups"—and possibly too, sometimes because the child might not always be discreet regarding the things which should be told outside the family circle.

But suppose now, we think of the dictum from the standpoint of the child's interests, is it a policy that makes for the development of the child? The child has ideas which to him, at least, are new and interesting. These he must suppress because he is a child. This tends to passivity, and may give a direction to the disposition which will not be overcome during life. A professor of Mathematics in one of the larger State Universities of America admitted to a close personal friend—a teacher of Psychology—that he was never at ease when at any social gathering, that it was difficult for him to enter into the spirit of the company and participate in the conversation. To this man of culture this was one of the greatest embarrassments. He explained it by the fact that his parents had rigidly enforced the principle expressed in the words, "children should be seen and not heard." "As the twig is bent so is the tree inclined."

There is need that the child should find time for normal expression of feelings and ideas. This habit of ready and easy expression of oneself becomes an asset of greatest value in social and business life. Parents might do much toward helping their children to form such habits by talking more frequently of things which are of interest to children, and by talking with their children.

Favorite Verses in the Twelfth Chapter of Romans

It is the living body that is to be offered to God in sacrifice. One who tries to do the work of a day in its day can appreciate what the apostle had in mind. The bodily life as such is unworthy of man but the body made strong by proper care and trained for service is a most precious offering to God. Misunderstanding the character of God, men in ancient times laid their children on the altar of burnt-offering. Other men have neglected the body and treated it as an enemy of true religion. They have thought unkept hair and dirty faces were evidences of exceptional piety. Nervous disorders are the basis of much that is called zeal nowadays. God calls us to serve and for service we need strength of body as well as of mind and heart.

The controversy between the conformists and the non-conformists is as old as the race. No man belongs wholly to either of the parties. The radical in religion may be conservative in politics or he may be radical in theology and a stickler for ecclesiastical order. Paul was a non-conformist in so far as the dominant religion of his day was concerned. He broke with Phariseeism. He was against the prevailing type of religious thought in the Roman world. He was also a radical in the moral realm. The customs of the society of his day were not binding on him. He went forth with an ideal which he gained from Christ and whatever was inconsistent with that ideal met his opposition. Transformation was his aim. The world of material things is good or bad according to the mind that thinks it.

Humility is a virtue we like in others. We do not, however, see it in others even when they possess it in a large measure. The humble man is apt to be the one who does as we wish him to do. The Roman Catholic feels that one who rejects the authority of his church is arrogant, opinionated, irreverent. To the Protestant, on the other hand, the claims of the Catholic are monstrous. He cannot understand how a sane man can submit to them for a moment without stultifying himself. Humility is shown by loyalty to truth and right. The humble man feels that he has no choice, that he must obey God rather than man, and he must honor God by using his own intelligence in the discovery of duty. The proud man boasts of his feathers, of the favors that have been shown to him by the great. The humble man puts the emphasis upon service.

Originality is a desirable possession provided it can be put to some use. Many a person who thinks he is original, that he is a great man whom the foolish world is incapable of estimating at his worth, is merely a being so oddly constructed that he does not fit into any corner of society. Many another who holds himself aloof from the common herd differs from the common man only in his lack of courage to meet the care and discouragement of daily toil. A man of worth fits in somewhere. The Cains and the Ishmaelites have no contribution to the common fund that entitles them to be held in reverence. We are all members of the one body. We must learn to respect the individuality of every member. Each must rejoice in his own work and feel that in the sight of God it is a great importance. And each must feel his dependence upon his brother. Thus will come the sense of unity.

"Let love be without hypocrisy." This text is amplified in the verses that follow. It is love that abhors evil, for love seeks to give every human being a chance to live a complete life of fellowship with God and evil is an undue limitation of life. Love prompts to diligence in business. Laziness and carelessness do not dwell in the same house with love. Laborers slight their work, merchants sell shoddy goods; farmers put rocks in the wagon with the corn, housewives sell bad butter because they are selfish and do not care what harm they do to buyers. Love gives more to the saints than food and clothing; it gives itself. It takes a large minded view of personal injuries. It considers the one who inflicts the injury as well as itself. It keeps a man from making a fool of himself just because he has suffered wrong or there is another fool in his neighborhood.

*Midweek Service, September 7.

Commenting upon the great Knights Templar conclave, held recently in Chicago, The Interior makes a lefthanded thrust at those who fault Christianity because there are hypocrites in the church. It points out the Masonic requirements that a Knight shall make profession of belief in Christ and take a vow of loyalty to his service more explicit than most churches impose on communicants. "If, therefore, Templar ideals were lived up to in thorough honor and seriousness, its membership would be a body as devout in life and circumspect in conduct as any church organization in the world. To high-minded men within the order it must be a grief that the order does not, in fact, enjoy with the general public, any such religious repute as would correspond to the character of its ritual or the prominence of the cross among its emblems. The city of Chicago, perparing for the present triennial conclave of the knights, manifestly did not look forward to a Christian convention, but rather to a jolly good time of hale fellows well met. The saloons must have expected to find a considerable proportion of the convivial among the Masonic visitors, for they were early in covering their street fronts with lavish decorations of Templar colors and flaring signs of welcome to the sir knight. Churches have superabundant shortcomings to confess and many hypocritical members to take shame for. But they have never yet been reduced to the humiliation of seeing saloons decorated in honor of their General Conferences and General Assemblies. Why should the Knights Templar suffer such dubious compliments? Are there not in the order many men who care enough for consistency to make a try at getting the pretensions and the performances of their order into nearer relation? It would be a crusade better than any in which the mediæval Templars ever fought, if there could be set afoot a revival that should lift all sir knights from a ritualistic to a real enlistment in the cause of the cross."

The resignation of Dean Chas. A. Lockhart from the College of the Bible of Christian University, Canton, Mo., brought regret to friends of that institution both within the student body and faculty and throughout the state. Mr. Lockhart has been guided in his teaching and administration by the highest ideals. It is well known that the Canton school is among our more progressive institutions, having on its faculty besides President Johann, a number of teachers of safe, but progressive principles. Compensation and reassurance, following Dean Lockhart's withdrawal, comes with the announcement that the deanship has been extended to Rev. H. B. Robison, Ph. D., of Mobile, Ala. Dr. Robinson is admirably fitted both by temperament and training for just this work. He is a graduate of the New Testament department of the University of Chicago Divinity School, receiving his degree of Ph. D. some three years ago. Since then he has been pastor in El Paso, Texas, and had but recently taken the church at Mobile. Few men among the Disciples have a richer scholarship in the New Testament than he. Canton is to be congratulated. And Dr. Robison is to be congratulated upon the opportunity for doing the kind of work to which both his thorough training and the wish of his heart pointed him.

The Sunday School Journal and Bible Students Magazine has been speaking out with extraordinary frankness of late on the literary abuses of teacher training ideals. Several books on teacher training have received unrestrained criticism at the hands of the editor. In reinforcement of its method of honest and frank dealing with these books the Journal in a recent issue prints a review of the same sort from the columns of Religious Education, the magazine of the Education Society. The review is as follows: "Training for Service, H. Moninger (Standard Publishing Company). Fifty very short and scrappy lessons on fifty big subjects; a good sample of the old ideals in teacher-training. Of course this criticism does not apply to the large amount of borrowed material." To which the editor of the Journal adds: "We agree with this estimate; and, if necessary, we could write a very long and illuminating article on the 'borrowed material' contained in this particular book. 'Borrowed' is a very kind term."

There are signs of promise that many of the churches are placing their missionary offerings on a systematic basis, and are no longer content to depend wholly on the calendar days for the money with which to support the missions and philanthropies in which we are all interested. In such churches the Church Extension Fund is regularly provided for, without any special appeal. But in most of the churches the calendar plan remains in use, and such churches will not forget that September is devoted to the important work of building new churches through the efforts of the Church Extension Fund. This enterprise has now reached proportions that are a satisfaction to all Disciples. But the greater the Fund, the heavier are the demands made upon it. The offering this year ought to be by far the largest in the history of the work. The first Sunday in September is the time, or as soon thereafter as possible.

The colony of Disciples at Pentwater, Mich., grows larger each season. At Garrison Park, south of the channel, the Moores, Garrisons, Jennings and others are to be found. At Campbell Park, on the north shore, new buildings are in process of construction, and such families as the Morrisons, of Springfield and of Chicago, the Willetts, Campbells, Todds, Fawleys, Bushnells and others are in the enjoyment of the rare satisfaction of the locality. A short season of Chautauqua was held this summer, under the auspices of the town officials, and, the number of Disciples who are visitors in the town and the cottages is greater than ever.

How Mayor Gaynor took the affairs of the Police Department into his own hands, how he effected an immense saving to New York in the Department of Docks and Ferries, in the Catskill water-supply works, in the "City Record" printing, and in several costly and needless litigation conflicts,—these, and his wise and fearless appointment of department heads are part of the interesting story of "Municipal Non-Partizanship in Operation" in the September Century, in which James Creelman gives a summary of what has been saved and gained in New York in the first six months of Mayor Gaynor's administration.

The inside story of Dr. Cook's arrival and stay in Copenhagen, has been written for the September Century by Maurice Francis Egan, our Minister to Denmark. It is interesting to have Mr. Egan's word that the majority of the Danes seem to think that the explorer deceived himself; and as for their share in the affair, "they know they acted generously and courageously, and that is enough for them and the rest of the world."

Three Little Dandelions

Three little dandelions, each in yellow gown,
Stood beside the winding road that led to London town,
They heard the merry children, they saw the travelers pass,
And they said to one another, "How sad it is, alas!
That we, too, may not travel and view the world beyond;
We've never even climbed the hill or seen across the pond."

Three little dandelions, each in gown of gold,
Taller grew each summer day in the leafy mold,
Yet they stood on tiptoe and peered through sun and rain,
To see if it was England that lay beyond, or Spain.
One said she saw chimneys and another smoke and soot,
While the third saw ships a-sailing, but they never moved a foot.

Three little dandelions, each in gown of white,
Laid their plans to travel on a dewy night,
And while cooling breezes fanned the waking day,
Spread their wings and vanished, O, so far away.
But if they reached that smoky town or the seashore, as they meant,
I'm sure I'll never tell you, for I don't know where they went.

Irish Bogs and Fens

The bogs and fens of Ireland are things of story and classic allusion. We expected to find bogs and peat in low places, but were surprised to run into the first "turf" fields on the mountain side. It was in north Ireland and we were wheeling, and pushing wheels up and up and still up over the highland roads of rock and gully when suddenly rounding a corner we came upon a great peat bog. We had inquired on the long street of Limvady for the shortest route to Carrick-O-Rede and the Giant's Causeway. Our Irish friends, five of them, had debated warmly over the question, each anxious to serve the strangers with wisdom, but unable to agree among themselves about the momentous matter. One averred it was fifty miles by the sea road, while another championed the route by declaring it was not to exceed a dozen. Three finally agreed on the hill road, declaring it but a couple of hours with a "fine view, sir, even of Scotland's hills and plenty of inns along the road." Being Americans, we accepted the rule of the majority and started our climb. This was at eleven in the morning, and at the end of the two hours we were still rounding one turn after another in the steep road, ever hoping the next would bring us to the summit. Civilization was behind us and not a house was in sight, let alone an inn. This multiplied our appetite by ten, and it was already enormous. Another two hours passed and nothing appeared but little cattle and the far away stretches of grass-fringed rocks, when suddenly we came upon a herder's hut.

"Thankful to Have an Appetite Left"

An old woman was sitting by the door eating out of a bowl, but our determination to ask for something forsook us as we drew near. The "gintlemen that pays the rint" was good naturedly nosing about the interior of the mansion, one end of which was occupied by the donkey. Just here, almost at the summit, we came upon the peat bog. By a swift coasting, dodging boulders, we were in the little village of Kiltinny, a mile below, in five minutes time, with the fine rage of bread rioters in our eyes. A buxom young Irish matron was found who offered us the best she had. It was a bowl of milk (it was July and there is no ice up there) and a loaf of bread baked without ever having heard of yeast cakes. But we had appetites. When we passed the herder's cabin we were like poor Pat when the butcher gave him a bone and the greyhound snatched it from under his arm; we were "thankful to have an appetite left." Now with the spread before us, the milk up to the latest lacteal requirements of the koumiss experts and the bread baked like army hard-tack, we became converts to the theory that an appetite is better than a feast. We found that the peat diggers received sixty cents per day for the days they worked. That meant no pay for rainy times, of which there are many in Ireland, and none for winter days or the seasons when the product was too great for the market. Here were tens of thousands of acres we had traveled over with scarce a house in sight and yet the diggers of this turf lived in a squalid row of stone cabins, cheek by jowl, with the roadway hard by the door and no yard or garden to lend an appearance of sharing the plenty of the great landowner who had received it all, without a penny's cost, from his paternal ancestors. But the great, luxurious Irish roses were blooming over the thatch of the cabins as if trying to hide the squalor within and turn the eye of the traveler from the poverty of the people to the waste of the nature that was so abundant about them.

Life on the Rich Lowlands

In County Kildare we saw great fields of turf where an area of twenty acres had been sliced down around until but an acre remained in the center, standing ten feet high, with its green crown and black, shining sides, waiting further incursions from the digger's spade. Everywhere the land is dotted with the black surface of the turf fields and every cotter has his rights to the turf. The law protects him in them and there he digs his winter's fuel in the summer days, cutting it into ricks like piles of bricks for the kiln, and drying the rootlets for the open hearth.

We were anxious for a closer sight of the rich lowlands than had been afforded in the first days when we were upon them. A trip across central Ireland from Tralee to Dublin gave ample study of conditions there. In the west central country the land is gently rolling, the soil is full of pebbles, but is productive, and the pastures are green and juicy. Many large manorial farm houses are found and the hasty traveler could write his car window impressions and tell of the prosperity of the country. But the apparent prosperity is confined to the owners of the soil. The laborers and small tenants fare little better than their brethren of the hills. In fact, the conditions in the very richest of the pasture lands are no better than among the cotters of the mountainous districts, so far as the men who do the work are concerned. The herders live in the same small, floorless cabins, and the highest percentage of lunacy comes, not from poverty-stricken Galway or Mayo, but from Meath, where the grass is most luxuriant and the land the most valuable. In Galway and Mayo there is at least a rugged struggle for existence while among the herds there is a listless monotony and no incentive, and squalor sinks into hopelessness and insanity on its three dollars and fifty cents per week.

The farms average larger after you descend from the hills of Kerry to the rolling lands of Limerick, and stock and dairy industries grow. The long, low, thatch-roofed farm houses begin to appear in the midst of the typical cabins. They look more prosperous and begin to approach the type of the poorer class of English farm houses. They are occupied by a middle class, a class between the tenant on the big estate and the large land owner. They are a relic of the days when it was the custom to sublet the land in farms of some extent to a sort of middle man, who paid the lord in large sums and farmed it out to the small tenant or worked it with hired help. A close inspection of one of these farm houses reveals anything but good hygienic arrangements or the prosperity typical of an American farm. The house usually stands at the end of a private road and has a low wall about it, inside of which are the stables and other outhouses. The whole forms a hollow square about an inner court, where animals, dogs and children occupy common ground. The laborers live in cabins on the farm in the typical peasant way, and the whole aspect does not impress the student as making for any betterment of life over that of the tenant peasantry. The rent goes up to twice that of the poorer lands, and the landlord lives in London, but keeps a small staff of servants at the mansion on the estate, to which he comes with friends for an occasional shooting of grouse and pheasants.

We visited the estate of the Earl of Drogheda. It covers ten thousand acres of good Irish soil, for which "his grace" has been in the habit of drawing $50,000 for his London mansion. The tenantry have now purchased their holdings under the Wyndham Act at about ninety dollars per acre. This means that the Commission gives them an abatement of between 25 and 30 per cent on account of excessive rent and to recoup them for the improvements they had made for themselves. These rich lands will now turn their fruitage into the homes of the toilers, from whose fathers they were taken by the fortunes of war, though, of course, they must pay from their earnings the million that the Earl is able to claim as the price of his inheritance.

The Prayer of Beaten Men

"We are the fallen, who, with helpless faces
Low in the dust, in stiffening ruin lay,
Felt the hoof's beat, and heard the rattling traces
As o'er us drove the chariots of the fray.

"We are the fallen, who, by ramparts gory,
Awaiting death, heard the far shouts begin,
And with our last glance glimpsed the victor's glory
For which we died, but dying might not win.

"We were but men. Always our eyes were holden,
We could not read the dark that walled us round,
Nor deem our futile plans with thine enfolden—
We fought, not knowing God was on the ground.

"Give us our own; and tho' in realms eternal
The potsherd and the pot, belike, are one,
Make our old world to know that with supernal
Powers we were matched, and by the stars o'erthrown.

"Ay, grant our ears to hear the foolish praising
Of men—old voices of our lost home-land,
Or else, the gateways of this dim world raising,
Give us our swords again, and hold thy hand."

Church Extension Achievements

Two Samples Out of Many Hundreds

Twin Falls, Iowa

By W. L. McCollough, Minister.

At the beginning of this rapidly growing city, in 1905, Brother L. F. Stephens, of Portland, Ore., came here under the direction of the church at Dayton, Wash., secured a lot and erected the first Christian Church in Twin Falls. The building was dedicated December 4, 1905, and an organization, of thirty-six charter members, was formed. Since then the membership has grown to more than 175 with a Bible-school enrollment of 170. A year ago it became necessary to sell the old building and to build larger. One of the best located corner lots in the city, 100 by 125 feet, facing the city park, was secured and the present building erected upon it. Our new building is fifty feet square, with a basement under the entire building. The main auditorium has a raised floor; is seated diagonally with chairs, and has a capacity of 425. The concrete basement walls are strong enough to sustain a brick structure, with the idea of enlarging and building better when conditions require it. The basement is arranged for Endeavor, and Bible-school work, being divided into class rooms, four of which can be thrown together for social purposes; also a kitchen fully equipped, a coal room, and other modern conveniences. Our church is not showy, but roomy and convenient. One year ago we had a church property worth $1,800. Now we have a church property worth $10,000.00. We now have room to grow and no doubt will accomplish a large work for the Master.

Before we received a promise of help from our Church Extension Board we were contemplating erecting a $3,000.00 building, but when notified the board would help us $1,800.00, a new inspiration seized us and we built a $6,000.00 building. Our building was completed the latter part of May. Brother D. B. Titus, of Rupert, Idaho, was secured to hold a short meeting and to dedicate for us. The meeting resulted in twenty-six additions, and on June 12, 1910, we dedicated our new church, out of debt, with the aid of $1,800.00 from the Church Extension Board. Twin Falls is an important place, rapidly growing into a city. This work could not have been accomplished without the help from our Church Extension Board. The $1,800.00 we received from the board practically called out $3,000.00 from the congregation. We now have the best auditorium in town, and a church as conveniently arranged as any in the city. This means more than can be estimated, in our future work. All praise to the Church Extension Board which is making such victories possible. We would have been handicapped for years had not this timely help come to us in our great need. Brethren, let us see to it, that this year's offering for Church Extension is much larger than any previous year, that help may be granted to the many, many, needy fields, that the work of the Master shall be crowned with victory. If we are indifferent, the work of the Lord must suffer in many important places. This help means so much just now in this rapidly growing west. The Lord bless our offering in September. Your grateful servant in His name.

Out of Discouragement

By A. H. Jordan.

I came to Loraine last December, and found the church struggling with a heavy debt on their building. In January, the mortgage on the church was due, and must be paid. Of course, the church was in no condition to pay the amount, and the trustees began to seek a new loan. After much looking and many discouragements they found an individual who would lend the required amount for five years with interest at seven per cent. None of the principal would be allowed paid till the expiration of the term mentioned. These terms seemed very hard, and we wondered what we could do. I finally decided to ask the Church Extension Board for a loan to help us in our time of need. As soon as I reached this determination I wrote Brother Muckley, who immediately sent me the proper blanks to fill out. These were returned at once, and in a few days we received word that the Board had granted us a loan of $4,000.

After making our titles perfectly clear, which they were not before, the matter was closed, and the draft for the promised amount received. We have paid the old mortgage, and are now taking steps to pay off the loan of the Church Extension as fast as possible.

We have a loyal band of people here, and we expect to produce great results, for the church feels encouraged because of the help of the Church Extension Board. Without this help the people would have felt very much down-hearted, and little good would be accomplished.

Loraine is a thriving town of thirty thousand people, and has the largest fresh water dry dock in the world. A mammoth plant of the United States Steel Corporation is located here, employing nine thousand men. There is a great future for the town, and we believe just as great a future for our church. Our Bible-school overflows the building, and is growing all the time. In The near future we will have the largest church in the city.

The work here will be properly maintained in all departments, and in this way will grow rapidly. We expect a large Offering for Church Extension this year from the church.

Our brethren desire me to extend their heartfelt thanks for the kindness of the Church Extension Board, and pledge their hearty support to all its undertakings.

Dr. W. C. Widdowson is ready to resume his work in Africa. His health is completely restored.

Secretary E. W. Allen will conduct a long campaign of Foreign Missionary Conferences Rallies, during the fall and winter. He will have with him at least two foreign missionaries. He plans to cover the states of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma and Texas. Brother Allen is a specialist in this work. If you desire one of these Rallies it would be well for you to write him at 611 W. 32nd street, Kansas City, Mo.

A SERIAL STORY

"On the contrary, I told mother not to expect me this evening. I am quite free to remain in Brigend until tomorrow." Mr. Sinclair hesitated. Something within seemed to be warning him not to trust this man who made him this friendly offer, with so fair a face. Archie laughed lightly and turning to Jeanie he said, with scarcely concealed emphasis:

"Cousin Jeanie put on your warmest wrappings and come away for a run yourself, Mr. Sinclair seems afraid to trust his precious life." Jeanie flashed a swift glance into Mr. Sinclair's face. In an instant his pride was in arms. He would rush into dire disaster rather than have her think him a coward. With sparkling eyes and heightened color he answered, hastily:

"What is there to fear, Mr. Monteith? If you do not mind waiting while I make my visit, I shall only be too glad to accept your offer."

"I do not mind in the least, I assure you, so come away."

"You have not a warm coat, Mr. Sinclair," Jeanie said, almost timidly. "Let me get one of father's." Archie turned to the window and looked out. He feared they might see how he ground his teeth.

Jeanie threw a window open to watch them start. How coolly Archie guided the car from the window where Jeanie sat. His spirits wheels almost touched a great heap of iron that lay in front of the house, waiting to be stowed away in a loft. Mr. Sinclair, in one of Mr. Graeme's heaviest overcoats, looked considerably bigger than usual. As he took his seat by Archie's side, he glanced towards the back yard out into the wide road. The were up and he was a boy again. Laughingly he kissed his hand to her. Nothing escaped Archie's keen eyes. The minister's action maddened him. Without a glance towards the watcher at the window, he shut his lips tightly over his clenched teeth, and they were off.

No sooner had they rushed out of sight, than Jeanie was seized with dread of, she knew not what. She knew in her heart that Mr. Sinclair did not wish to go with her cousin. She did not, for one moment, imagine that he feared to go, but she knew quite well that he did not pretend to admire her cousin Archie. She felt that he had gone only because of Archie's sneering words about his want of courage. Why had she been glad at first, when Mr. Sinclair declared his readiness to go? Would it not have been wiser of her to advise him not to go? It would have been easy enough to say that the weather had become much too cold for motoring, to one not accustomed to it. If anything happened to him—she laid her hand on her heart to still its tumult. He was dearer to her than life. Every doubt was swept away. At last she knew that the love of her heart was his, and she had sent him forth, perhaps to death. How that terrible hour passed, she never cared to recall. How often she had listened at the open window, she did not know, when at last the toot, toot, of the motor horn sounded not far off. She flew to the window with glad heart as they came forward not at all furiously. But suddenly the car seemed to take a wild leap, it swerved and with a sickening crash seemed to become part of the mass of iron that lay on the street. She did not faint or scream but like a bird on the wing she flew downstairs. The next instant her arms were round the prostrate form of the minister, where he lay one arm pinioned between two heavy pieces of iron. He was quite conscious, perhaps pain kept him so. As Jeanie bent over him, regardless of the gathering crowd, the smile that lit up his face for a moment, told her that he understood.

Not thinking of herself, but of him, she cried wildly:

"Oh, help Mr. Sinclair. His arm is caught between the pieces of iron."

Strong men were ready to weep as they released him. Then they saw that the poor arm was like a jelly bag. Jeanie would have taken the crushed member into her arms, had some one not kindly pushed her back. It was no sight for her.

"A doctor," some one cried.

"Three doctors," cried Jeanie. It was the whole medical staff of Brigend.

Nurse Greene was there at once, giving orders. Jeanie found herself being forcibly led away from the terrible scene. She looked up and saw that it was Donald, with tears running over his cheeks, who was leading her away. She gazed round her, dry-eyed, and bewildered.

"Where's Archie?" she said in a hard voice.

"Never mind him, Jeanie, I think he's only stunned. They're bringing him to."

"He's a murderer," she sobbed. "Nothing less."

CHAPTER XVII.

A Heartless Rival.

The doctors' faces were of the gravest. A few minutes' consultation was sufficient.

Doctor Forbes, being senior practitioner in Brigend and a particular friend of the minister's, took upon himself the painful duty of telling Mr. Sinclair, the result of the consultation.

"It deeply grieves me, Mr. Sinclair, to have to tell you the decision which my colleagues and myself have arrived at."

"Tell me the worst, Doctor."

"The arm must come off."

"Must?"

"Yes, must—it is a pulp." A spasm of pain crossed the minister's face. His eyes were unnaturally bright, as he cast an eager look over the group gathered round him. Perhaps he looked for a face that he might not see again till they met in the better land. But there were present only the three doctors, Nurse Greene, Mr. Graeme and Donald. That hasty glance was all. Then he bowed his head and said calmly:

"I am in God's hand, and yours, gentlemen."

Mrs. Graeme, sick with apprehension, climbed the stair to James Douglas' room. She was of no use in the dining-room, where the grim, determined looking doctors were. But what a mercy Nurse Greene was there. How ever did civilization progress so far, without these brave women? As she passed by, she pushed Jeanie's room door slightly open and peeped in. The young girl was on her knees by the white bedside, her hands clasped over her bowed face. Her mother drew back noiselessly, and raised her own face heavenwards. Does the world not gain as much through its praying women as through its working ones? Perhaps the one is but the outcome of the other.

As Mrs. Graeme reached the invalid's door, she stopped on the threshold. Taking her handkerchief from her pocket, she rubbed her white face till she brought color into it. The patient must know nothing of this terrible accident, till health and strength were assured. When she at last stepped softly into the room, her face wore its usual calm expression. James was awake. As she approached the bed, he smiled gratefully into her eyes, his own holding the expression often seen in the eyes of a great collie dog for a kind master.

"You've had a beautiful sleep James—but there's to be no conversation yet awhile."

"Just a few words," he whispered.

"It's to be all about beef-tea and such-like and I'm to do the talking. Here, drink this, lad, then I'll settle your pillows. Ye'll see how comfortable I can make you." Again that beseeching look was on his face. But silently, he sipped the nourishment given him. She lifted the weary head and turned the pillows, smoothing them out deftly with one hand, lest a wrinkle might remain to disturb him.

"How good you are," he sighed.

"You would do as much for anyone of us, lad, but remember, no talking, James."

"Only this, when will they be allowed to see me, Miss Jeanie, and Donald?"

"You will see them all when the doctor thinks you are able to bear it."

"And Mr. Sinclair?" Here was a question she was not prepared for. With great presence of mind she turned away to poke the fire with a piece of stick. When she came back to the bedside, she was ready to reply:

"Mr. Sinclair is one of the first to say that no one must come near you, but the nurse and myself, till the doctor gives leave." With a sigh of contentment, he closed his eyes. Heaven had come down to earth in the form of rest.

In the state of excitement into which Jeanie had been thrown by the terrible sight she had witnessed, even prayer for any length of time was impossible. Rising from her knees, she glided down the stair like a ghost. With shuddering uncertainty grasping her very heart, she stole past the closed dining-room door and entered the drawing room. At first she thought it was empty. But presently she noticed that the deep Chesterfield lounge was drawn in front of the fire. She moved quickly forward and saw Archie Monteith, pale and trembling, lying limply among its cushions. Involuntarily, she recoiled, as her eyes rested on him.

"Jeanie, don't," he cried, wildly, as he raised himself to a sitting posture for a moment, and fell back again among the cushions. Was he badly hurt, she wondered dully. But the thought of the sufferer in the other room, crushed the pity out of her heart.

"Why did you do it, Archie? It is nothing short of murder."

"Oh, Jeanie, this from you, whom I could die for."

"I do not want to hear what you could do for me, Archie. You have done what I will never forgive you for, never."

"It was an accident, Jeanie, a pure accident," he pleaded, miserably.

"I was at the window and saw it done. Don't talk to me of an accident," she said, sternly.

"I tell you, Jeanie, you wrong me. I quite forgot about the iron piled on the street. I was merely turning the motor in with a dash. Just to frighten the timid man beside me. Indeed, I am not sure but he caught my hands before the accident happened. It was more his fault than mine. He was shaking with fear all the way."

"You are a coward, Archie," she exclaimed sternly, "to accuse our minister so, even while he is suffering excruciating pain, perhaps dying through you."

"You wrong me, Jeanie, you wrong me," he moaned. "And you do not seem to care that I am suffering. No one seems to care, indeed. Even your saintly minister allows three doctors and a nurse to wait on him, while I am left to suffer alone."

The Message of Nuremburg

Religious Record and Prophecy of a European City

BY CATHERINE F. LINDSAY.

Nuremburg is the oldest and quaintest of the large cities of Germany. It has about 300,000 inhabitants. Old cities like old people, if they have really been continuously a part of the world-life, may sometimes, out of the wisdom of experience, attain the prophet's vision, and forecast the future. We visited Nuremburg four years ago, and are here again. Both times she has given us the same message as to the future.

More clearly than in any other place we find preserved here the high-water marks of man's advance in Christian civilization as he has struggled upward through centuries. In no other place have we found the new life developing from so much of the reverently preserved past: the venerated expression of the old thought and life as it leads up to the new. The general appearance of the towers, walls, old palaces, frowning castles, public buildings, patrician residences, awe-inspiring churches, all combine to give the visitor a dream-like impression that he has been carried back into the fourteenth or fifteenth century, with the knowledge that even then he would be in an old city. The churches are of the 13th century, with the records of the periods following, in additions and decorations, all the way down to the present time. The beautiful Rath-Lans (town hall) dates from 1332. When one walks northward past streets of these reverend buildings up to the "Emperor's Palace," (Kaiserburg), full of associations with Frederick Barbarossa, (12th century), who enlarged and beautified the then "old fortress," he is lost in his effort to vivify the world of eight centuries past. The elm trunk, bound with bands and ivy-covered, in the center of the court, is said to have been planted by the Empress Kunigunde in 1012. The great double-headed eagle in yellow on the ceiling of one room recently discovered under a coat of whitewash, tells of a time and an artist that no one can now authenticate. The instruments of torture in the lower prisons tell the story of the unmeasurable agony of prisoners, and of a long succession of rulers in whom was not yet developed the germ of that spirit-life of love to which Christ referred when he said, "The kingdom of God is within you," yet the heroic deeds of these same men are celebrated in the pictures and statues of the rooms above. Like the Jews of old, sometimes giants in patriotism, love of their own women, children and homes—but cruel as wild beasts to their enemies.

Brotherhood Absent from Art.

Bowing before the crucifix, their artists, exponents of the thought of their time, painted or carved out in wood or stone, their imaginary heaven and hell, always with the motive uppermost, to work each for his own personal, individual glory, without the faintest idea of the brotherhood of man, the true life of service, the meaning of "Whosoever loseth his life for my sake shall find it".

The Germanic Museum is largely a history in stone and wood-carving, bronze and paint, of Nuremburg from its very beginnings. The year 1450 was as important a date as 1809 is to us of the United States. In that year were born Adam Kraft, the sculptor and Veit Stoss, the wood carver; only five years later Peter Vischer, the artist in brass. In the museum are preserved the old statues and pictures which were the art teachers of these three boys, saints, madonnas and martyrs, in all manner of unnatural attitudes, and with forms almost grotesque. These three great men inaugurated a new era, a little earlier that the Renaissance of Italy. They endeavored to represent human life as it really was. To them religion was not all the attitudinizing of exaltations and ecstasies, of clasped hands and upturned eyes.

Genius of Albrecht Durer.

Then followed that greatest genius in expression through painting, Albrecht Dürer, a little earlier than Michael Angelo. Raphael and all his followers repeat over and over in their pictures the variations of the Fornarina face, so DaVinci and his school the face of Mona Lisa. In our modern pre-Raphaelites, every woman is more or less the portrait of Mrs. Wm. Morris. The subjects of each of these schools of art are limited to a very narrow line of thought. But this revolutionist, Albrecht Dürer, took Nature for his teacher. He discarded artificiality. He painted, sketched, designed, as many phases of life as there were in his world, old men and young men, women and children, rich and poor, birds, flowers, animals, palaces, cottages, altars, stoves, cupboards, cups, costumes—in short, everything that he could see or think out, from field-grass to city wall and watch tower. He called the people away from exaggerated formalism to natural, simple expression. He was a prophet of a new age, the precursor of the present day message of Nüremburg.

The record of the evolution of thought is very strikingly seen in the room of costumes in the Germanic Museum. The almost barbaric display of color, distortions of the human figure, meaningless profusion of ornament, are indeed very childlike.

They are the expression of the same stage of development when buildings were weighted down with meaningless ornament, and remind us of some houses we have seen in our own country where the parlors were crowded with a heterogeneous mass of decoration utterly without significance or any possible connection with the uses of the rooms. In Nüremburg one can trace through centuries the gradual growth of the real Christ-Spirit in art.

Prophecy of the Future.

The prophecy of the future is suggested in the exhibits of furnished rooms where subdued colors harmonize like soft, sweet music, where every piece of the simple decorations suggests the use for which that particular room is intended—each room the expression of its one idea, a living room, a library, a music room, a dining room, or even a kitchen or pantry, and, all together they express comfort, peace, home—the most perfect environment for life.

Our Father teaches us this lesson in every mature human face, always the expression of the life that has fashioned it. The very best dress of our most truly cultured women is at last embodying the same ideal. Occasionally we see women whose clothes do not suggest old or new fashion, but seem to accenuate the personality of the wearer. I saw an illustration yesterday. In the rooms of a large art gallery, in a crowd of very promiscuous people, many of whom were rushing past masterpieces and pausing before commonplaces, talking loud, making themselves conspicuous in all sorts of ways, I observed closely one quiet young woman, dressed in a soft subdued blue silk costume, plain, harmonious, short skirt, modest hat to match. She stood near the entrance to each room for a few moments, looked about quietly, carried no Baedeker to select the starred pictures, but, after a careful view of the whole, went with what seemed an infallible intutition to stand before the masterpiece of the room. That young American girl is a harbinger.

In attending the simple Protestant service of a great cathedral, once Catholic, and having in its walls the record of centuries, we recalled Christ's conversation with the woman of Samaria. Her mind was questioning as to the comparative merits of the temples at Jerusalem and on Mt. Gerazim. Jesus answered, "The time will come when men will worship the Father in spirit and in truth."

The Goal of Religion.

The final man will not express his worship of the Father in elaborately decorated temples, rich vestments and ritual,—but in such self-sacrificing service to his brethren as is now beginning to be inaugurated in our missionary work, hospitals, industrial schools, settlement organizations, every manner of human effort that can help to give the unfortunate child, woman, or man, a chance for the highest possible development —the expression of the real "Brotherhood of Man," as taught and exemplefied by "The Son of Man."

The Lord's Day service will then be the simplest possible reverential communion with the Father, with Christ and the Brethren, a season of thanksgiving, and of taking in the Bread of Heaven that we may have spiritual strength to give out through another week. This consummation is foretold in the prophecy and message of the art of Nüremburg, as in our own American Craftsman movement, in Pastor Wagner's "Simple Life," in all the strivings of modern thought after the expression of spiritual power, the subservience of matter to mind, some of them very distorted indeed, yet struggles toward this same consummation—to "Worship the Father in spirit and in truth."

Nüremburg, July 17.

Additional Church Life Items

P. A. Sherman has opened a day school in Hatta and hopes to fill it with children from the low castes.

H. Maxwell Hall, a recent graduate of Yale Divinity School, has accepted a call to the pastorate of the church at Athens, Ohio, the seat of the Ohio University. His work begins about Sept. 1.

There have been twelve added to the church at Spencer, Ind., since last report. A. T. Shaw is the pastor. On returning from his summer vacation, the church presented him with a nice increase in salary.

Myron C. Settle superintendent of Kansas Sunday-schools is organizing his field rapidly into systematic mission study. There are already ninety-one Bible schools in Kansas that have appointed regular missionary superintendents and fifty-four Bible schools are using a regular monthly missionary program.

Joseph I. Irwin, long-time chief factor in the Christian church at Columbus, Ind.; prominent citizen of his state; father-in-law to Z. T. Sweeney; liberal giver to missions; generous friend of all good causes, died at his summer home in Canada, Aug. 13. The funeral occurred at his home church and was attended by a great throng of people. W. H. Book preached the funeral sermon.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 4.

Theme for the Day—In the Sanctuary.

Scripture—I was in the spirit on the Lord's day, Rev. 1:10.

Jehovah, I love the habitation of thy house, and the place where thy glory dwelleth, Psalm 26:8.

Here holy thoughts a light have shed
From many a radiant face,
And prayers of humble virtue made
The perfume of the place.

And anxious hearts have pondered here
The mystery of life,
And prayed the eternal Light to clear
Their doubts, and aid their strife.
—R. W. Emerson ("Hymn").

Prayer—Merciful Father, Thou hast brought to us this good day of rest and of worship. It brings to us the memory of the great events in the story of our salvation from sin. And as our Savior rose on this day from the dead, may we through Thy mercy and sustaining power rise higher in the life of the spirit, and share more fully the companionship of all the pure in heart. Bless to us the assembly of Thy people today, and may the message of the cross inspire us to nobler living, and more Christ-like conduct. We ask in his blessed name. Amen.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 5 (LABOR DAY).

Theme for the Day—The Brotherhood of Work.

Scripture—Man goeth forth unto his work, and to his labor until the evening, Psalm 104:23.

Every man also, to whom God hath given . . . power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labor; this is the gift of God, Eccl. 5:19.

I know thy labor and thy patience, Rev. 2:2.

And his spirit leaps within him to be gone before him then,
Underneath the light he looks at, in among the throngs of men:
Men, my brothers, men the workers, ever reaping something new:
That which they have done but earnest of the things that they shall do.
—Alfred Tennyson ("Locksley Hall").

Prayer—Our Father, our Master has taught us that Thou art the great and eternal Worker, who hast through the ages wrought at the fabric of the worlds and the upward progress of man. We praise Thee for this divine comradeship which we have with Thee in good and profitable work. We are all of us bound together in a common labor and a common necessity. We pray Thy blessing on all who work for their daily bread. May the souls of men, whatever their tasks, be brought into close sympathy with each other, so that strifes shall cease, and the workers shall be glad in the labor, and receive a just and ample compensation. In Jesus' name. Amen.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 6.

Theme for the Day—Is that all?

Scripture—If we have only hoped in Christ in this life, we are of all men most pitiable . . . The last enemy that shall be abolished is death, 1 Cor. 15:19, 26.

A little dreaming by the way;
A little toiling day by day;
A little pain, a little strife,
A little joy—and that is life.

Just dreaming, loving, dying so,
The actors in the drama go—
A flitting picture on the wall,
Love, death, the themes; but is that all?
—Paul Laurence Dunbar ("The Sum").

Prayer—Our Father, when we take inventory of our daily work, our joys and our troubles, and see the hardship that comes to many of our fellow beings in the world, we are at times tempted to wonder what is the meaning of it all, and if it is worth while. We know that the only answer that can satisfy is to be found in seeing the whole of life, and all of its meaning. Help us not to live within narrow limits, where courage might well fail, and the true value of things be lost. But may we see that all life is one, here and hereafter, and that we can only be satisfied when we awake in Thy likeness. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 7.

Theme for the Day—The Real Self.

Scripture—For as he thinketh in his heart, so is he, Prov. 23:7.

What are you? The tale of your breeding and birth,
The brute or the baron, whichever you seem?
Is that what is shown by the light from your hearth
When you sit alone with your hope and your dream?
When you shed the garment of meekness or pride
And sit with yourself, as a man has to do,
You know what is thought by your brothers outside—
Are they right? Are they wrong? Are they picturing You?
—Wilbur D. Nesbit ("Self").

Prayer—Holy Father, help us not to deceive ourselves by any false professions of goodness. We know that no outward conformity to rules, no compliance with acts of religious character can have any value in Thy sight unless we are in our deepest souls interested in the progress of the kingdom of God in ourselves and in all the world. Help us to be sure of ourselves and to know that we are to be judged not by appearances, but by the actual purposes of our lives. So may our real selves meet Thy approval and find the true path of peace. We ask in the Master's name. Amen.

THURSDAY SEPTEMBER 8.

Theme for the Day.—The Unfailing Light.

Scripture.—Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path.—Psalm 119:105.

But the path of the righteous is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.—Prov. 4:18.

If I stoop
Into a dark tremendous sea of cloud,
It is but for a time; I press God's lamp
Close to my breast; its splendor, soon or late,
Will pierce the gloom: I shall emerge one day.
—Robert Browning ("Paracelsus").

Prayer.—O Thou God of all comfort and peace, we adore Thee as the Giver of all that we need. Thy mercies are unfailing, and all Thy gifts to us are fitted to our best desires. In the way that we take be Thou our companion and guide. May the clear shining of the light of Thy Word and Thy Spirit save us from all misadventure and defeat. We would learn more trustfully to walk by faith, and not by sight.. And may we not fail to find at last Thy glory. For we ask in the name and through the grace of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 9.

Theme for the Day.—The Power of Hope.

Scripture.—For in hope are we saved: but hope that is seen is not hope, for who hopeth for that which he seeth? But if we hope for that which we see not, then do we with patience wait for it.—Rom. 8:24, 25.

The thing we long for, that we are
For one transcendent moment,
Before the Present poor and bare
Can make its sneering comment.
—James Russell Lowell ("Longings").

Prayer.—Our Gracious God, teach us what powers for self-enrichment lie within our reach every day. Make us to comprehend in some true measure how possible it is for us to become what we will by Thy help, and that what we long to be in strength, holiness and fulness of life we already begin to be in the earnest desire of the heart. If then we may be like Thyself even for one moment, may we not repeat that blessed experience, until it shall begin to be habitual? Take our hand, we beseech Thee, and lead us in straight ways to the habitation of Thy holiness. And in the life to come grant us the eternal blessedness of Thy presence. For Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10.

Theme for the Day.—Divine Gifts and Human Gratitude.

Scripture.—Thou visitest the earth and waterest it, thou greatly enrichest it. . . . thou crownest the year with thy goodness, and thy paths drop fatness.—Psalm 65:9, 11.

For Summer's bloom and Autumn's blight,
For bending wheat and blasted maize,
For health and sickness, Lord of light
And Lord of darkness, hear our praise!
—J. G. Holland ("Bitter-Sweet").

Prayer.—Dear God and Father of mankind, we commit ourselves and all men into Thy care. Thou hast guided us through this week. Make Thy continued presence with us the solace of our lives and the assurance that nothing can separate us from Thy love. All the order of nature is Thy plan. May we see in it the work of a loving and provident Friend. Upon our home and our hearts let Thy mercy fall, and give us strength enough for each day's work. At last lead us into the larger life for which we have made ready. For Thy name and for Thy mercy's sake. Amen.

Eureka College has promise of the largest enrollment for the coming session that it has had for many years.

J. H. DeWeese of Lexington, Ky., has been called to the pastorate of Christian church at Ripley, Ohio.

J. W. Underwood recently of the Church of Christ of Ashtabula, Ohio, has become pastor of one of the Pittsburg churches.

The corner stone of the new Kher Street Church in Buffalo, N. Y., was laid Sunday, August 21. Roy E. Deadman is the minister.

Charles W. Dean, who has been state evangelist of Colorado for some time, is to become the pastor at Fort Collins October 1.

E. E. Elliott, assistant brotherhood secretary, was recently detained in his old home city, Peoria, Ill., for some days by illness in his family.

Jack Lewis, the singer of New Castle, Pa., will assist the Eureka pastor, David H. Shields, in a meeting beginning about November 1st.

J. Harry Bullock has resigned at Footville, Wis., and accepted a call to Richland Center, Wis. There were two addition at Footville, August 14.

During a ten days' meeting at Westford, Ky., five people were added to the church, three of them by baptism. W. D. Bartle did the preaching.

The First Church at Covington, Ky., has called as its minister George H. Brown of Charlestown, Ill., and the call has been accepted.

F. W. Mutchler, after three years of very successful work as minister of the church at Panora, Iowa, August 15 became pastor of the Grant Park Church in Des Moines.

The various Protestant Sunday schools of Warren, Ohio, are to hold a union picnic on Labor Day. The schools of the two Christian churches are decidely active in the enterprise.

S. M. Connor of Hillyard, Wyoming, is supplying the pulpit of the Central Christian Church of Spokane, Washington, Sunday mornings while the pastor, C. F. Stevens, is on his vacation trip.

H. Erwin Stafford, pastor of the Christian church at Massillon, Ohio, spent his vacation during August in Canada. The church paper "The Massillon Messenger," printed a number of newsy letters from him.

At the thirteenth annual camp-meeting of northwest Texas, W. A. Haynes, evangelist, and Charles E. McVay, singer, there were a large number of confessions. During the first eight days there were fourteen.

The new $60,000 church at Marshalltown, Iowa, will be dedicated September 4. Secretary I. N. McCash will be the dedicator. The pastor, H. C. Morris, has wrought a good work and deserves great credit.

W. E. Harlow will begin a meeting in the West Bluff mission in Peoria, Ill., Sept. 4. This is where the chapel was built in a day through the management of the Men's Brotherhoods in the Central and Howett Street Churches.

W. W. Weedon recently resigned as pastor at Blue Mound, Ill., to accept the pastorate at Assumption, Ill. Blue Mound now desires a minister and would also entertain a proposition for a special meeting in September or October. Address E. J. Clements.

Next Sunday Peter Ainslie, president of the American Christian Missionary Society, will be in Chicago, preaching for C. G. Kindred at the Englewood church. The Englewood brethren will doubtless get a vision of the great possibilities of home missions.

The two churches in Evansville have recently united in one under the leadership of W. E. Sweeney as pastor of the united church. The growth and prosperity of the church is such as to call for an enlargement of the present building and the plans are already formulating.

George T. Snively as evangelist and Charles E. McVay as singer are to hold a meeting for the church at Owosso, Mich., beginning soon. C. M. Keene is the hard working and efficient minister under whose direction one of the finest small church buildings in Michigan has recently been completed.

Secretary I. N. McCash is moving his family to Eureka, Ill., that his daughter may enter Eurkea College. Dr. McCash spent Sunday the 14th at Eureka presenting the claims of American missions to the church in the morning and addressing a union lawn service in the evening.

The Bellingham, Wash., Reveille, states that Allen Hickey, a famous Iowa preacher, is sojourning in that city and will as occasions call for it, occupy the pulpit of the First Christian church. Many Iowa people will be glad to know that Mr. Hickey is still able to preach. Otho Williams is the pastor at Bellingham.

O. F. Jordan of the Evanston church is drawing large audiences these hot Sunday evenings by what President Hyde calls "case preaching." He gives an incident full of human interest, and draws social, ethical, business, political, domestic and personal lessons from it. Mr. Jordan calls his series "Bible Story Sermons."

Clifford S. Weaver, former missionary to Japan, is now pastor of the church at Latham, Ill., where a new church building was dedicated August 7. Brother Weaver is the son of T. F. Weaver of Marshal, Texas, who assisted him in the dedication. Brother Weaver quit the mission field on account of Mrs. Weaver's health. He is a doing a most commendable work at Latham.

Our news item about George B. Ranshaw some weeks ago was all wrong, it seems. He acted as supply at Dayton, Ohio, till June 1, and during July at Elyria, Ohio. As stated last week, the Elyria church has chosen him as pastor and he begins September 1. Mr. Ranshaw will certainly accomplish a great work in Elyria. He will, if the church will warmly support him and give him a fair chance.

Dr. Paul Wakefield, who is soon to open a new mission at Chao Hsien, China, is asking the physicians of this country to build a boat for his use on the Chao Lake. He is also trying to raise money to build a comfortable home. Dr. Wakefield is the living link of the church at Liberty, Mo., and the above facts were gleaned from the parish paper of that church.

From a Kokomo, Ind., paper it is learned that the Trades and Labor Council of that city will attend in a body the services of the Main Street Christian Church on Sunday evening, September 4, to hear E. R. Edwards speak upon some phase of the labor problem from the standpoint of a Christian. Mr. Edwards has not been unmindful of the problems of the men of today. He must be preaching for the men of this age.

The Christian church of Stockton, Cal., has secured John Kendrick Ballou, of Colusa, as pastor; this is the second invitation the church extended Mr. Ballou, and preparations indicate a decided forward movement. The church is progressive, missionary, and very vitally active. It has a "front rank" Sunday school, and all the auxiliary organizations, including a brotherhood. Mr. Ballou and that kind of a church ought to work well together and accomplish great things.

P. H. Welshimer of Canton, Ohio, reports a very pleasant occasion when Dr. and Mrs. Macklin visited his church, Sunday, August 21. Mrs. Macklin is the living link of the Canton church. The attendance at Bible school that morning was 2,405. In the closing exercises of the school, 200 children from the primary department marched through the auditorium, each laying a carnation upon the lap of Mrs. Macklin. Dr. Macklin spoke to large audiences both morning and evening. They sail for Nankin, October 25.

James Small, evangelist for Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., will have time for a short meeting soon after our national convention in October. Here is a rare chance for some good church to call this leading evangelist with his singer for a short campaign.

One of the spiciest parish papers that comes to the Christian Century office is "Others," a new enterprise by the Independence Boulevard Church of Kansas City, Mo., with James Small, the associate minister, as editor. It sounds the note of strenuous service and modulates it with joy and laughter.

The Christian Century has been looking for a good report of the occasion referred to in the following telegram received a few hours too late for last week's issue. As the report has not put in an appearance in time for this issue, the telegram is given:

"After three days' conference of Foreign Missionaries, the Sarah Davis Deterding Missionary Training School and Headquarters of C. W. B. M. was dedicated, Aug. 18, A. McLean making the dedicatory address. Full account next week. Prospectus for training school ready for distribution."—Anna R. Atwater.

A union movement is under way at Ann Arbor, Mich., between the Christian church and the Baptist church. The two churches have been worshiping together since the first of July. We understand it is their intention to continue together as at present for a year. If at the conclusion of the year they have lived and worked together harmoniously and efficiently, they will proceed to effect a permanent union. Their plan of approaching the union problem is surely very wise. The outcome will be anticipated with great interest by Disciples, Baptists and many others throughout the land.

We have had a fine meeting, the first ever held in our new church. We had from 150 to 300 people in attendance at each service. One night the church would not hold the people. We are quite proud of the fact, considering that we had only sixty members, and all the rest were not connected with our church. This shows a widespread interest in our meeting throughout this town It is true that we did not have a very large number of additions, but our cause in this town has been helped more than figures will show. Brother Elmore preached us a fine series of sermons.—Mark S. Peckham, Sumter, S. Car.

The Foreign Society occupies Thursday, October 13th, at Topeka. This year almost all the time will be occupied by the missionaries. The following fields will be occupied: Africa, China, India and the Philippines. Ten missionaries will speak.

Dr. and Mrs. Paul Wakefield will leave for China, Mrs. G. W. Brown, Miss Stella Franklin and Miss Mary Stanley for India, and Miss Bertha Clawson for Japan before the Topeka Convention, and Dr. and Mrs. W. E. Macklin, Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Meigs, and Mr. and Mrs. R. R. Eldred soon after.

In order to have a great convention one thing is absolutely necessary, that is, a good report. There is ample time yet to finish what we began and to raise the $400,000 needed. Thus far the receipts are in excess of any previous year. We can easily complete the amount suggested at Pittsburgh last year.

Wisconsin Christian Missionary Convention

Our state convention will be held at Waupun, September 15-18.

Every scattered disciple should try to be there. Entertainment will be free. Write L. L. Mann, Waupun.

The August campaign is doing well. Claire L. Wait is at Sabin with eleven added. P. C. McCallum is at West Lima with two added; A. F. Hunsaker is at Rome with four added; Thompson, the Egyptian, is at Beloit with hope for a new church, and J. P. Wright is at Rockton, where the saloons have been voted out and a church ought to go in. Chas. Musselman will soon begin at Packwaukee.

On September 12, J. A. L. Romig will begin at Ladysmith, and on October 1, Evangelist Hendershot will begin at Viroqua. We expect good results from all these efforts. We will endeavor to follow up in each case with permanent work.

Several have recently made the good confession in the Sunday school at Big Flats.

The work over the state is most encouraging. We need reapers,—good, consecrated men. There are souls for hire.

Convention Music at Topeka

The music of the convention will be in charge of Percy Kendall, of Columbus, Indiana, and Mrs. Princess Long, of Long Beach, California. Brother Kendall is not only a fine chorus leader, but is unusually skilful with the cornet, and between the trumpet tones of his voice and that of his instrument, his hands and his horn working together in the rhythmic undulations of inspiring song, the great congregation under his leadership will sway the hearts of all to the influences of the Holy Spirit as the great trees bend under the strength of the tempest.

The mere announcement that Princess Long will be the song-bird of the conveention is enough to marshal the entire Pacific slope to the Kansas plains, where they will meet equally ardent admirers in the delegates from other states. We first heard her sing at Omaha and still the lingering sweetness of the haunting melodies of the King which she sang at that great convention abide with us. Princess in act as well as song, she is greatly beloved by the Brotherhood.

To these must be added a great host of evangelistic singers, who have been singing souls into the kingdom with a sweetness and power which always gives them a great audience whenever they appear at any one of our National Conventions. Their names are too numerous to mention, but they will be present, and you who have longed to hear some special one, whose face has been familiar to you as seen in the reports of great meetings, will miss this opportunity of a life time if you are not there.

Added to all this great array of musical talent, we are permitted to make the pleasing announcement that this great corps of singers will give a concert the last day of the convention. This fact alone stamps the New Century Convention as one of unique interest.

The local music committee, consisting of Miss Mildred Hazelrigg, Mr. F. F. Dawdy and Mrs. Mattie Howes, are doing everything in their power to make the music a great success. Mrs. Howes is a prominent singer at the First Church, F. F. Dawdy is widely known as a singing evangelist and is also a composer of gospel songs. But the heart and soul of our musical arrangements for the convention is Miss Mildred Hazelrigg, the accomplished daughter of Mrs. Clara Hazelrigg, so notably and lovingly known as one of our great lady evangelists. Miss Hazelrigg is accustomed to the directing of great choruses and is a thoroughly educated musician.

Under the magic of gospel melody, with such leaders in hymns to our Lord, we are assured of a militant, aggressive convention. Great questions will be up for discussion, advance movements are in the air, but the spirit of song is the spirit of Christ and unifies men of divergent opinions and cements all hearts.

CHAS. A. FINCH, Secretary.

The Hot Springs (Ark.) Work

The writer has been pastor of this charge since March, and during this period the work has been progressing nicely. Although they had been without a pastor for some time, every department was ready for good, hard work. We are worshiping in the basement of our new building. Lack of funds to complete the building has retarded our progress greatly. The congregation has gone their limit. If every one who reads these lines could realize the burning need of a great, strong congregation of disciples, with a suitable building, to command our rightful prestige in this city, I am sure the many friends of the Hot Springs work would come to the rescue at once.

There have been twenty-five additions since May 1. We are holding up our heads and smiling and working with all our might on the problems that overwhelmingly confront us. Victory is sure. The victory is not promised to the strong, nor to the swift and mighty; but to the true and to the faithful.

We are certainly grateful to all who have helped us to come thus far on our way to victory. The future is bright with promise.

LEON VINCENT STILES, Minister.

Secretary Allen at Beatrice, Neb.

At Beatrice, down on the Big Blue, we had the great pleasure of listening to Sec. E. W. Allen of the Foreign Society a few Sundays ago. Bro. Allen's sermon in the morning was a big, broad, masterly presentation of the missionary gospel. It was one of the strongest sermons we have heard in Beatrice in many a day. In the evening Bro. Allen spoke to an audience of 1,600 people, of all churches of our city, in the regular mid-summer union services on the Central High School Campus, on the subject, "Returns from Foreign Missions." It was a great address on a great occasion. Many people came forward at the close of the service and said it was one of the greatest addresses they had ever heard in Beatrice. The morning sermon had been so well reported by church goers that at night Bro. Allen had bankers, railroad builders, merchants, lawyers, and preachers from all churches as listeners. Words of praise were on every hand. If you want a great address on a great occasion, call on Allen for the "Returns from Foreign Missions."

J. E. DAVIS.

The Maryland Missionary Convention

The Christian Missionary Society of Maryland, Delaware and the District of Columbia, will hold its thirty-third annual convention at Mountain, Maryland, September 5-8. The program is especially strong on preacher problems. "The Right to be a Preacher," by W. G. Oram; "The Functions of Preaching," by Geo. B. Townsend; "Sources of Power in Preaching," by Clarence H. Poage; "Great Preacehrs, Their Topics and Texts," by C. C. Waite; "Finding Texts," by W. S. Hoye; "Should the Church Expect the Minister to be Both Preacher and Pastor?" by Peter Ainslie,—all that interspersed with off-hand discussions will surely be worth while for the ministers.

There will be the convention sermon by Francis H. Scott, an address by E. B. Bagby of Fort Smith, Ark., and the president's address by B. A. Abbott.

There will be a helpful Bible-school session with addresses by T. A. Hostetler, L. B. Haskins, John W. Pickering and W. T. Eddingfield.

The C. W. B. M. will hold its session Wednesday afternoon and there will be addresses by Mrs. Geo. T. Prewitt, Mrs. Josiah H. Shinn, Miss Vinette Schofield, John E. Randall and others.

The Century is under obligations to Mr. Andrew Wilson of Washington, D. C., for a copy of the program.

Letter from the Ohio Secretary

Ten weeks of duty in the work of Secretary of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society have confirmed by close first-hand knowledge what had been a steady conviction throughout my ministry, viz.: that Ohio is a field of the very first importance for aggressive work by the Disciples of Christ.

In some fields we are able to do striking things; in many others a steady, sure growth gives promise of equally gratifying results even if less spectacular.

For the most part, the mission fields now under the management of the society are doing commendable work and making real progress. During his administration, H. Newton Miller succeeded in infusing his spirit of kindliness and consecration into all the work of the society. We will be reaping from his sowing for many years to come.

A number of pressing calls for help are upon us just now where an emergency demands vigorous action in a crisis in order to do what will require twenty-five years to do if we do not do it now. Five years of strong support now will save twenty-five years soul-trying endeavor by and by, in two or three strategic centers of influence in the state.

Of thirty-one days from July 15 to August 15, twenty-seven days in whole or in part were spent in the field—a strenuous vacation.

L. A. Warren becomes minister to the Christian Endeavor Mission at Clyde, September 18. The outlook is most encouraging for the work to make substantial advance this year.

J. Wesley Hatcher, of West Liberty, Ky., has been called to the work of our mission in Dayton and hopes to be on the field by October 1.

L. L. Faris has been generously working up Front Rank interests among our Bible schools until Brother Mercer begins his work.

L. I. Mercer will begin ish work at State Bible-school Evangelist, September 1. He will spend September with the churches in Greenville and Wellington, building up the Bible-school, holding evangelistic meetings at night and setting the work in order in every needed way.

The band of Disciples at Sidney have maintained a Bible-school for a number of months. E. B. Kemm, of Piqua, giving them some service. The State Board has promised to help these people and our Bible-school Evangelist will go to them in October to transform their Bible-school into a church.

There have been many calls for the services of Brother Mercer, and it is evident that the committee of the Toledo Convention touched a vital need of our Ohio work in providing a man for this type of service.

The schools of the state are responding to the call to support this work. We are hoping to enlist a large percent of all the schools.

T. J. White, our evangelist for Southern Ohio, did yeoman service for the church in Jackson Center. By working night and day, driving 300 miles in a buggy, he secured funds, paid all bills and reduced the indebtedness to $1,000, which was secured from the Church Extension Board, thus saving to our cause this $5,000 property. G. W. Adkins is now serving there as pastor.

In the four days, August 26-29, the secretary will speak seven times at the yearly meeting at Unionport, Jefferson County. This sounds like old times.

The fall round of conventions begins at Macon, August 31, and continues almost incessantly until the end of October.

Sunday, September 4, is to be spent with John Mullen and the First Church, Findlay, dedicating their renewed house of worship.

Cotner's New Chancellor Speaks

Through the action of the Board of Trustees I have been called to the high position of Chancellor of Cotner University. I enter upon my duties with fear and trembling. The task that lies before me is one of grave responsibility. To the end that my administration may result in all the good possible for Cotner University and the kingdom of God, I call upon God with a faith that will not take no for an answer to give me wisdom and power for the great task. My one aim will be to keep the University loyal to the great head of the church, Jesus Christ. To the memebers of the Churches of Christ, to whom Cotner University belongs, I shall always look for sympathetic co-operation. I am among you as a servant of Christ to help you in the work that you are doing for him. In return let me ask you to help me build up Cotner University.

First of all, I ask you to remember me and the great educational interests that I am to labor for, daily in your prayers before God.

Secondly, I ask that you give us your boys and girls for our college halls. It is the holiest and most sacred trust that you can place upon us. But, I promise you, that by God's help, we will prove true to the great charge.

Lastly, we must have your financial support. It will do you good to give this needed support. If you are looking for an investment that will bring in great returns for the kingdom of God, Cotner University offers you an opportunity.

With your prayers, your boys and girls, and your money, together with God, we shall be able to build up a great school.

WILLIAM OESCHGER.

Bethany, Neb.,

Dean Henry B. Robison, Ph. D.

The acceptance of the position of dean of the Bible College of Christian University by Dr. Robison at this time is worthy of attention by a brotherhood seeking high ideals in its ministry. A consecrated young man, with practically all the literary and biblical instructions afforded by our own Kentucky University, yet unsatisfied short of a thorough training in one of our larger universities, completing a six years' course leading to the degree of Doctor of Philosophy that he might feel himself measurably qualified to meet the needs of the biblical student of today, now entering upon the leadership of one of the oldest of our institutions of learning, has peculiar significance. Unqualifiedly it marks a stage in the onward progress of our collegiate training. Our colleges are no longer content with the character or methods of two or more decades ago. Not necessarily that the splendid number of our older men who have so greatly enriched our hearts and lives by their sacrifice and service in teaching, are to be discarded or frowned upon by their younger inheritors, but the day is calling for the best that has been brought forward by young or old, and he who has been unable to embody the best results of truth-seeking of the past and present may reasonably be asked by the live student of the time, Why? If the answer is met by a scorn, or a continuation of outgrown views and methods, it should excite no surprise that the student should find his way to the school of teaching specialists. This is written with no intent of reflection upon any one of our schools, but rather in appreciation of their efforts to secure such men as are capable and qualified, and capable because qualified, to deal with present day issues by the most effective methods known to exist.

It is felt that this is the spirit which leads in asking Dr. Robison to the deanship of the Bible College at this time, and it is certainly with this spirit that the writer heartily commends Dr. Robison as he enters upon his new tasks. We have been close friends in Kentucky and Chicago as we were passing through similar experiences in college. Though he is the older and more experienced teacher, I know of no one whom I would commend more highly as successor to the work which has consumed my attention the last three years. These have been three precious years of rare and valuable experience, and as I retire to enter upon other educational work, it is with a feeling that my alma mater will continue to be a progressive, safe and practical institution of Christian learning. Should Dean Robison's discreet judgment and broad scholarship be permitted to direct his department, as we have reason to believe it will, we shall expect great things from him and his co-laborers.

Gary, Indiana

In connection with the building up of a strong church body in Gary, Indiana, we are considering building a "downtown" church. Some who are advising us question the wisdom of this. We would like to hear from churches or ministers who are now trying or have tried this plan. Tell us what the advantages were, and what the faults of

DRAKE UNIVERSITY AND CAMPUS

Drake University is twenty-nine years old, has eleven buildings devoted exclusively to school purposes, employs more than 150 instructors, and has an annual attendance of more than 1,800 students The University is located in the best suburb of "Beautiful Des Moines," with easy access to every point of educational and religious interest in the city. Library facilities are unexcelled in the West, living expenses are moderate and opportunities for remunerative employment are unusually good. School is in session throughout the year.

THE COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE

The Bible College of Drake University was established at the opening of the school in 1881. It is

Free from the limitations of man-made creeds and sectarian domination; has a faculty of earnest scholars, each an expert in some branch of Bible study; maintains that spirit of loyalty to Christ which leaves the mind free to "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good"; has organic union with a large and rapidly growing university and affords an opportunity of hearing in lecture or recital many of the most famous world characters. Des Moines is an educational, artistic, industrial and religious center.

MEDICAL MISSIONARIES

Drake University has more Medical Missionaries in the field than any other of our schools. No other institution in the Brotherhood offers the advantages to be found at Drake University. The College of Medicine of Drake University is standard by every test applied to such institutions. The training of the medical missionary in the College of Liberal Arts, the College of the Bible and the College of Medicine assures the best preparation for complete service.

Scholarships for Bible College Students

Free scholarships are provided by the university and its friends for all students preparing for the ministry or the mission field.

this plan. A "downtown" church in this sense is a building that carries with it certain features of self support, like the First Methodist Church in Chicago, with stores below and offices above. I want to hear of churches that have used any part of their building for revenue. It would be good if there should be a broad exchange of opinions on this and it would help not only the Gary congregation, but other churches similarly situated. Please address me at Gary, Ind

Up to the evening of August 20 there have been issued from the National Bible School Office eighty front rank certificates as follows: Kentucky, 21; Indiana, 15; Iowa, 11; Oregon, 6; Colorado, 5; Nebraska, 5; Illinois, 5; California, 4; Ohio, 3; District of Columbia, 1; West Virginia, 1; Oklahoma 1; Pennsylvania, W, 1; Arizona, 1. Total, 80.

The new front rank schools for the week are: Elizabethtown Ky., John W. Boyd; Lagrange, Ky., J. T. Jager; Fairview (Williamstown), Ky., Mrs. Grace Brown; Cantril, Iowa, J. N. Stonebroker; Republic, Iowa, Mrs. Oscar Ransom; Griggsville, Ill., Wm Brown; Phoenix (First), Ariz., J. M. Stewart; Beaver Falls (First), Pa., Mrs. E. F. Renouf. West Pennsylvania and Arizona have joined the front rank states this week. Which state will be the next? We are slowly climbing to the 1,000 mark by the time of the Topeka convention, but it will certainly mean some hard work during September. If you have your application filled out, send it at once to your state superintendent and get in line with the front rankers.

Bible College of Missouri Endowment

The readers of the Christian Century will no doubt note with some interest the results abtained during the two years and ten months of my service as Field Representative of the Bible College of Missouri.

Cash	$ 38,303.50
Notes, Bonds, and Stocks	27,336.80
Real Estate	1,925.00
Pledges Collectable	718.75
R. A. Long's Gift	53,900.00
Total	$122,184.05

Mr. Long did far better than he promised in the beginning. He paid his in cash, and more than he first proposed. He also cashed about $18,000 of what is represented above as securities so as to meet a condition attaching to one large pledge made towards meeting his proposition. Nevertheless the above mentioned total will undergo some shrinkage. Some of our securities, especially stocks, are not worth their face value on the market.

Appreciation

To the Editors of the Christian Century: Until such time in the near future as it will be possible to reply personally to the many friends of E. W. Darst who have written to express their regard for him and their sympathy for his family, Mrs. Minnie A. Darst and his children, Margaret and Edward, and his son by adoption, Laurence, desire through your columns to thank all who have ministered, in any way, by service or loving message to their comforting and strength. To the churches which have sent memorials, Noblesville, Ind., Everett Berkeley, Cal.,—as well as to the churches of Chicago and San Francisco and others where special memorial services were held, they would also send grateful greetings. Nor will they forget the great kindness of the pastor, G. A. Purvis and members of the Tucson, Arizona Church and the physicians who ministered personally to Mr. Darst, and his family. And to those who reached out fellowship and comfort through their letters to Mr. Darst during his stay in Arizona, which he so ardently hoped to be able to answer himself, his family would wish to express their appreciation.

Gratefully yours,
MRS. E. W. DARST, AND FAMILY.

Home Mission Notes

I. N. McCash, Sec'y.

"We have six young men, students in the field, and I will give full account of their work at end of their term of service. A rainy summer has hindered work very much, but at East Point, town at edge of Atlanta, we have organized a church with fifty-five members. Brothers Pendleton and Smith, assisted J. W. Walton in this work. Outlook very good now. J. H. Wood, Winder, Ga.

"Our work in British Columbia continues to show steady progress. Our chief difficulties are our scattered memberships—the city is large enough for a dozen instead of one church,—our depressing meeting place, and our distance from others of like faith. But we are strong in confidence in our Lord, in our message, and in the boundless resources of our Master. We all feel that once we can get into a place wherein we may reach the people, we shall have reached the summit of our hill 'difficulty,' and be inside of the Land of Promise. N. A. DAVIS, Vancouver, B. C.

A BLOT ON OUR SHIELD

By A. McLean

But a small minority of those who call themselves Christians only give anything to support and to extend the Lord's work. This is a blot on our shield. We claim ten thousand churches and a million and a quarter of members. We should have ten thousand churches and a million and a quarter of members giving for Church Extension on the first Sunday in September, and the same number giving for the other enterprises of the church at other times. The scriptural conception is that each believer is a contributor. Each one is to lay by him in store each week as he may prosper. According as each one has received the gift, he is to minister it as a good steward of the manifold grace of God. Our claim is that we speak where the scriptures speak, and are silent where the scriptures are silent. We say that we take the word of God as our sole rule of faith and practice. In order to make good our high claims, each member should assist to the full measure of his ability. The Board of Church Extension has good reason for amazement when its records show that less than one church in twelve gives to its treasury for the support of the great work committed to its management. This year should witness a marked improvement in this respect. More churches should give , and they should give on a more generous scale. That board should have, within the next two years, a million dollars in its custody, to help struggling churches and to buy lots in desirable locations, and to erect buildings in the cities of the land. It is high time we were tackling the cities in earnest. We have played at the Lord's business far too long. Every minister and every evangelist and elder and deacon should sound the charge and lead off with offerings that will call out worthy offerings from all the people with whom they have to do. There is no church so poor that it cannot make some contribution. The truth is, churches cannot afford not to do their duty. God has promised to honor them that honor Him. He is able to make all grace abound toward us, that we always having all things, may abound in every good work.

THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

INTERNATIONAL COURSE

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR

Purpose—The purpose of the Graded Lessons is: To meet the spiritual needs of the pupil in each stage of his development. The spiritual needs broadly stated are these:
1. To know God as he has revealed himself to us in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ..... 2. To exercise toward God, the Father, and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, trust, obedience, and worship..... 3. To know and to do our duty to others..... 4. To know and do our duty to ourselves.

COURSES	Age of Pupils	AIM	PUBLICATIONS
BEGINNERS		To lead the little child to the Father by helping him: 1. To know God, the heavenly Father, who loves him, provides for, and protects him. 2. To know Jesus the Son of God, who became a little Child, who went about doing good, and who is the Friend and Saviour of little children. 3. To know about the heavenly home. 4. To distinguish between right and wrong. 5. To know his love for God by working with him and for others.	Lessons prepared by FRANCES W. DANIELSON

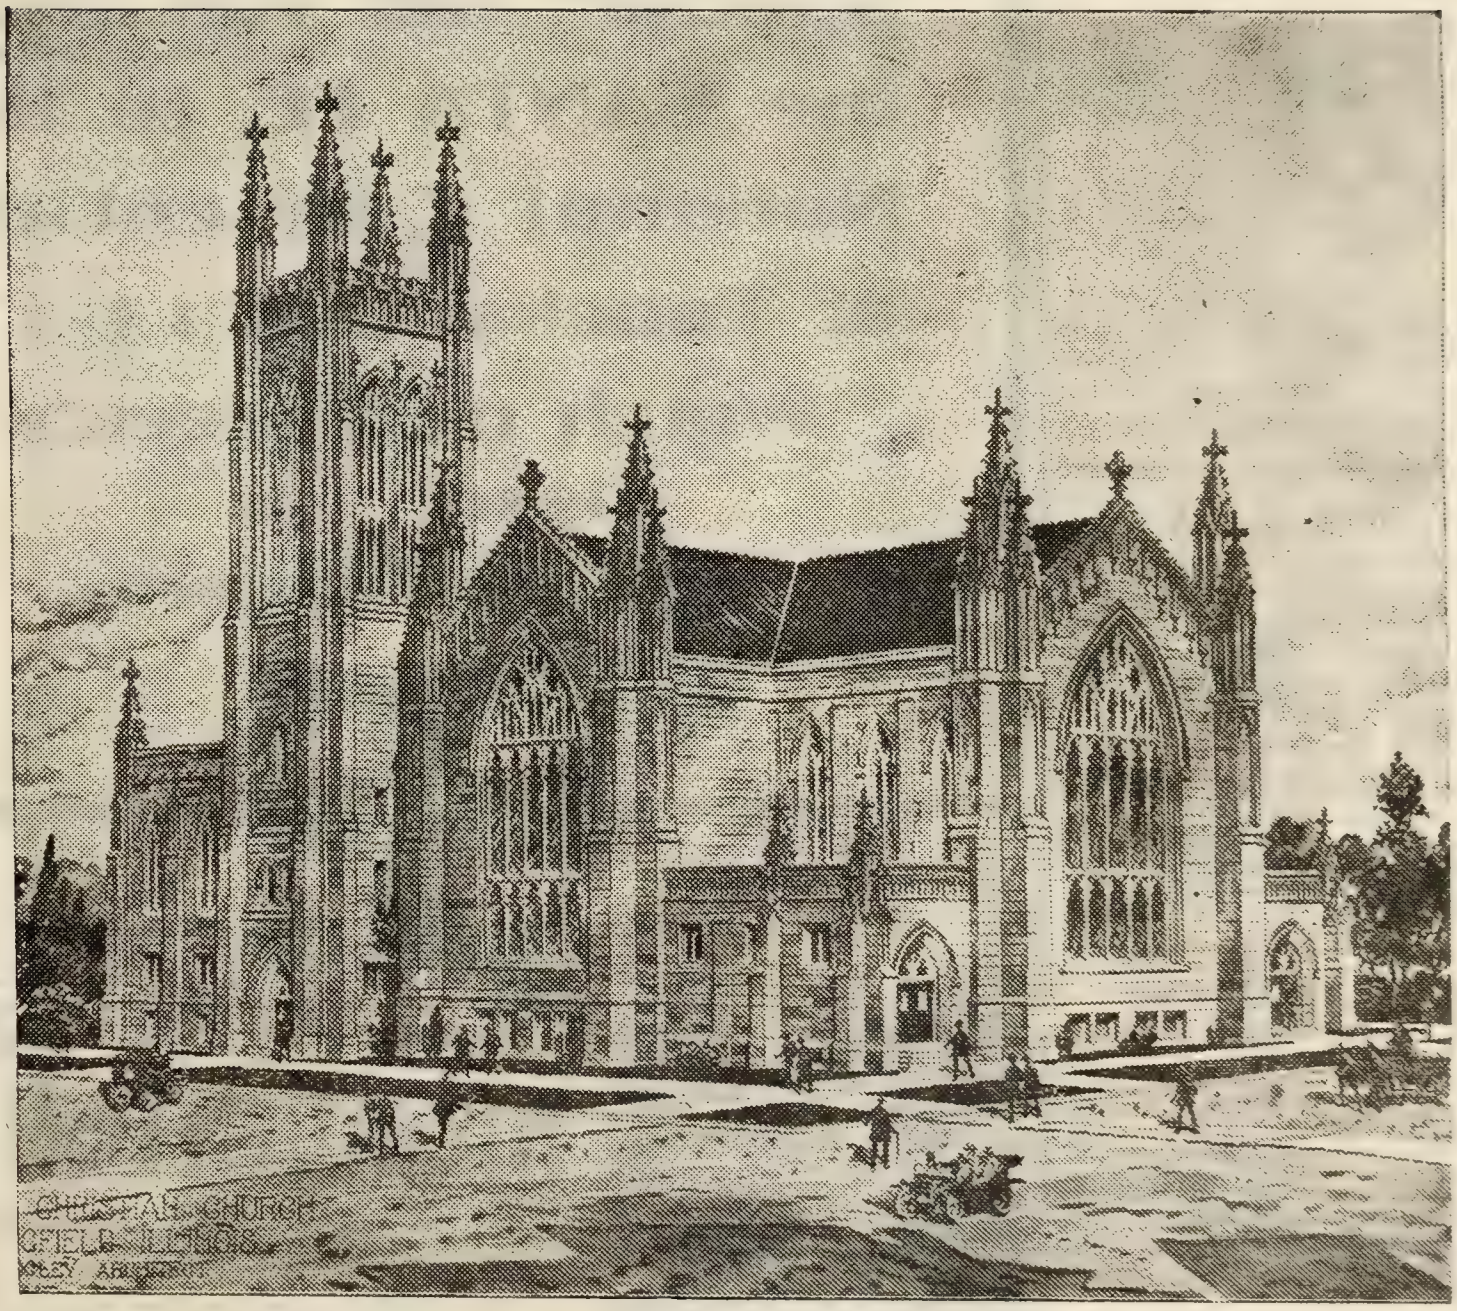
The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.



The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year. While these courses may be begun at any time, there is especial advantage in beginning at the beginning, October 1.

Important Statement.

If young men who can preach acceptably, and wish to make further preparation for their work, would have faith enough to come here and enter school, they would be able to get preaching points in a short time. There are a hundred churches or more within reach of the school that are now ready, or could be worked up by a little effort, to support ministerial students.

National Benevolent Association Notes

The National Benevolent Association has recently received two good annuities. They were from those who have tried the association's annuity plan. When once a person takes an annuity bond with the association he begins to plan for another.

The association has just bought an additional tract of land for its Home in Cleveland, Ohio. The cost was $6,000. This land was necessary for the completion of the equipment of our splendid Ohio institution. This home has now one of the best locations in the Forest City. The family consists of seventy children.

The Association books will close with August this year, thus making a year of but eleven months. This is done to give more time in which to prepare the report for the annual convention. All the friends of the association should note this fact. Those who have been accustomed to send in their offering near the close of the fiscal year will do well to send it in a month earlier this year.

The association's work in the northwest has made a good beginning. Five children were received into the Walla Walla Home in the first six weeks, all boys. Two were half orphans, taken to temporarily aid a distressed widowed sister. The other three were full orphans, one a baby but two weeks old. The superintendent said of this wee chap, "He is the littlest fellow to be alive I ever saw."

Christian Union in the Sunday-School

Signal Opportunity to Promote Christian Unity Ignored by Disciple Publishers

How far the Christian world has progressed toward unity is indicated by the high degree of success attending the interdenominational publication of the new graded Sunday-school lessons. In the past, there have always been as many different kinds of helps as there were publishers. The publishing houses of the various denominations felt the commercial motive reënforced by the demand for sectarian teaching in the lesson helps. With the appearance of the graded lessons an entirely new policy has been made possible. Twelve of the leading denominations—most of them through their official publishing houses—united together to produce an ideal body of literature for these graded lessons. No pains nor expense were spared. About $200,000 was spent in producing the first year's lessons. No such elaborate and artistic lesson helps have ever been offered to the Sunday-schools as this interdenominational series. It was felt that in the graded lessons at last the Sunday-school curriculum was organized upon a principle both ideal and practicable, and no limitation was set in providing the richest literature that could be made. The writers of these lessons are the most expert in the Sunday-school world. They are not chosen because of their denominational connection but because they have mastered the problems of teaching the word of God and are skilled in the art of inspiring other teachers. The art world has been ransacked to provide the highest class of pictures for these courses. There is not a cheap or shoddy or inartistic picture in the thousands that make up the gallery. The mechanical "get-up" of the quarterlies and papers is perfect. The literature is fascinating in every way—fascinating to the pupil and to the teacher. If this literature is put into the hands of the prospective teacher, wavering in her decision to accept the proposed task, it will capture her for this work by its intrinsic beauty.

Each publishing house appointed an editor who with the eleven others constitute a board to select the lesson writers and to criticise and revise their work. The published lessons wear various names. Among Presbyterians they are called "Westminster"; among Congregationalists, "Pilgrim"; among Disciples, "Bethany"; among Methodists, "Berean"; among United Brethren, "Otterbein," etc., etc. For the Bethany lessons Charles Clayton Morrison is editor. To him, as to all the editors, are submitted all manuscripts of the lesson writers, and all proofs for his final criticism or approval. In such a league as this not every whim and notion of every editor can be carried out, of course, and that is probably a great gain rather than a disadvantage. But the plan is so organized that no editor need suffer his own nor his denomination's principles to be either violated or ignored. In addition a large place is made for each editor to provide instruction in the history and teaching of his own people or denomination, with a special place in the series set apart for telling the story of missionary heroes of his own church. There is no curtailment of the editor's liberty in any point of doctrine vital to him or his constituency, and ample provision is made for much more and better teaching of distinctive doctrines or ideals than obtained under the old uniform system.

From the standpoint of Christian union this syndication of the graded lessons for Sunday-school instruction is hardly less significant than the great Edinburgh Missionary Conference. Since the adoption of a common lesson by the Sunday-schools of the world, probably no more important event making for unity has occurred. In no earlier period of protestant thought and temper could this thing have been done. On the business side it indicates a tempering down of the aggression of publishers. On the religious side it indicates a new spirit of coöperation among protestants. On the pedagogical side it indicates the most important fact of all, viz., that religious instruction has at last been emancipated from sectarian prejudice and may henceforth be carried on under the same scientific method as obtains in the public schools. The New Christian Century Co., publishers of the Bethany Lessons, takes especial satisfaction in coöperating in this movement which is bound to bring the people of God into a deeper unity than any other factor now operating The publishers look with pleasure, too, upon the entrance of the Christian Publishing Co., of St. Louis, and the Standard Publishing Co., of Cincinnati, into the graded lesson field even though they enter late, and, as they say, "with hesitation." As the pioneer among the Disciples in this most important advance The Christian Century has a sense of decided reënforcement. The important thing in this movement for a graded curriculum is to get the graded principle once established in the minds of Sunday-school people. The greater the number of publishers who engage in promoting graded lessons the more widely will the principle be established, and the greater will be the demand for supplies.

The Christian Century cannot help regretting, however, that the Disciple publishing houses are about to divide our brotherhood in the matter of supplies. As a people pleading for Christian union the Disciples should be coöperating heart and soul in the enterprise of establishing united instruction in the Sunday-school. Here in the field of religious instruction is where the root of Christian unity is, after all, to be planted. To claim that the Disciples cannot go into such a union movement as this because we have peculiar doctrines to promote is to flatly contradict our hundred years of pleading for union. No more pitiable utterance, if it were not so palpably disingenuous, has appeared in our recent literature than a statement recently made by the managing editor in the columns of the Christian-Evangelist. In speaking of the Interdenominational lessons he says: "It is impossible that the lessons can proceed very far without the introduction of the commandments, traditions and speculations of men, instead of the unfailing truth of God." These words are pure cant and hypocrisy. The motive that actuates such a statement is that of a publisher, not that of a minister of Christ. We do not here raise the question of ordinary business ethics as to crying up your own goods by crying down your competitor's. Unfortunately, a certain type of journalism among the Disciples has made customary a method of promoting the sale of religious literature which is tabooed by all decent business men who sell mere worldly goods. We confess our disappointment, however, to see so soon fulfilled the complimentary prophecy concerning Mr. Long's purchase of the Christian Publishing Co. that it would "Standardize" the Christian-Evangelist.

Neither do we stop now to consider certain other false implications in the Christian-Evangelist's article as, for instance, that involved in calling C. C. Morrison the "ostensible editor" of the Bethany Lessons. In the light of the above explanation of Mr. Morrison's connection with these Interdenominational lessons no further word is necessary. But we do wish to point out the unfortunate position in which the Disciples, a Christian union people, are placed by the sectarian policy of our publishers. Let us look at the situation. Here is a great united enterprise, a crucial test of the possibilities of co-operation among Christian people in a most strategic field. All the leading religious bodies of the land, including the Disciples, are engaged in making the trial except one, the Baptists. Now come the two stronger publishing houses of the Disciples each with an independent scheme of its own and a lingo of cantish talk about "our" doctrines which must be preserved. And the brotherhood is divided and shamed in the eyes of the Christian world. It is not a case of business necessity on the part of these publishers, as if the New Christian Century Co. had a monopoly on the Bethany Lessons which it would not share. Mr.

Warren says, "We might have had the same thing." (How he got this information we do not know, as no officer of the Christian Century Co. made any such offer to the Christian Publishing Co. He is probably basing his statement on the moral assurance that the Christian Century Co. would have shared its rights with any publisher in the brotherhood, and in this he would not have been mistaken). And if the Christian Publishing Co. might have had a part in this Interdenominational enterprise all we have to say is that it is a betrayal of our brotherhood that it did not accept it.

The situation is paralled to that which obtained in the earlier years of Christian Endeavor. Here was a great interdenominational movement making, as no factor up to that time had made, for Christian union. Two leading denominations became alarmed lest its influence on their young people should break down their sectarian teaching and loyalty. Therefore they organized young people's societies of their own and called their young people out of the Christian Endeavor ranks. Those who in those early days saw the vision of a united church grown by the accustomed co-operation of a new generation under the banner of an absolutely united society of Christian Endeavor have not yet forgiven the leaders of these great churches for their sectarian procedure.

Today it is the Baptist denomination and two Disciple publishing houses which are hindering a yet more important movement for unity than Christian Endeavor promised to be. In the case of the Baptist publication society there is some excuse. Their large Southern constituency is ultra conservative, harping always on its sectarian distinctiveness. In the case of the Disciples, there is no excuse whatever. We have no doctrinal "peculiarities" to promote in our Sunday-schools.

Only two motives can be conceived to lie at the basis of this sectarian procedure of these publishing houses: commercial ambition or denominational pride. We had no hope of the Standard Publishing Co. doing other than it has done. But the Disciples have a right to expect a house that claims to "represent" the brotherhood, to represent the big ideals of the brotherhood, not the sectarian clannishness into which the human nature element of even a Christian union movement is tending ever to drag it.

This is an editorial. It is not written as an advertisement of the Bethany Graded Lessons. It is not written as a reflection upon the supplies being published by the Christian Publishing Co. The writers of these supplies are capable women—the most capable for this work to be found among the Disciples. The Bethany supplies will make their way by their own intrinsic merit. It is not a question of one publisher's interests against another's that we are discussing. We are raising the question whether the Christian-Evangelist is going to represent the Disciples' ideals and principles or the Disciples' failure to achieve their ideals. With such lofty ideals as the Disciples have glimpsed there must, in all human likelihood, be a falling short in actual practice. It would be a miracle were it not so. The remnant of clannish and sectarian spirit that still survives among us is our humiliation: it registers our failure to live up to our ideals. But what hope is there of our outgrowing this clannishness when the paper which J. H. Garrison founded appeals directly to this spirit as a motive for patronage? Manifestly it remains to be demonstrated whether a brotherhood paper is good or ill. If for the sake of the brotherhood's principles it sacrifices patronage, it is good; philanthropy can well be justified in subsidizing a paper like that. But if for the sake of patronage it sacrifices the brotherhood's principles, and appeals to that spirit in the brotherhood which has not yet been transformed by the brotherhod's ideals, it is ill. At this date there are many high-minded readers of the Christian-Evangelist who are in doubt about its being a representative of the ideals of the Disciples of Christ.

Chapters from a Travel Journal

Preaching in Scotland

It was a relief to go off somewhere—anywhere—and preach, after sitting ten days in the intense sessions of the Edinburgh Conference. The "woe is me if I preach not" never ached more urgently in my soul than during those final meetings. We had been taking on; one felt that he was bursting with desire to give off. So when the invitation came to go into the Scottish churches and tell the story of the Conference I accepted with eagerness.

Fortunately, the committee appointed me to go into the far north of Scotland, in the region of Inverness and Aberdeen. This was a portion of Scotland we had not otherwise planned to visit. It took us right into the midst of the Highland country where the sturdy Scotch types which have been the theme of much recent literature reside. Leaving Edinburgh we took the east coast line, along the shore of the North Sea, to Aberdeen. Here we spent Saturday, riding through all quarters of it on the tops of street cars and visiting the university quadrangle. Aberdeen seems not to have a reputation equal to the impression we received. It seemed to us a strikingly picturesque and inviting city. All its buildings are of granite. Its streets are the cleanest I ever saw. You could almost eat your dinner on its pavement. The people were alert and business-like—a noticeable characteristic after being in Edinburgh where everything is done i na most leisurely gait. There was a Chicago-like activity in the streets unequalled in any Scotch city we saw save Glasgow.

Saturday night we took train for Huntly some forty miles northwest of Aberdeen, and were met at the station by Rev. A. S. Laidlaw, pastor of the United Free Church there, who took us to the manse where our entertainment was most hospitable. So far as we could see this manse was one of the most beautiful homes in the town. A large garden, filled with flowers, tended constantly by the minister himself, suggested the sharp contrast between the leisurely, studious habits of the Scotch minister and the strenuous hustling of his American brothers. These "gardens" are the pride of all British home-makers. The home in which we were entertained in Edinburgh was set back in the center of a lovely garden filled with trees and flowers. One evening at a social company our Scotch friends were discussing the "peculiar" tone and vocabularly of the Americans. My host revealed a good-natured pique when he exclaimed, chaffing me, "And what do you think? Mr. Morrison persists in calling my lovely garden a 'yard'!"

Well, the lovely garden of Strathbogie manse in Huntly was no mere yard, it was a little corner of Eden transplanted. Surrounded by a wall opening toward the street through a large iron gate, there was here a quietness and isolation constantly suggesting habits of studiousness. When we entered the library we found that this minister had equipped himself with the best books. Our conversation showed him to be keenly alive to recent developments in the world of thinking, and our talk together was every way enjoyable.

One thing I learned early in our conversation was that I was to be left alone in his pulpit on the morrow to "take the service" as well as preach the sermon. I hesitated about that. I feared my manner would be strange and perhaps embarrassing both to myself and the congregation. But when I found out why the minister was going to desert me I determined to "take the service," sink or swim, survive or perish! Mr. Laidlaw told me that his church had been the storm center of the great disruption from the established church of Scotland in 1843. This Strathbogie church had "disrupted" three years before that date, and through its example had led hundreds of other churches finally to give up their established privileges and organize themselves on the free, or voluntary, plan. In the seventy three years since that time no Free church minister had ever preached in the established church in Huntly. Tomorrow, at last, Mr. Laidlow is invited to preach for them, has accepted the invitation, has his sermon already prepared and is trusting me to manage things at Strathbogie. Dedicated as I am, (being a Disciple), to the cause of Christian unity how could I do otherwise than aid and abet him in every way I could?

Before the regular morning service I met the leading missionary spirits of the various churches of the town for a conference on missionary work. Following this came the regular church service. The great building was well filled, main floor and balconies. I soon forgot that this was the pulpit made celebrated by Principal Rainy's occupancy of it before he was called to the headship of the Free Church College of Edinburgh; soon forgot the ill-fitting gown and the proverbial criticalness of Scotch congregations, and remembering only the great vision of the wonderful Conference in Edinburgh, I told them the things I had seen and heard. My heart was relieved after that sermon more than I can tell. For the five remaining Sundays of my stay in Britain, I preached from two to four times each Sunday, besides a number of addresses between times. That, my reader will say, surely gave me all the chance I needed to get even with the Edinburgh Conference!

After church, on the way to the manse, I was destined to run upon an object of almost as great interest as the grave of Henry Drummond which I unexpectedly stumbled upon at Stirling. We were facing a block of small cottages when our attention was called to one in particular which they said had been for years the home of George MacDonald, and in which he wrote many of his novels. I stopped to study the house and to reflect. "Did he write 'Robert Falconer' here?" I asked. "Yes, and that house in which Robert and his grandmother lived, in the story, is an exact description of this house. The hidden door opening into the neighbor's house, which Robert used to use as a secret passage to the 'fine lady's' home adjoining, is there yet." The wonderful story of Robert Falconer's evolution from the prison house of his "granny's" harsh religion, through his own adolescent doubts, into a glorious faith, came back to me. I agree with Mr. George A. Campbell in calling this story of George MacDonald's the greatest religious novel in English literature. There is a vague family understanding that my maternal grandfather, a Baptist preacher, whose name was MacDonald, was a not distant relative of the Scotch poet and novelist. I do not think, however, that family pride lies at the basis of my estimate of this story! It is a great story. It deals with life as it is, with the big realities of life. It is worth more to a preacher than ten volumes of theology. No student should be given a license to preach until he has read Robert Falconer!

There under the spell of George MacDonald's home I made my editorial self promise that it would print in The Christian Century a chapter or two of this book to revive the beautiful tale in the minds of those who had read it, and to whet the interest of those who had not. Elsewhere in this issue my readers will find my selection.

That afternoon we were driven through a cold rain to Keith twelve miles away, arriving in time for a conference of Christian workers who were especially interested in missions. Afterward I was taken to the parish church (established), where I was to speak to a union service including twelve congregations—some of them from the country quite distant. It interested me greatly on the way to church to note how the streets were thronged. It seemed as if there was a procession in every street, and all heading for the parish church. They are religious in Scotland! The church is the great institution in the social order. The preacher has tremendous influence. He is held in unbounded respect, and is usually a man of such talent and character and education as to fully deserve it.

In the vestry before the service began I visited with the dozen ministers whose churches were uniting that evening. They were deeply interested in the Edinburgh Conference and in America. I, however, cared more to hear them talk than to talk myself, knowing that they would have to listen to me for a good hour in a few minutes. So I listened and asked questions. By inferences from the conversation I was led to confirm the statement that has been made to us often in America to the effect that in Britain they are far ahead of us in the general acceptance of the modern critical views of the Bible and modern scientific views of the world. I do not think their leaders are ahead of our leaders, but their rank and file is ahead of our rank and file. This I should account for by the higher standards of education that obtain in their ministry, and by the greater intellectual demand made upon the preacher in his parish. He is expected to study. His pulpit is his throne. The church itself looks out for its finances. He is relieved of all such labor as in the American ministry is crushing the prophet out of the preacher, making him a mere "hustler."

I found these men all interested in the social application of Christianity. They told me of a great address by a member of parliament given the night before, on "Christian Socialism." The problem of socialism is very acute throughout England and Scotland. Those men were alive to their finger-tips with the sense that Christianity's business is not done when it has succeeded in building up churches. The kingdom of God has yet to be brought in, they declare. "Look here at Scotland," said one, "where is there a section more religious, where are there greater churches, where does the preacher have more influence than in Scotland! Yet our social order is shot through with injustice."

I was much impressed with this fine-toned body of men as they marched before me the full length of the nave into the chancel. It was the vesper hour. The sun was yet a half-hour high. The great church was packed to the last pew in the balcony. Sixteen hundred people were present—in a town of about 2,500 population. The various parts of the service were divided amongst a number of the ministers. Mr. C. S. Mill, a layman, president of the Edinburgh School Board, described the Conference in a vigorous and graphic address and I was left to make what interpertation of it I felt prompted to do. Afterward we went to the parish manse, where we were to spend the night, and found a small group of the ministers there ahead of us, invited to dinner. The minister of the parish, Rev. Mr. Smith, is a bachelor, living alone with valet and servants in this beautiful manse surrounded by another lovely garden, and much in need of some one to regularly supply the offices which Mrs. Morrison rendered at his table that evening.

Our talk took up the subjects we had been discussing somewhat hastily in the vestry—the social problem and the theological—and went on from there into a discussion of the possible union of the Free churches and the Established churches in Scotland. In this theme I found them all deeply interested, hoping for such a union, but divided—and they all belonged to the Established church—on the question whether the united church should be established or free. There is a growing spirit of unity in Scotland. The merging of the Free churches consummated some years ago is a complete and unquestioned success. These men were intensely inquisitive in regard to the Disciples of Christ, whose plea for union I was describing when the clock struck one. Fortunately there was no woman from Virginia there to say "Campbeellite"! And I do not think it would have conveyed any meaning if she had.

Next morning we took the Highland Railway south, straight through the center of Scotland, over the Grampian mountains, nor stopped until we reached St. Boswell's, three miles south of Melrose, where we were to be guests at Mertown House, the home of Lord Polwarth.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

Hindrances to Prayer

The first hindrance encountered in the Scriptures assigned for this topic is that of low motive. Men have been known to leave out the spiritual when they address words to God. They ask for the means of baser pleasures. The gifts of a foolish parent who is without a moral ideal for his child illustrate a too common notion of the kindness of God. In true prayer we seek fellowship with God in the task of banishing sin and misery from the world and of establishing the kingdom of righteousness. According to this conception of prayer, the particular thing we ask may be denied us and yet we may have our petition answered. More light on the ways of God is the greater thing sought. If that is obtained, we can dispense easily with some of the means which we have been thinking were necessary for our work.

In the Bible, transgression of the divine law is often set down as a hindrance to prayer. Iniquity is a wall between men and their God. It is not true that God turns from us like an impatient friend when we do what is displeasing to him. His tenderness and patience are infinite. They are with us in the moments when we seem most indifferent to them. It is by them that we are won from sin. Just because God loves us he will not approve the evil in us. Our friends may try to conceal our faults from the public: God covers sin by creating in the heart a hatred for it and a love for righteousness. Because he loves us he cannot let us feel at home with him while we are in love with wickedness.

The elders of Israel in exile were denounced by the prophet Ezekiel when they came to him to inquire of God. Their allegiance was divided. The calamities which the nation had suffered were interpreted by them as evidence that the nation made a mistake when it abandoned the idolatry of the high places and made a covenant to worship in the more spiritual atmosphere of the temple at Jerusalem. Still they came to Ezekiel for the word of Jehovah. He had no message for them except one of denunciation. Before they could hope for an answer to their inquiries it was necessary for them to abandon altogether their ancient nature-worship and give undivided allegiance to the God of truth and grace. It is possible that something akin to the old nature-worship is hindering our prayers. At least it is well to remind ourselves often of the spirituality of God.

It is a mistake to think that God is on the side of the poor and unfortunate and in opposition to the successful and happy. God is on the side of man. The emphasis in almost every part of the Bible upon the duty of the strong to help the weak does not mean that the weak are more important than the strong. It does mean that God cares for every soul. When there is danger that any will be dealt with unjustly, there is a warning against injustice and an exhortation to fairness and kindness. Indifference to human need is the worst sort of opposition to God. God gives generously to his children. There is no calculating prudence in his method of blessing. Those who commune with him give the full, overflowing measure to their brethren.

It is a great wrong to another if we withhold from him the best there is in us. And this is what we do if we are hard and unforgiving. We leave with our brother the impression that hope and love are secondary considerations in casting up the human account. No theorizing, no glowing tributes to patriotism or religion can serve as substitutes for forgiveness. Errors of ignorance, of blindness due to passion, wilful sins, excite the compasion of God. The world learns of this compassion through men and women in whose hearts it finds a place. These have access to the throne of God and they know that their prayers are heard, for they see faith and hope where they used to see suspicion and despair. They know that the love of God has been transferred through them to other souls.

"Hurrah Boy" Methods in Religion

A trivial episode which, so far as we have seen, has not been commented upon in any of the reports of the Edinburgh Conference, ought not be allowed to pass without teaching us its lesson. It occurred on the last day but one of the Conference. The afternoon session was just adjourning. The benediction had been pronounced upon the hushed hearts of the twelve hundred delegates. Great themes were filling their minds. Profound and intense prayer was welling up from their souls. The chairman, Mr. Mott, had taken but a few steps from his desk. Suddenly some man's voice from the gallery burst into our communings with, "Three cheers for John Mott!" All eyes were turned toward the voice and we saw a man leaning over the gallery rail, waving his arms like a cheer-leader at a football game, and shouting, "Now, altogether!" But his own lusty hurrahs were reënforced by only about a dozen scattered voices which diminished in numbers and force as the hurrahs were thrice repeated. Mr. Mott did not stop in his egress a fraction of a second to acknowledge the ill-conceived tribute. As the delegates passed out, one after another was heard to remark on the incongruity of the episode. The women delegates were especially outraged. "It spoils the whole day for me," one lady was heard to remark. "Tut, tut!", replied her husband, gently, "we must forget all about it and think of the day as if this had not occurred."

This incident ought to instruct those American churches which are using "hurrah boy" methods in Christian enterprise. There is fundamental incongruity in the use of such methods in religious work. Little genuine spiritual value inheres in the results produced by their adoption. A soul or a church dead in earnest about religion feels that its natural atmosphere is one of quiet, of reverence, of controlled and, therefore, glowing emotion. "Roughhouse" methods in evangelism are just as incompatible with deep spiritual discernment and feeling as that cheer was in the inarticulate fervor of the Edinburgh meeting. Convention makers need this lesson. It is an unpopular suggestion, we know, but the truth is that the type of convention the Disciples hold annually, and which the advertisements indicate will be held again this year, could be made incomparably more beneficial to the brotherhood if it were organized on an out-and-out spiritual basis. The spectacular, bizarre and bumptious devices now customary at these meetings will some day—not far distant, we believe—be seen to be indications of weakness, not of strength, in our body. Some day a president of the convention will add to those neglected duties which President Ainslie has this year so bravely assumed, the more vital task of determining the character of the annual convention. This character should be determined by the needs and ideals of the brotherhood, not, as is too nearly true now, by the interests and tastes of the town in which the convention is held. The real impressiveness of a convention is not in its noise, its brass bands or its sensational effects, but in an enthusiasm held in such control as that the "still small voice" may constantly be heard revealing the divine wisdom and directing every step.

One of the prettiest compliments we can pay the readers of The Christian Century is to report the fact that since we dropped the department of evangelistic telegrams six months ago there has not been one request for their replacement, nor even an inquiry as to why the telegrams did not any longer appear. On the other hand, when The Daily Altar was omitted a single week only, due to our failure to receive the manuscript, letters of inquiry and regret poured in upon Dr. Willett and the office. It is doubtful if in the history of the Disciples a more beautiful piece of literature has been produced than is appearing now from week to week in this department. In calling the proof-reader's attention to an error the other week she replied that her mind was so fascinated by the meaning that it was no wonder a few technical errors escaped her. If there are any readers who have been passing The Daily Altar by we wish to call their attention to it now at the beginning of a new season of church life and home life. The page is redolent of prayer and poetry. The potery is always apposite and lofty. The prayer is simple, chaste and real. There is no strain; a sweet and clear sanity pervades each day's devotion. Every home and every heart that follows with Dr. Willett in this exercise will find its grasp of spiritual reality growing firmer and its sense of inner strength growing surer day by day.

Mrs. W. J. Bryan has written a biographical introduction to an edition of the speeches of her famous husband. In this introduction Mrs. Bryan comments on the well-known fondness of the statesman for quoting the Scriptures. "This habit is one of long standing," she says, "as the following circumstance shows." Then she goes on to relate that in asking her father, a very reserved man, for the hand of his daughter, young Bryan quoted Solomon's proverb about finding a good wife, whereunto Mr. Baird returned that Paul said "he that marrieth not doeth better." "Solomon," the young suitor rejoined, "would be the better authority upon this point, because Paul was never married, while Solomon had a number of wives." He got the girl.

An Irish Fair

It was at the little town of Monasterevan, the seat of the Earl of Drogheda, that we visited an Irish fair. The fair is a gradually disappearing factor in the old Irish country life. From time immemorial it has been the scene of romance and riot and a place to see Irish types. The types were there, to be sure, but only a camera could describe them. We walked over in the early morning from Port Arlington, but the long, single street of the typical country village was already filled with the small farmers, who were bringing in their calves, cattle, pigs and sheep for sale. Down at the end of the village lane, hard up by the great stone gate of the Earl's demesne, were the petty wagon-wheel makers, the fashioner of panels and gates, and the great wagon of the second-hand clothes dealer. Every one was in his "good clothes." There were no patched garments, but the linen was long past due at the laundry and the styles were various. Wives mingled freely with their husbands among the stock. They did their share in the rearing, why not in the marketing? There was plenty of animation in the scene. Everyone was intent upon business, but in all the older countries sociabiilty is much more mixed with business than in America. There is little of the bluffness and directness with which we go to the point in bargain, naming our price with a "you can take it or leave it" air. In Germany we have had a fine half hour's amusement in seeing a farmer sell a herd of geese he had driven into the village. There was much good natured gossip, sociable beer drinking, handshaking, and a passing of the money in a half apologetic fashion. In a large store the floor walker receives you with profound bows and in a Prince Albert, directing you to "Miss So and So" for attention.

The Irish peasant is a born bickerer. At the fair he has no stated price. He names a figure and the buyer makes a counter offer, and then the fun begins. The traders chaff each other and laugh over the humorous remarks of the lookers-on. The real fun of the fair is in observing the community of interest in bargain making. When the bickering seems to become almost dispute, each will appeal to another to intercede for him and to back up his contention. When the bargain is struck, it is literally struck, the two parties to the deal giving the pledge of a trade by striking the palms of their hands forcibly together. It is very amusing to see the friends of each trying to force a consummation of some concession they have offered by grabbing each man by the brawny right arm and attempting with humorous earnestness to strike their hands together, while the unwilling parties of the first part wriggle like captured boys to evade the striking of the sign that commits them to the bargain.

The Ever-Present Shame

By noon the market is getting cleared and the animals divided off into little singles or groups, carefully watched by the barefoot boys and girls, while their elders are gathering over the sparkling glass before the little bars that line the street. Here, as in all Ireland, women preside in the pouring of the liquid. In the country places and the working-class sections of the cities, the little booze shops are kept by the wife while the husband works at his trade. They occupy the tiny front room of the dwelling house, which is on the street, and are usually both dirty and ill smelling, and anything but inviting. In the larger "Pubs" of the cities, "bar-maids" preside, as they do at German hotel bars, and the trade is helped by the beauty of the maid. A more pernicious custom could not well be imagined. Of course, the drinking does not go on for long until the ribaldry begins, and while Ireland can no longer furnish the pictures of the days of Samuel Lover, it is yet under the curse of too much love of rum and the kind of pleasure that follows its use. When we left the street, the language in the groups that gathered here and there was not choice, to say the least, and an occasional drunken song was breaking the serenity of the calm afternoon in the village. The real story of an Irish fair, however, can be only told by the camera, and, unfortunately, the day was too cloudy for ours.

The Country Villages of Ireland

This country village of Monasterevan is characteristic of the Irish towns. It has a population of nearly three thousand, but bears the appearance, to one accustomed to American towns, of being a place of a few hundred. We passed through many of these villages and failed to see one that commended itself for the style of its architecture, its lawns, its general signs of prosperity or anything else that was attractive. Killarney has grown up in recent years with the mighty increase of tourist visitors. It is anything but attractive within itself yet it possesses one of the most attractive situations in which a town could be situated. The Killarney district is a rare gem of natural beauty. The village is modern but it is builded after the old style with the exception that there are fewer thatched roofs and higher eves. The houses are crowded up against one another and are low and barren of adornment or any architectural relief. A town of several thousand is compressed into a space upon which but a few hundred should live and the only buildings in it that carry any signs of the beautiful are the churches, a hotel or two and the railroad station. There is one saloon to every ninety of the population. In the old town one sees the picturesque old cabins with the thatch running down to within a couple of feet of the ground and the windows cut into the roof with a sort of dormer covering over them. They are picturesque, but would make a modern sanitarian creep with his visualization of the unseeable multitudes that must find life easy in such dark and unfloored places.

Mingling of Old and New

The ordinary small village is a single row of houses, jammed up against each other and winding along the roadway that is never a model of street cleanliness. The old and the new mingle with no relief and all take the scabbiness of the oldest to themselves. Inside they are patched with the plaster of a century or two and smell with the odors of two generations. The shops are dingy little affairs with almost no store furniture and are usually kept by women and girls. Life is no better than in the peasant's cabins about, indeed the squalor is just so much the worse for the contiguity in which it is maintained.

Monasterevan is typical of the villages that are found on the great estates. It is a little away from the mansion which is securely hidden away behind a park through which runs a roadway, flanked with arbors and gardens of flowers. To one side are the neat cottages of the park caretakers with their bowers of rhododendrons and sweet, green hedges, in striking contrast to the cabins and hovels of the villagers. Back of the Earl's mansion is a broad grassy court, dotted with statuary and sourounded by shrubbery. We were denied entrance by the front roadway but there were no guards to the rear. The great houses of many of these estates are little frequented by their owners who spend most of the time in London, enjoying the gay social whirl for which their peasant tenants furnish the golden sovereigns. Now that the estates are being sold under governmental action the "demesne," the manorial parks, are excepted if the owner desires them and are maintained for summer houses and country places where house parties are brought and from which hunting excursions are organized. There are yet wilds where deer are plentiful and to which the "gentlemen" repair at those seasons of the year when the law allows each a brace of stags for the fun of running them down and slaughtering them. The grouse and rabbits are plentiful everywhere, for the peasantry are not allowed to shoot them, and in making the purchase the landlord may reserve all hunting rights for a generation. This means he and no one else may go where he will over the farms for shooting and that the farmer cannot destroy or enjoy game on his own land. To our surprise the tenant purchasers receive this exemption with good-natured generosity and speak of it as a sort of humoring of the men whose existence is conceived of only in terms of pleasure of the sporting kind.

Occupations of Villagers

The villagers are working people and petty shopkeepers. Many of them are common laborers who pick up whatever is found to do on the farms about or follow occupation wherever it leads. They may labor on the roadways or railroad beds or be artizans who follow their craft wherever the job calls them. Thousands of them go to England in the harvest season where they receive what is extra wages according to the home standards of twelve and fourteen shillings per week. The Welsh mines receive recruits from them by the hundreds at all seasons of the year and in the spring many follow the mackeral around the coast on their annual "run" from the west of Ireland to the east of England. To the traveler they complain much of the "closeness" of the new tenant purchaser of the soil. They claim he is unwilling to hire as the old farmers did, being anxious to save all possible and improve his holding. They say he puts all the family to work and labors day and night to get the things done. We looked into the matter a little and found the charge well taken in the main. But to us it was a thing to commend rather than condemn. It may mean that a few laborers of the casual type will be deprived of some days work each year, but it testifies that prosperity has become a passion with the new owner and that the vision of a home and holding of his own has inspired him with the grace and grit of honest toil to make it real. Where three lived in common poverty before, because of the powerlessness of tenant to claim the fruits of his toil and enterprise, two will now come to live in prosperity and the third will be compelled to find a farm for himself where he can practive the same graces or to go to some industry that will give him steady employment and better his condition as well. What the villages of Ireland need is factories and what Ireland needs is home industries that will make her raw materials into finished products.

Picturesque Ireland

The Emerald Isle is picturesque. Such green nature does not paint elsewhere. She mixes the fertility of the soil with the everlasing dews and mists and spreads the gulf stream near the western shore to temper the land to an almost sub-temperate atmosphere. Out in the west of the wilds of Kerry they are introducing tropical ferns and palms and fruits. The children wear nature's foot covering the year round out there and all over the land is a mildness that is calculated to make the people dreamy and contented. The grass is like rich and deep dyed carpets. The sheep of the lowlands grow as square as baled wool. Roses are the most glorious that nature provides outside hot houses and their great profusion seem a reckless waste to the city dweller from our latitudes. Rhododendrons blossom in great bowers of beauty in the little glens and fuschias are seen in all their glory. The golden furze makes the earthen walls that divide fields into bowers of yellow and the richness of the shrubbery in the valleys and glens simulates well cultivated parkways.

We have said much of the barren hills and mountlets, the stony soils and the bogs and fens, because there is where the problems of the people are found in their discouraging reality. But there are glens in Ireland that cannot be surpassed on the shores of Italy. In county Antrim on the north are such beauty spots as Cushendall and Antrim, and across to the southwest is wonderful Glengariff and the beautiful shores of the Kenmare with its Parknasilla and the winding roads that invite the traveler to turn his day' journey into a summer's outing. Some day Ireland's coast line will be a continuous series of watering places and tourist roadways. The loveliness of the sunny south invites the rest and pleasure seekers of two continents to a gentle salubriousness and a wildness of landscape that cannot be surpassed, while the natural hospitality of the Irish people renders the invitation doubly alluring.

Robert Falconer

An Ever-New Message from a Great Old Book

BY GEORGE MACDONALD

(See article, "Preaching in Scotland," on Editorial Page.)

Robert's Vow.

Ericson was recovering slowly. He could sit up in bed the greater part of the day, and talk about getting out of it. He was able to give Robert an occasional help with his Greek, and to listen with pleasure to his violin. The night-watching grew less needful, and Ericson would have dispensed with it willingly, but Robert would not yet consent.

But Ericson had seasons of great depression, during which he could not away with music, or listen to the words of the New Testament. During one of these Robert had begun to read a chapter to him, in the faint hope that he might draw some comfort from it.

"Shut the book," he said. "If it were the word of God to men, it would have brought its own proof with it."

"Are you sure it hasna?" asked Robert.

"No," answered Ericson. "But why should a fellow that would give his life—that's not much, but it's all I've got—to believe in God, not be able? Only I confess that God in the New Testament wouldn't satisfy me. There's no help. I must just die, and go and see.—She'll be left without anybody. What does it matter? She would not mind a word I said. And the God they talk about will just let her take her own way. He always does."

He had closed his eyes and forgotten that Robert heard him. He opened them now, and fixed them on him with an expression that seemed to ask, "Have I been saying anything I ought not?"

Robert knelt by the bedside, and said, slowly, with strongly repressed emotion,

"Mr. Ericson, I sweir by God, gin there be ane, that gin ye dee, I'll tak up what ye lea' ahin' ye. Gin there be onybody ye want luikit efter, I'll luik efter her. I'll do what I can for her to the best o' my abeelity, sae help me God—aye savin' what I maun do for my ain father, gin he be in life, to fess (bring) him back to the richt gait, gin there be a richt gait. Sae ye can think aboot whether there's onything ye wad like to lippen till me."

A something grew in Ericson's eyes as Robert spoke. Before he had finished, they beamed on the boy.

"I think there must be a God somewhere after all," he said, half soliloquizing. "I should be sorry you hadn't a God, Robert. Why should I wish it for your sake? How could I want one for myself if there never was one? If a God had nothing to do with my making, why should I feel that nobody but God can set things right? Ah! but he must be such a God as I could imagine—altogether, absolutely true and good. If we came out of nothing, we could not invent the idea of a God—could we, Robert? Nothing would be our God. If we come from God, nothing is more natural, nothing so natural, as to want him, and when we havn't got him, to try to find him.—What if he should be in us after all, and working in us this way? just this very way of crying out after him?"

"Mr. Ericson," cried Robert, "dinna say ony mair 'at ye dinna believe in God. Ye duv believe in 'im—mair, I'm thinkin', nor onybody 'at I ken, 'cep, maybe, my grannie—only hers is a some queer kin' o' a God to believe in. I dinna think I cud ever manage to believe in him mysel'."

Ericson sighed and was silent. Robert remained kneeling by his bedside, happier, clearer-headed, and more hopeful than he had ever been. What if all was right at the heart of things—right, even as a man, if he could understand, would say was right; right, so that a man who understood in part could believe it to be ten times more right than he did understand! Vaguely, dimly, yet joyfully, Robert saw something like this in the possibility of things. His heart was full, and the tears filled his eyes. Ericson spoke again.

"I have felt like that often for a few moments," he said; "but always something would come and blow it away. I remember one spring morning—but if you will bring me that bundle of papers, I will show you what, if I can find it, will let you understand——"

Robert rose, went to the cupboard, and brought the pile of loose leaves. Ericson turned them over, and, Robert was glad to see, now and then sorted them a little. At length he drew out a sheet, carelessly written, carelessly corrected, and hard to read.

"It is not finished," or likely to be," he said, as he put the paper in Robert's hand.

"Won't you read it to me yourself, Mr. Ericson?" suggested Robert.

"I would sooner put it in the fire," he answered—"it's fate, anyhow. I don't know why I haven't burnt them all long ago. Rubbish, and diseased rubbish! Read it yourself, or leave it."

Eagerly Robert took it, and read. The following was the best he could make of it:

Oh that a wind would call
From the depths of the leafless wood!
Oh that a voice would fall
On the ear of my solitude!
Far away is the sea,
With its sound and its spirit-tone:
Over it white clouds flee,
But I am alone, alone.

Straight and steady and tall
The trees stand on their feet
Fast by the old stone wall
The moss grows green and sweet;
But my heart is full of fears,
For the sun shines far away;
And they look in my face through tears,
And the light of a dying day.

My heart was glad last night,
As I pressed it with my palm;
Its throb was airy and light
As it sang some spirit-psalm;
But it died away in my breast
As I wandered forth to-day—
As a bird sat dead on its nest,
While others sang on the spray.

O weary heart of mine,
Is there ever a truth for thee?
Will ever a sun outshine
But the sun that shines on me?
Away, away through the air
The clouds and the leaves are blown:
And my heart hath need of prayer,
For it sitteth alone, alone.

And Robert looked with sad reverence at Ericson,—nor ever thought that there was one who, in the face of the fact, and in recognition of it, had dared say, "Not a sparrow shall fall on the ground without your Father." The sparrow does fall—but he who sees it is yet the Father.

And we know only the fall, and not the sparrow.

The Granite Church.

The next day was Sunday. Robert sat after breakfast, by his friend's bed.

"You haven't been to church for a long time, Robert; wouldn't you like to go to-day?" said Ericson.

"I dinna want to lea' you, Mr. Ericson; I can bide wi' ye a' day the day, an' that's better nor goin' to a' the kirks in Aberdeen."

"I should like you to go to-day, though; and see if, after all, there may not be a message for us. If the church be the house of God, as they call it, there should be, now and then at least, some sign of a pillar of fire about it, some indication of the presence of God whose house it is. I wish you would go and see. I haven't been to church for a long time, except to the college-chapel, and I never saw anything more than a fog there."

"Michtna the fog be the torn-edge like, o' the cloody pillar?" suggested Robert.

"Very likely," assented Ericson; "for whatever truth there may be in Christianity, I'm pretty sure the mass of our clergy have never got beyond Judaism. They hang on about the skirts of that cloud forever."

"Ye see, they think as lang 's they see the fog, they hae a grup o something. But they canna get a grup o' the glory that excelleth, for it's not to luik at, but to lat ye see a' thing."

Ericson regarded him with some surprise. Robert hastened to be honest.

"It's no that I ken onything aboot it, Mr. Ericson. I was only bletherin' (talking nonsense)—rizzonin' frae the twa symbols o' the cloud an' the fire—kennin' nothing aboot the thing itsel'. I'll awa' to the kirk, an' see what it's like. Will I gie ye a buik afore I gang?"

"No, thank you. I'll just lie quiet till you come back—if I can."

Robert instructed Shargar to watch for the slightest sound from the sick-room, and went to church.

That morning prayers and sermon were philosophically dull, and respectable as any after-dinner speech. Nor could it well be otherwise; one of the favourite sayings of its minister was, that a clergyman is nothing but a moral policeman. As such, however, he more resembled one of Dogberry's watch. He could not even preach hell with any vigour; for as a gentleman he recoiled from the vulgarity of the doctrine, yielding only a few feeble words on the subject as a sop to the Cerberus that watches over the dues of the Bible—quite unaware that his notion of the doctrine had been drawn from the Aeneid, and not from the Bible.

"Well, have you got anything, Robert?" asked Ericson, as he entered his room.

"Nothing," answered Robert.

"What was the sermon about?"

"It was all to prove that God is a benevolent being."

"Not a devil, that is," answered Ericson. "Small consolation that."

"Sma' eneuch," responded Robert. "I cudna help thinkin' I kent mony a tyke (dog) that God had made wi' mair o' what I wad ca' the divine natur' in him nor a' that Dr. Soulis made oot to be in God himsel'. He had no ill intentions wi' us—it amuntit to that. He wasna ill-willy, as the bairns say. But the doctor had some sair wark, I thoucht, to mak that oot, seein' we war a' the children o' wrath, accordin' to him, born in sin, and inheritin' the guilt of Adam's first trespass. I dinna think Dr. Soulis cud say that God had dune the best he cud for 's. But he never tried to say onything like that. He jist made oot that he was a verra respectable kin' o' a God, though maybe no a'thing we micht wuss. We oucht to be thankfu' that he gae's a wee blink o' a chance o' no bein' brunt to a' eternity, w' nae chance ava. I dinna say that he said that, but that's what it a' seemed to me to come till. He said a hantle aboot the care o' Providence, but a' the gude that he did seemed to me to be but a haudin' aff o' something ill that he had made as weel. Ye wad hae thocht the deevil had made the warl', and syne God had pitten us intil 't, and jist gied a bit wag o' 's han' whiles to haud the deevil aff o' 's whan he was like to destroy the breed a'thegither. For the grace that he spak aboot, that was less nor the nature an' the providence. I cud see unco little o' grace intil 't."

Here Ericson broke in—fearful, apparently, lest his boy-friend should be actually about to deny the God in whom he did not himself believe.

"Robert," he said solemnly, "one thing is certain; if there be a God at all, he is not like that. If there be a God at all, we shall know him by his perfection—his grand, perfect truth, fairness, love—a love to make life an absolute good, not a mere accommodation of difficulties, not a mere preponderance of the balance on the side of well-being. Love only could have been able to create. But they don't seem jealous for the glory of God, those men. They don't mind a speck, or even a blot, here and there upon him. The world doesn't make them miserable. They can get over the misery of their fellow-men without being troubled about them, or about the God that could let such things be. They represent a God who does wonderfully well, on the whole, after a middling fashion. I want a God who loves perfectly. He may kill; he may torture even; but if it be for love's sake, Lord, here am I. Do with me as thou wilt."

Had Ericson forgotten that he had no proof of such a God? The next moment the intellectual demon was awake.

"But what's the good of it all?" he said. "I don't even know that there is anything outside of me."

"Ye ken that I'm here, Mr. Ericson," suggested Robert.

"I know nothing of the sort. You may be another phantom—only clearer."

"Ye speik to me as gin ye thocht me somebody."

"So does the man to his phantoms, and you call him mad. It is but a yielding to the pressure of constant suggestion. I do not know—I cannot know if there is anything outside of me."

"But gin there warna, there wad be naebody for ye to love, Mr. Ericson."

"Of course not."

"Nor naebody to love you, Mr. Ericson."

"Of course not."

"Syne ye wad be yer ain God, Mr. Ericson."

"Yes. That would follow."

"I canna imagine a waur hell—closed in amo' naething—wi' naething a' aboot ye, luikin' something a' the time—kennin' 'at it's a' a lee, and nae able to win clear o' 't."

"It is hell, my boy, or anything worse you can call it."

"What for suld ye believe that, than, Mr. Ericson? I wadna believe sic an ill thing as that. I dinna think I cud believe 't, gin ye war to pruv 't to me."

"I don't believe it. Nobody could prove that either, even if it were so. I am only miserable that I can't prove the contrary."

"Suppose there war a God, Mr. Ericson, do ye think ye bude (behoved) to be able to pruv that? Do ye think God cud stan' to be pruved as gin he war something sma' eneuch to be turned roon' and roon', and luikit at upo' ilka side? Gin there war a God, wadna it jist be sae—that we cudna prove him to be, I mean?"

"Perhaps. That is something. I have often thought of that. But then you can't prove anything about it."

"I canna help thinkin' o' what Mr. Innes said to me ance. I was but a laddie, but I never forgot it. I plaguit him sair wi' wantin' to unnerstan' ilka thing afore I wad gang on wi' my questions (sums).Says he, ae day, 'Robert my man, gin ye will aye unnerstan' afore ye du as ye're tellt, ye'll never unnerstan' onything. But gin de du the thing I tell ye, ye'll be i' the mids o' 't afore ye ken 'at ye're gaein' intil't.' I jist thocht I wad try him. It was at lang division that I boglet maist. Weel, I gaed on, and I cud du the thing weel eneuch, ohn made ae mistak. And aye I thocht the maister was wrang, for I never kent the rizzon o' a' that beginnin' at the wrang en', an' takin' doon an' substrackin', an' a' that. Ye wad hardly believe me, Mr. Ericson! it is only this verra day, as I was sittin' i' the kirk—it was a lang psalm they war singin'—that ane wi' the foxes i' the tail o' 't—lang division came into my heid again; and first aye bit glimmerin' o' licht cam in, and syne anither, an' afore the psalm was dune I saw throu' the haill process o' 't. But ye see, gin I hadna dune as I was tauld, and learnt a' aboot hoo it was dune aforehan'. I wad hae had naething to gang rizzonin' aboot, an' wad hae fun' oot naething."

"That's good, Robert. But when a man is dying for food, he can't wait."

"He micht try to get up and luik, though. He needna bide in 's bed till somebody comes an sweirs till him 'at he saw a haddie (haddock) i' the press."

"I have been looking, Robert—for years."

"Maybe, like me, only for the rizzon o' 't. Mr. Ericson—gin ye'll forgie my impidence."

"But what's to be done in this case, Robert? Where's the work that you can do in order to understand? Where's your long division, man?"

"Ye're ayont me noo. I canna tell that, Mr. Ericson. It canna be gaein' to the kirk, surely. Maybe it micht be sayin' yer prayers and readin' yer Bible."

Ericson did not reply, and the conversation dropped. It is strange that neither of these disciples should have thought of turning to the story of Jesus, finding some word that he had spoken, and beginning to do that as a first step towards a knowledge of the doctrine that Jesus was the incarnate God, come to visit his people—a very unlikely thing to man's wisdom, yet an idea that has notwithstanding ascended above man's horizon, and shown itself the grandest idea in his firmament?

A Proposed Resolution

To Be Presented to the Topeka Convention

(Editorial Opinion in Next Week's Issue.)

To the Friends of Christian Union.

This is my birthday anniversary, and I have decided to commemorate it by addressing my brethren on a most important subject. I have been the friend of Christian union ever since I became a Disciple, and their advocacy of this union had considerable influence in determining my choice to seek fellowship among them. I know something of their history, and it is my deliberate conviction that they have done more than any other religious people to foster the union sentiment and to find a scriptural basis for such a union. It is not claimed that they have done everything; nor is it claimed that the last word on Christian union has been spoken by them; but as they have been pleading for it during the whole century of their history they certainly have a right to be heard by the entire Christian world.

It is, therefore, my intention to offer substantially the following preamble and resolutions at the coming National Convention to be held in Topeka; and as it is most desirable to secure for them as wide a consideration as possible, and as a large number of those interested cannot attend the Convention, I have thought it proper to publish what I have to offer prior to the assembling of the Convention, so that a consensus of opinion may be obtained from those who cannot have the privilege of voting on the resolutions at the Convention. It is believed that this popular consensus of opinion will also help the Convention to wisely decide what shall be done in the matter. The following will indicate at least the scope and purpose of the resolutions to be submitted to the Convention, though the form is now put tentatively.

Preamble and Resolutions.

Whereas, This is the first National Convention of the Disciples of Christ since the celebration of their Centennial, and

Whereas, By a hundred years of history they have demonstrated their ardent and unalterable devotion to the cause of Christian union, and thereby have won the right to address the Christian world on this great subject, and

Whereas, The present seems a propitious time to make an earnest and united effort to end the divisions among Christians which have so long hindered the progress of the Gospel; therefore be it

Resolved, (1) That a committee of seven be appointed to prepare and send an address to Christians of all denominations, urging them to co-operate in every possible way, in order to realize the unity for which our divine Lord so fervently prayed, and which is so essential to the conversion of the world.

Resolved, (2) That this committee shall be instructed to briefly but clearly indicate what has been and what is still the position of the Disciples of Christ with respect to this important matter; but at the same time it shall be plainly stated that no ultimatum is presented in the address, and no hindrance even suggested that might interfere with the fullest and freest conference on the great subject of Christian union. The object being not controversy (for the day of controversy on this subject is practically ended) but rather to plead, in the spirit of that love which is greater than either faith or hope, for an open door where all who love our Lord Jesus Christ more than party shibboleths may enter and have fellowship on a platform of common agreement. In other words, the address shall embody faithfully the plea which the Disciples make, but it shall not present this plea as a final word to be spoken, but simply as a valuable contribution and a hopeful solution, at the same time asking for more light, if there is more light to be given from God's holy Word.

Resolved, (3) That this committee shall have power to organize, to establish headquarters, and correspond with other religious bodies, throughout the year, and report at our next National Convention.

It may be that this preamble and resolutions will be amended in some respects, as I am aiming only to indicate the main features which should be embodied. The Convention will have liberty to change as it may think proper; and when I hear from my brethren I may wish to change some things myself, for one of my reasons in addressing them is to secure their help in reaching the wisest possible conclusions. I wish, therefore, that every member of the Christian Churches who reads this will at once send me at least a post card with respect to the following special points:

1. Is the time propitious for such a movement?

2. Is the plan proposed in the Preamble and Resolutions approved or disapproved?

3. What names for the committee proposed are preferred, and what other suggestions are important?

Address me promptly by post card or letter at Pentwater, Michigan, until October 1st.

Respectfully and cordially,
W. T. Moore.

Centennial Monument Dedicated

Christian Women's Consecrated Labors Requited

A headquarters for the Women's Missionary Work, a Training School for Missionaries and a Centennial monument to the consecration of the womanhood of the Disciples of Christ—this is the significance of the opened doors of the Missionary Training School at Indianapolis of which a bare announcement was made in our news columns last week.

PRINCIPAL CHARLES T. PAUL.

The dedication service, simple and impressive, was held on Thursday afternoon, August 18th, in the beautiful Graham Chapel. A large audience was present, including all the missionary delegates from many lands, besides friends from many states in the union, and a representative attendance from Indianapolis and environs. It was inspiring to note that voices from India, China, Japan, Africa, Jamaica, the United States and Canada, were mingled together in praise for the splendid consummation which had come to an enterprise that will, under God's further blessing, mean much to the redemption of the whole world. From the halls of this institution will go out to the ends of the earth, men and women equipped by special training for the great and growing tasks of Christian leadership.

After appropriate devotional services, conducted by Mrs. Frank Wells, the address of cordial welcome was pronounced by Mrs. Atwater, president of the Board, Mrs. Cunningham spoke of the donors and of the gifts that had made the building a possibility. Mrs. Harlan announced that the plant, irrespective of furnishings, had cost some $90,000, and that the building was being dedicated free of debt. Applause greeted her announcement that an endowment of $250,000 would now be in order, and a special library fund of $5,000.

Mrs. Ida W. Harrison, who as Centennial Secretary, so eloquently pleaded the cause of the school, spoke of the inception and development of the enterprise and interpreted the ideals which it embodies. In part she said:

"Our first plan was to raise our Centennial Fund in one dollar offerings from persons outside our auxiliaries, but this was soon swept aside by our generous constituency, and we received hundreds, even thousands of dollars, from many friends. Mrs. Helen E. Moses was not able to go to the San Francisco Convention in 1905, and spent the time while the Convention was in session on a visit to a friend. When she told her of the Centennial plans, the friend regretted that a Missionary Training School had not been included in the list of Centennial Missions. What was in the heart of this friend was in the hearts of many other friends of the work—for no good and timely work is born exclusively in any one heart. There must be a demand for it from many sources before it can be successfully launched and consummated. So, hardly had the feet of the delegates from the National Convention touched their home soil, before necessity was laid upon our National Board to add a Missionary Training School to the original ten Centennial Missions, and the women of Indiana craved the privilege of raising twenty-five thousand dollars to start the undertaking. It came thus as one born out of due season, but it came in response to the call in the church at home, and the church on the mission fields for more definite and thorough preparation of Christian workers."

Professor Paul, the principal of the school, spoke briefly of the scope and purpose of the Training School. Dr. Day, of the Irvington Presbyterian Church, presented the greetings and congratulations of the ministers and churches of Indianapolis, and then came the crowning event of the occasion, the dedicatory address of President A. McLean.

After setting forth the practical utility, the necessity, of this building, Mr. McLean concluded with this graphic picture:

"I can imagine a very learned professor from Berlin or Harvard coming here to Butler College, and sitting down at President Howe's hospitable table, and asking, 'What is that large building between the college and the library?' and President Howe's face lights up, and he says, 'Why, that is the home of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.' And the great professor, who knows many things, but nothing of missions, says, 'What is that? I never heard of that. What constitutes that board?' And President Howe begins to tell him that that Board is made up of a large body of Christian women. He says there is no man in it. He says that Board might ask a man to make an address for it, or to examine an applicant. It might call on a man for a legal opinion, it might send out a man as a teacher, it might employ a man as a janitor to fire the furnace and sweep the halls, but no man ever did, and no man ever will, have a vote in this organization. Its management is wholly in the hands of women. And then he goes on to tell the professor how it differs from the average club managed by society women, who meet to show off their clothes, to drink wine and smoke cigarettes, play bridge-whist and euchre. He says, 'These are Christian women, these have given their lives, their all, to Jesus Christ as a personal Savior; these women are concerned in the work Christ began to do while on earth.' By this time the great professor drops his knife and fork, forgets his hunger, and asks what they do. And then President Howe tells him of the missions carried on in India, Mexico, South America, West Indies, Africa, and in the

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 11.

Theme for the Day.—Faith Through Prayer.

Scripture.—Lord, teach us to pray, Luke 11:1.

And all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive. Matt. 21:22.

Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief. Mark 9:24.

Let blow the trumpet strongly when I pray,
Till this embattled wall of unbelief,
My prison, not my fortress, fall away!
Then, if Thou willest, let my day be brief,
So Thou wilt strike Thy glory through the day.
—Alfred Tennyson ("Doubt and Prayer").

Prayer.—Our heavenly Father, we find that we need all the aids to faith which Thy care and love have provided us. We see the present with such distinctness, and the future so dimly, that we are tempted to content ourselves with the things in sight. Draw us by Thy mercies, if Thou canst! Drive us by sore troubles if need be, to the joy and the confidence of prayer. May the assembly of Thy people this day strengthen our souls for the morrow and for all the days, and may the week upon which we have now entered reveal to us more than ever before Thy presence and our need of Thee. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 12.

Theme for the Day.—Prayer for One Day.

Scripture.—And the children of Israel said unto Jehovah, We have sinned; do thou unto us whatsoever seemeth good unto thee; only deliver us, we pray thee, this day. Jud. 10:15.

Breathe Thy pure breath, watching Father,
On this marred day of Thine,
This wandering day of mine;
Be patient with its blur and blot,
Wash it white of stain and spot.
Reproachful eyes! Remember not That I have grieved Thee
On this day of Thine!
—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps ("A Prayer").

Prayer.—Holy Father, help us to plan our lives as if the day upon whose path we have now set foot were the only one we should have. We know that too often our time is marred by the false security in which we rest, feeling that we have all the days, and that a few hours of wasted time can mean no harm in our fabric of life. Help us, O Father, to know that time is Thine and not ours. We ask Thee to help us in our effort to repair the mistakes of the past, and to make less in the future, till we have no more wasted hours, but all shall bear fruit for Thee, now and in a world without end. Amen.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 13.

Theme for the Day.—The Tides of Life.

Scripture.—With Thee is the fountain of life. Psalm 36:8. And God said, Let the waters swarm with swarms of living creatures, and let birds fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven. Gen. 1:20. The spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty giveth me life. Job 33:4.

Being's tide
Swells hitherward, and myriads of forms
Live, robed with beauty, painted by the sun;
Their dust, pervaded by the nerves of God,
Throbs with an over-mastering energy
Knowing and doing.
—R. W. Emerson ("Pan").

Prayer.—Father of life, Thy hand is seen in all the wondrous domain of creation. Wherever we look, we are witnesses of the mystery and the might of Thy work in the ages past and at this hour. In our own bodies and souls the tides of life flow onward with unceasing current. We know that all this thrill of life is from Thee. Save us from the foolish mistake of forgetting Thee in the multitude of activities which Thy mercy grants us. We crave all there is of life, and we dare not let our souls be satisfied with less than the best. So open Thou our eyes, and feed us with the Bread of Life, for Thy name's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 14.

Theme for the Day.—Divine Perfection, and the Soul's Upward Struggle.

Scripture.—His work is perfect, for all His ways are justice. Deut. 33:4.

O Jehovah, my God, Thou art very great; Thou art clothed with honor and majesty. Psalm 104:1.

How precious also are Thy thoughts unto me, O God. Psalm 139:17.

Ye therefore shall be perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect. Matt. 5:48.

Do I task any faculty highest, to image success?
I but open my eyes,—and perfection, no more and no less,
In the kind I imagined, full-fronts me, and God is seen God
In the star, in the stone, in the flesh, in the soul and the clod.

And thus within and around me, I ever renew,
(With that stoop of the soul which in bending upraises it too)
The submission of man's nothing-perfect to God's all-complete,
As by each new obeisance in spirit, I climb to his feet.
—Robert Browning ("Saul").

Prayer.—Our Father, we are amazed at the glory disclosed to us in Thy work in the universe and in the lives of Thy servants, the saints of the past. How shall we satisfy our yearning to know Thee in fuller measure? How shall we come to that perfection of knowledge which our Lord ever enjoyed in his companionship with Thee? Our hearts would be borne down with despair at the heights of divine perfection before us, had we not the word of our Master, assuring us that in Thine own good time, we shall be like Thee. Give us courage to make every day some progress in the upward way to God. For we ask it in Jesus' name. Amen.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 15.

Theme for the Day.—The Place of Dreams.

Scripture.—We were like them that dream. Psalm 126:1.

Our bower is green, the beams of our house are cedars, and our rafters are firs.... ....and at our doors are all manner of fruits. Songs of Songs, 1:16; 7:13.

I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision. Acts 26:19.

A house not built by mortals,
In the summer days is mine;
Wide open stands its portals
All sweet with flower and vine.
Many a leafy pennant
Above my slumber streams;
I am God's happy tenant
In this dear house of dreams.
—Frank Dempster Sherman ("The House of Dreams").

Prayer.—Dear Father, we praise Thee for the gifts of mind with which Thou hast endowed us. We are able to rise out of the sordid reality of the daily life to a world of ideal beauty, where all of our dreams come true. Teach us, we pray Thee, how to use this great gift of imagination so that we shall not be a curse but a blessing. We could go singing on our way often when we only sigh. Grant us visions that shall lift us from sordidness and sin into the light of Thine own holy presence. Then all our house shall be beautiful, and our best hopes shall come to reality. Amen.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 16.

Theme for the Day.—The Restless Earth and the Calm Heavens.

Scripture.—Wherefore do ye spend your money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not? Isa. 55:2.

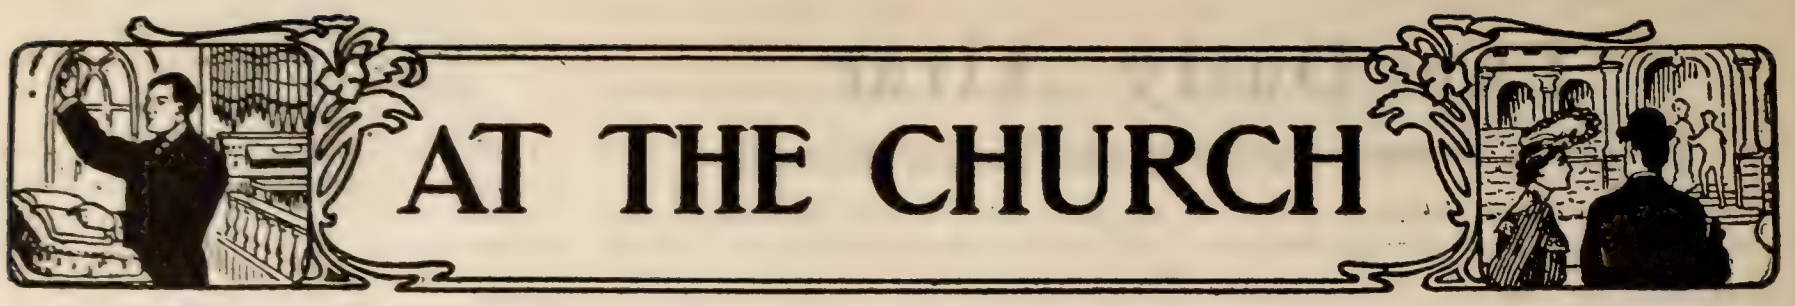
Look unto the heavens and see, and behold the skies which are higher than thou. Job 35:5.

Into those skies our factories rise,
Our engines dash through golden thrones;
In those calm eyes is no surprise,
There drop no loosened chalcedones.
—Thos. Hempsted ("The World of Spirits").

Prayer.—Holy and Righteous God, we confess before Thee the sins that make us displeasing to Thee. We are too selfish, too much do we seek after the common possessions that cannot give us satisfaction. We waste our strength in the effort to win things that lose their value and charm as soon as we gain them. Our time is lost in the winning of that which does not last. Yet Thou are the same calm and loving God. Thou hast seen all these wasting efforts made before, and Thou dost tarry in patience till we learn our hard lesson by failure and come back to Thee for rest. Help us to see the truth before we waste too much of the good day. And save us from the loss of the highest blessing, the Life Eternal. Amen.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17.

Theme for the Day.—The Power of the Seed.



Scripture.—In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withold not thy hand. Eccl. 11:6.

He that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting. Gal. 6:8.

A wonderful thing is a seed!
The one thing deathless forever—
Forever old and forever new,
Utterly faithful and utterly true,
Fickle and faithless never.

For plant lilies, and lilies will bloom;
Plant roses, and roses will grow;
Plant hate, and hate to life will spring;
Plant love, and love to you will bring
The fruit of the seed you sow.

Prayer.—In our hands, Father of mercies, Thou hast put the seeds of good, and every day's sowing is sure to bring its harvest. Save us from carelessness in our sowing. Our words and acts, even our thoughts, are seeds potent beyond all we can think for good or evil. Teach us the danger of trifling with such an unavoidable result. Reveal to us the contentment that comes with the assurance that the good seeds that we sow will not fail of fruitage. May we sow the seed of the kingdom in the field of the spirit, that we may reap life eternal. We pray in Jesus' name. Amen.

Controversies*

Among the forms of teaching which Jesus employed was the controversy. This was never chosen by him as the best means of arriving at the truth, for rarely is it such. But it was thrust upon him by those who sought to discredit him before the peoople. It was usually the effort of the foes of our Lord to impale him upon one or the other of the horns of some dilemma, either of which would seem to be fatal to his standing with the authorities or the people. In such cases Jesus does not seem to have made any effort to answer the questions, but directed his words to the silencing of the questioners. The three colloquies of this chapter illustrate this fact.

In the first instance the Pharisees and the Herodians, the orthodox religionists and the political agitators, combined forces to discredit him on a question of public policy. The taxes levied on the people of Palestine were very heavy. The government farmed out to the highest bidders the privilege of collecting the revenues, and the whole system was rotten with graft through all the official stages of the gathering and remittance of the money. The people more than once rose in furious rebellion against the injustices to which they were subjected. It was this condition that made the question asked of Jesus an admirable one to accomplish the purpose of getting him into trouble.

The Tribute Money.

If he said that the taxes were proper and should be paid, the people would be furious with him, and he would lose all the regard of his hearers. If on the other hand he condemned the system, it would be easy to use his words against him in a charge before the Roman officials that he was inciting the people to oppose the government. Either horn of the dilemma was fatal, as the plotters thought of it. It must have been with confidence and secret satisfaction that they approached Jesus to present their inquiries.

The Master saw at once their plan. He had no opinion to express on the matter they presented. His teaching never concerned itself with the conditions of his time which he could not improve. With marvelous insight he kept himself free from all intrusion into the forbidden themes that were points of constant dispute and disturbance among the men of his day. His concern was for principles and not rules of conduct. He had a solution for the vexed state of the public life. but it did not lie in the direction of revolution or social uprising, and the men of his day were not prepared to take his quiet and constructive remedy for the situation. So Jesus contented himself with the statement of the ideals which he knew would work when applied, and interfered not at all in the heated contests of his day. His attitude was well expressed on another occasion when he said to a man who demanded that he should settle a dispute between himself and his brother over the division of some property, "Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you?"

Caesar's Property, and God's.

But while Jesus had no word of advice to give regarding the taxes, he knew the necessity of silencing his critics and enemies. The method by which he did this was so subtle and effective that it stands as a masterful example of public and disconcerting response. If the questioners had come with the serious purpose of securing Jesus' opinion on the difficult question of the taxes, he would have given it to them, or would at least have made clear the principle on which they might act. But they had no such motive, and he was concerned only to close their mouths.

He asked to see the common coin, the denarius, with which the payment of taxes was made. It was a small silver coin worth perhaps eighteen cents of our money. It bore the face of the emperor and the usual inscription. Jesus took it in his hand and looked it over. "Whose picture and superscription is this?" he said, as if in curiosity over the form of the coin. "Caesar's," they answered. "Why, this is Caesar's property, isn't it?" he remarked. "Why not give to the emperor the things which are manifestly his, not forgetting at the same time to give to God the things that belong to Him?" Nothing could have been so effective in the presence of that crowd. There was nothing in what Jesus said to throw a ray of light upon the public policy of the time. He did not intend there should be. But no man could press the matter further, and the discomfitted questioners had to withdraw.

The Future Life.

The second question was represented by the Sadducees, the rivals of tne Pharisees, and members of the rich priestly party, who cared little for the tenets of religion, but very much for the profits of the temple traffic. While there were many doctrines which they professed, the one to which they assigned the most importance was the contradiction of all that the Pharisees taught. Among their tenets was the denial of the doctrine of the future life. It was upon this point that they made their attack upon Jesus. Their effort was to throw contempt upon the idea of the life to be by presenting a situation in which the theme fell into the pit of ridicule.

So they told the story, evidently a favorite one in their arsenal of weapons for controversy with the Pharisees, of the woman who successively married seven men, each of whom in turn left her a widow. Jesus met their bantering question with the fine dignity of a master. He told them they only showed their ignorance when they tried to impose human limitation upon the future life. He was not concerned to teach them anything regarding the mysteries of the life beyond. That was no part of his work. It was enough to announce its certainty. Its program he could not disclose in any language men could comprehend. He therefore dismissed them with the quiet condemnation of their ignorance and presumption, which must have stung them more than any victory of his in controversy would have done.

The Great Commandment.

The third question Jesus treated in yet a different way, for while it was asked only to draw him out, it presented a fine opportunity to drive home some of his own essential teachings. The debate as to the greatest commandment in the elaborate list of laws presented in and derived from the Old Testament was a common one in the Jewish schools. They knew all the subtle turns of the debate, and determined to force Jesus to show his ignorance in a public interrogation.

But he made short work of all the fine-spun theories of the scribes by boldly affirming that the whole law was comprehended in just two precepts, the love of God and the love of man. So complete and convincing was this answer of the Lord that even the teacher who had been chosen to open the colloquy could not repress his admiration for the masterly analysis of the theme which had been the ground of so many bitter debates. "Master, thou hast well said," he exclaimed; and Jesus, won by his open and fearless word of kindness, said to him, "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God." Perhaps in later days he was of the company of believers.

The Messiah.

Thus in replies to three questions, by three groups of opponents, Jesus had bested his enemies. On one of them he had turned the laugh of the crowd, another he had sent away smarting under his caustic rebuke, and the third he had won by the insight he had shown into the vexed theme of legal precedence. Now it was his turn to put them to the test. They professed to be teachers of the people. Of course they could answer all inquiries made of them. So he said to them, "In whose line, and of whose family do you expect the Messiah to come?" They replied that he would be of David's stock, as the Old Testament indicated. "But how then," said Jesus, "does David speak of his own son as Lord, in the familiar quotation from the Psalms" (110:11).

According to the usual views of the Jewish schools this psalm was both Davidic and Messianic. Without raising at all the question as to the correctness of these opinions on the authorship and purpose of the psalm, Jesus pointed out to them the absurdity of the usual view that the Messiah was to be a royal ruler of David's line. The spiritual meaning contained in such language they were unable to comprehend, and Jesus merely left them puzzled and silenced by his words. He had shown himself the master of controversy in a field where they were most confident. They burdened him with no more questions of the sort.

Christian Endeavor

By W. D. Endres.

Topic Sept. 18th: Resist Evil! How? Jas. 4:1-10; I Peter 5:8-9.

Sometimes we hear people talk as if a personal devil took possession of them and forced them to do things against their wills. They act sometimes as if they were not responsible for their deeds since they are so completely in his power. But the apostle James says in our lesson that these "wars" and "fightings" "come of your pleasure that war in your members." If we "receive not because we ask amiss, that we may spend it on our pleasures," then our temptations are our own selfish desires which we seek to gratify for the sake of the pleasure it gives us and we are ourselves to blame and no one else.

This is precisely what happens in actual experience. The drunkard who makes repeated attempts at reform only to break over at a later date is yielding to his own appetite. The boodler who sells his power in office for a money consideration is but satisfying his selfish desire for gain. The student in the high school or the college who writes facts on his cuff, or attempts secretly to consult his text book on examination day, is yielding to a morbid ambition which would give him a false value. In a like manner it is possible to trace the deeds of the denizen, the robber, the thief and all the rest to some selfish desire which the individual has who commits the deeds.

How resist them? What victim would not give his life to know? There are ways, but these who are so helplessly bound by the habits are scarcely able to see them, for their own follies blind them. We must resist. There must be firm resolve that we will not yield even the slightest degree. The person who attempts to "taper off" is already on the down grade to failure. Thousands of persons have rendered themselves helpless in making moral choices because they have gone at it on the installment plan. If it is wrong, it is wrong, and we ought to face about and do right at once.

But the surest way to resist evil is to do good. It isn't a question primarily of what not to do. It is far more than a negative consideration. The reform drunkard who starts out in the morning and saying as he goes, "I am not going to drink to-day," is almost certain to do so before the day is done. But if he begins the day by staying clear of the "bunch" and all the associations which tend to suggest it to his mind, and on the other hand preoccupies his mind with subjects which tend to sobriety and purity of life "evil will flee from him." If in his thought he "draws nigh to God" (seeks righteousness-rightness) God will "draw nigh unto him." This is of course, self-evident. The things we do are first conceived in the mind. Now if we choose the good, as we have the power to do, and engage in it, think and plan about it, it occupies the mind and excludes other things. But no one can resist evil and not do good, for his very idleness is evil. Jesus' life was one of continuous active service and so must ours be, if we would be like him.

The Church Ideal

The throb of human hearts wakes up the listless land,
There is the hearty grasp of comrades hand in hand;
The music of men's souls in all the arches ring,
The Church of Jesus moves—it is a living thing!

Church Life

—Begin at the Beginning!

—October 1 is the beginning —Of the Bethany Graded Lessons.

—Send today for samples, prices and an order blank!

—Your school wants its supplies on time —ahead of time.

—Mr. Pastor! Have you called your superintendent's attention yet to the Bethany Graded Lessons. Eight thousand Methodist schools adopted the Graded Lessons last year. Sixteen denominations are now using them with marvelous success. The Graded Lesson is foreordained to supplant the uniform lessons in the whole Sunday-school world.

—Do not let your school be behind in this great advance!

—Up to date the International Lesson Committee has authorized seven distinct graded courses: Two in Beginners grade, two in Primary grade, two in Junior grade and one in Intermediate grade. The Bethany Lessons include supplies for every one of these.

—No other complete course is being offered to the Disciples of Christ.

—Illinois Convention next week, September 12-16, at the capital city, Springfield. Pastors and workers will make special efforts to be there.

—New England Disciples will be meeting in annual convention at Brockton, Mass., when The Christian Century reaches its readers this week.

—We are compelled by pressure on our space this week to omit the serial story. The thread will be picked up again next week.

—An additional advantage of beginning the Bethany Graded Lessons, October 2, is that the teachers' quarterlies for all grades for the first quarter contain a "Foreword" which does not reappear in subsequent quarters. This "Foreword" is filled with expert information to the teacher concerning her work for the year.

SPECIAL TELEGRAM: There is only eight hundred dollars cash in the general fund of Church Extension, with many applications on hand. This should be greatly increased or serious distress will overtake our homeless mission churches. Urge large offerings for church extension.

H. E. Rossell has resigned at Paw Paw, Mich., and that church is looking for a minister.

J. H. Gilliland of Bloomington, Ill., preached the dedication sermon at Macomb, Ill., Sept. 4.

Joel Brown and Mr. Garmong, his singer, are conducting a union evangelistic meeting at Burlington, Colo.

Roy A. Miller of Eureka, Ill., is holding a series of meetings in the Woodland Church, near Danville, Ill.

H. M. Barnett is in a meeting with C. C. Wisher at Saybrook, Ill. Good outlook, Mr. Barnett has some open dates.

J. Harry Bullock has closed his three years' ministry at Footville, Wis. He has had seventeen added recently.

There were eleven added to the church at Butler, Mo., during August. One confession. William M. Mayfield is pastor.

Milo Atkinson, Covington, Ky., goes to the Centennial Church at Bloomington, Ill., from wnich J. H. Gilliland resigned some time ago.

The cornerstone of the Fourth Christian Church, Danville, Ill., laid August 21. A. E. Evans, of the Fourth Church, delivered the address.

N. H. Robertson has closed his work at Colfax, Ill., and taken the church at Stanford. Mr. Robertson was very successful at Colfax.

N. D. Weber, pastor of the church at Morristown, Ind., is assisting A. Burns in a meeting at Center Church, Rush County, of that state.

Evangelist Haynes just closed a meeting at Truscott, Tex., in which forty-three additions were reached. Chas. E. McVay led the singing.

The Central Church of Youngstown, O., presented their retiring pastor, Walter M. Goode, a purse at the close of his farewell service.

I. J. Cahill conducted the services at the First Church, at Findlay, Ohio, September 4. The building has been undergoing extensive repairs and was rededicated on that day.

S. J. Vance who has been in Idaho, for some time will return to his home in Carthage, Mo., and take up evangelistic work. He prefers to work with churches in the south.

As a result of a union tent meeting at Belleflower, Ill., L. S. Harrington has received eleven into the church, ten of whom were by baptism. The church expects to hold a meeting beginning September 18.

J. Warren Leonard has resigned at North Eaton, O., where he ministered the past year while attending Hiram College. He received his A. M. from that institution in June.

J. H. Gilliland, of Bloomington, Ill., will hold an evangelistic meeting for the Second Church, in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, in October. The church is expecting a great meeting. F. E. Smith is the successful pastor.

S. C. Brock, the minister at Dowagiac, Mich., has been obliged to give up his work on account of failure of his voice. Mr. Brock has done a spendid work and his retirement from the ministry is greatly to be regretted.

F. F. Walters, who closed his pastorate with the First Church in Joplin, Mo., has entered the evangelistic field. He is in his first meeting at Dexter, Mo., with E. J. Held, as singer, where they may be addressed during September.

C. E. Varney, the evangelist, is laid up at his home in Paw Paw, Mich., with a severe case of bronchitis. Mrs. Varney will hold the meeting at Saginaw this month, Mr. Varney being unable to preach for some time yet.

The church at Beatrice, Neb., takes another living link into the forces of her work. Miss Myrtle Warren joins the Sunday-school in these efforts. This church has four missionaries on the foreign field now. Such a spirit of unselfish service will make any church a mighty power.

The annual convention of the second distrist, Michigan, was held Tuesday and Wednesday last week at Paw Paw. Good convention. Next goes to Glendora. The new officers are: President, E. C. Hawley; vice president, J. A. Finley; secretary, Mrs.. William Crow; treasurer, Mrs. H. J. Reese.

The First Church at Canton, Ohio, must double the capacity of their plant. An adjoining lot has been purchased and plans are being drawn. The growth of this church has been every great. Its present building was erected only five years ago. P. H. Welshimer is the pastor.

The announcement that Frank E. Boren, pastor of the church at Vacaville, Cal., has resigned, is a mistake. He writes that he likes his "job" and has not been asked to go. — We are sorry that the mistake was made and gladly correct. — Mr. Boren is is one of our best ministers.

C. C. Wilson, pastor at Bellefontaine, O., preached a sermon recently at union vesper service which created an extraordinary amount of discussion in local circles. His subject was, "The Church and the Rights and Duties of Society Toward Labor." His sermon was reported at length in the local paper.

We regret that the announcement of the Oklahoma Christian Convention from D. A. Wickizer, pastor of the church at Tulsa where the convention was held, reached us too late for publication last week. We desire these announcements very much and always regret to have them come too late. Send your announcements in as early as possible.

B. L. Smith, pastor of the church at Salina, Kansas, held a special Labor Day service on the evening of September 4. Three hundred laboring men marched to the church in a body. Such services will not only help to break down the prejudice among the laboring men against the church but it will teach the church that it has both an obligation and an opportunity here.

The forty-fifth annual convention of the Disciples of Christ in New England meets September 8-11 at Brockton, Mass. This convention is held under the auspices of the New England Christian Missionary Society. As many as possible within the district should plan to attend. Among others who appear on the program are W. A. Parks, S. J. Corey and Joseph A. Serena.

S. S. Jones, pastor of the Third Church, Danville, Ill., is away on his vacation and in the meantime the church has been having some very interesting special services. The choir had charge of the evening services Aug. 21. Besides some appropriate special numbers, Mrs. Wilber F. Heath gave an address on: "The Relation of Music and Religion." On the following Sunday morning the official board of the church had charge of the program which they called, "The Old-Time Preacher."

The Christian Century is in receipt of a letter from W. R. Harper of Los Angeles, Cal., stating that the First Christian Church is arranging a celebration on the twentieth anniversary of Mr. Smither's pastorate in that church, on the evening of September 15. On this occasion the members will present their pastor a neatly bound book of autograph congratulatory letters from his friends. A twenty year pastorate is a rare accomplishment among the Disciples of Christ. Both pastor and people are to be heartily congratulated. May the Lord give Mr. Smither many more years of fruitful service with his people in Los Angeles.

S. G. Buckner has resigned at Elkhart, Ind., to accept a call from the church at Ashtabula, O. Mr. Buckner has done a very commendable piece of work at Elkhart. He raised a church debt of $1,000 and has received 250 people into the membership of the church. He was ambitious to build a new church at Elkhart, which all agree is badly needed. The church board felt, however, that they were not strong enough to undertake it now. This difference of judgment, which carries with it only the most cordial feeling, was the cause of Mr. Buckner's resignation.

We are in receipt of a weekly church bulletin from North Tonawanda, N. Y., bearing on the same page the names of the First Baptist Church and the Payne Ave. Church of Christ, giving below the names and residences of the respective pastors and a quotation from our Lord's prayer for union. This arrangement lasted for two months. The first month the Baptist minister, Mr. Gilbert, had charge of the services, and during the second month the services were conducted by V. W. Blair, pastor for the Disciples. What hinders these churches from being one in fact?

The South Street Church, Springfield, Mo., under the leadership of Frank L. Moffett, will dedicate its new $40,000 building Sept. 18. The building is especially designed to meet the needs of modern methods of church work. The seating capacity will be about 1,000. On Thursday evening, Sept. 15, an organ recital will be given to celebrate the installation of the $3,500 pipe organ. The new church will be one of the finest in the city and will take its place among the first class churches of the brotherhood. Dr. H. O. Breeden, now pastor of the First Church in San Francisco, will give the dedicatory address. Mr. Moffett is doing an abiding work in Springfield.

P. H. Welshimer is moving things in his characteristic style in Canton, Ohio. Akron, Ohio, a city of 69,000 population and forty-four Sunday-schools challenged Canton which has a population of 52,000 and thirty-two Sunday-schools to an attendance contest for the summer with the result of a total attendance of 163,241 for Canton, and 155,910 for Akron. During the same period the First Church in Canton held a contest with the four Disciple church-schools of Akron. Canton excelled by 3,978. The average attendance of the Canton School for the four months was 1,737 per Sunday. During August it was 2,296. The building was not large enough part of the time and classes were conducted in the street. One-fifth of all who attend Sunday-school in Canton go to the First Church.

A Contribution in Church Architecture

On our cover we give our readers a view of the accepted design for the new First Church of Springfield, Ill. This building promises to be not only a most convenient and beautiful home for this congregation and an ornament to the capital city, but a contribution to the architecture of the Disciples of Christ. It is to cost $100,000, and will seat,—nave, transepts and balconies,—1,000 persons. The sanctuary, 82x73 feet in size, is cruciform in shape, with sloping floor. A new feature for Disciple churches is the position given the communion table at the center and rear of the apsidal chancel. Seats for the Elders are to be built on each side of the table. The central portion of the chancel floor is lower than at each end and will be of mosaic with marble steps. The organ divides into two halves between which is the baptistry, of marble front, and always open. In front of the left half of the organ is the choir; in front of the right half is the pulpit with the minister's stalls. Most elaborate accommodations are provided in the chapel for the Sunday-school. As well as can be pledged from an architects drawing, it looks as if this great congregation is being led by F. W| Burnham, the pastor, into erecting one of the half dozen noblest houses of worship in the brotherhood.

The Men's Parade at the Topeka Convention

Last Lord's Day, Robt. Hopkins, National Superintendent of Bible Schools, preached in the morning at the First Church and in the afternoon addressed an assembly composed of representatives of the Adult Bible Classes of our people in the city. At that time the details of the great men's parade were worked out. It is expected that over 4,000 men will be in line, which will exceed any similar demonstration ever made by our people. One thousand men are coming from Kansas City to participate in the march and we understand are to bring their own military band with them. Topeka will head the procession with several hundred men, led by Marshall's Band, the greatest amateur organization west of the Mississippi. The Governor, himself, with other dignitaries, will head the procession in carriages and the line of march will be through the most crowded and prominent districts of Topeka. All along the line of march the women of the convention will be massed, especially on the steps and entrances of the various churches, and thousands will stand upon the great steps of the majestic capitol building near the end of the march.

The State Capitol is the headquarters of the convention. Upon arriving in the city guides will conduct all delegates to the registration and assignment tables stationed on the north wing of the first floor of the great building. Here in these cool retreats, flanked by marble facings, and bronze statuary, will be gathered together all the exhibits of the convention. If as yet, you have not asked for an assignment for your exhibit write at once to Geo. E. Lyon, 703 Jackson street, Topeka, Kansas, who is chairman of the committee on exhibits.

Remember that this great building is the headquarters of the Convention, and all delegates must come here for registration and assignment. Already 7,000 places are provided for and next week the committee of 300 will canvass the city again after which there will be a place in Topeka for everybody.

United States. He tells the learned professor who has never heard of this Board what is being done on the Pacific Coast for the Chinese and Japanese, what is being done for the education and evangelization of the negroes, of the mountain schools, orphanages, hospitals and dispensaries supported by this organization. He tells him of its literature, Tidings, King's Builders, books, booklets and leaflets sent out every year; he tells him this Board has collected and disbursed already millions of dollars, and, yet in its infancy, is establishing a great training school to send out workers to all parts of the earth. The great professor says, 'I am thankful for this great story you have told me. I never heard it before, but I shall go back home with more faith in the human race than I had when I came, because of this story.'

"This great building is a standing witness to Jesus Christ in this community. I was reading yesterday morning in a book I brought with me what Emerson said: 'What is civilization? I answer it is the power of good women,' and friends, this building is one of the evidences of the activity of good women. This building is called by the name of a good woman, but that woman's life was glorified by her relation to Jesus Christ. He made Mrs. Deterding's life beautiful as it was, and this building is a tribute to Jesus Christ. I think of those words of President Lincoln at Gettysburg, when he said, 'We cannot dedicate this building.' Friends, this building has been in process of dedication for the last six or eight months by the work done in it, and by God's help it shall be progressively dedicated as the years come and go. A larger work shall be done in its halls, and a greater influence sent out through all the world. All we can do today is to say this building is finished and ready for worship and work. All we can do today is to say to Jesus Christ our Lord, 'Take this building, erected by a great host of Christian people, whose own lives have been redeemed, and who are concerned with all others that live on the globe; take this building; it is thine, and use it for the furtherance of the Gospel and the completion of thine own gracious purposes, and at the same time let thy richest blessings rest upon the good women who conceived this idea, those who planned it, those who built it, and who shall work within its walls, and on all who shall labor under its auspices, and to thy great name we shall give the praise and all the glory through time and in eternity.'"

DRAKE UNIVERSITY AND CAMPUS

Drake University is twenty-nine years old, has eleven buildings devoted exclusively to school purposes, employs more than 150 instructors, and has an annual attendance of more than 1,800 students The University is located in the best suburb of "Beautiful Des Moines," with easy access to every point of educational and religious interest in the city. Library facilities are unexcelled in the West, living expenses are moderate and opportunities for remunerative employment are unusually good. School is in session throughout the year.

THE COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE

The Bible College of Drake University was established at the opening of the school in 1881. It is

Free from the limitations of man-made creeds and sectarian domination; has a faculty of earnest scholars, each an expert in some branch of Bible study; maintains that spirit of loyalty to Christ which leaves the mind free to "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good"; has organic union with a large and rapidly growing university and affords an opportunity of hearing in lecture or recital many of the most famous world characters. Des Moines is an educational, artistic, industrial and religious center.

MEDICAL MISSIONARIES

Drake University has more Medical Missionaries in the field than any other of our schools. No other institution in the Brotherhood offers the advantages to be found at Drake University. The College of Medicine of Drake University is standard by every test applied to such institutions. The training of the medical missionary in the College of Liberal Arts, the College of the Bible and the College of Medicine assures the best preparation for complete service.

THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

INTERNATIONAL COURSE

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR

Purpose—The purpose of the Graded Lessons is: To meet the spiritual needs of the pupil in each stage of his development. The spiritual needs broadly stated are these:

1. To know God as he has revealed himself to us in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ..... 2. To exercise toward God, the Father, and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, trust, obedience, and worship..... 3. To know and to do our duty to others..... 4. To know and do our duty to ourselves.

COURSES	Age of Pupils	AIM	PUBLICATIONS
BEGINNERS		To lead the little child to the Father by helping him: 1. To know God, the heavenly Father, who loves him, provides for, and protects him. 2. To know Jesus the Son of God, who became a little Child, who went about doing good, and who is the Friend and Saviour of little children. 3. To know about the heavenly home. 4. To distinguish between right and wrong. 5. To know his love for God by working with him and for others.	Lessons prepared by FRANCES W. DANIELSON

Second Year	5		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Large Pictures (9x12 inches) Beginners' Stories—(Illustrated folder for pupils) Part I, II, III, IV	Ready
PRIMARY		To lead the child to know the heavenly Father, and to inspire within him a desire to live as God's child: 1. To show forth God's power, love, and care, and to awaken within the child responsive love, trust, and obedience. 2. To build upon the teachings of the first year (1) by showing ways in which children may express their love, trust, and obedience; (2) by showing Jesus the Saviour, in his love and work for men; and (3) by showing how helpers of Jesus and others learn to do God's will. 3. To build upon the work of the first and second year by telling (1) about the people who chose to do God's will; (2) how Jesus, by his life and words, death and resurrection, revealed the Father's love and will for us; (3 such stories as will make a strong appeal to the child and arouse within him a desire to choose and to do that which God requires of him. The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.

The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year. While these courses may be begun at any time, there is especial advantage in beginning at the beginning, October 1.

William E. Curtis, the well-known correspondent, writes that the revolution of 1906 is practically forgotten in Russia. He says: "The peasants have been making good money for several years. They are saving it, and many of them are using every means within their reach, except education, to improve their condition. They have better homes and furniture than they ever had before; they are breeding up their horses, sheep and cattle; they are buying labor-saving machinery and the best seed in the market, and still have money in the bank." A small temperance movement has also made itself felt. "A benevolent society, of which the Duke of Orenburg, a brother-in-law of the czar, is president, is doing a great deal of good in supplying substitutes for saloons—temperance resorts and loafing places, where the peasants can spend the long winter evenings amusing themselves without getting drunk. Non-alcoholic drinks are sold at these places, with a sufficient profit to maintain them, and they are now found in almost every village."

Five million of the new ten cent postal savings stamps have been completed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Cards large enough to hold nine of the stamps will be sold at 10 cents each, thereby making a card with the nine stamps thereon worth $1. The new two cent stamp which is to be placed as a frank on letters of official business with the postal savings bank has also been printed. It is said that these two new stamps are by far the most artistic ever printed by the government. The Treasury Department has received requests from 566 postmasters for the establishment of postal banks in their offices and from 1,093 banks making application to be designated depositories for postal savings funds.

OCTOBER 11 TO 17, 1910

This train, equipped with Standard Pullman Sleepers, Santa Fe Tourist sleepers and reclining chair cars, will leave Dearborn Station, Chicago, at 10 p. m., Monday, October 10, arriving in Topeka at one o'clock the next afternoon.

This special train will be operated under the auspices of the Christian Century, for the use of delegates and others attending the National Convention.

The equipment is all new and modern. The engine powerful and fast. The Santa Fe track is heavily ballasted,—double track most of the way—safeguarded by block signals and kept in perfect condition.

Fred Harvey will serve breakfast in a dining car that will be attached before the train reaches Kansas City and lunch at the dining room at Topeka after the train arrives.

You should not fail to attend the National Convention. It is of great importance that you be there.

You should make up your mind early and secure space on the Christian Century Special.

The Approach to Christendom

SHALL THE DISCIPLES OF CHRIST ADDRESS A LETTER TO THE CHRISTIAN DENOMINATIONS ON CHRISTIAN UNITY?

Dr. W. T. Moore signalizes his seventy-ninth birthday by writing a letter to his brethren, asking them to do so.

He reminds us that the Topeka Convention will be the first general convocation of the Disciples since their Centennial celebration last year. He declares that the first one hundred years of their history have demonstrated so ardent and fixed a devotion to the cause of unity that they have won the right to address the Christian world on this theme. And he believes the present state of sentiment throughout Christendom is such as to make this the nick of time.

Therefore, Dr. Moore proposes that the Topeka convention appoint a committee of seven to prepare and send an address to Christians of all denominations, urging upon them the duty of obedience to the will of Christ as expressed in his prayer for unity.

The Christian Century welcomes this proposal, and the natural warmth with which it is supported by this paper is increased by the sense that in so doing we are extending the most acceptable sort of birthday felicitations to the brotherhood's "grand old man."

We venture to believe, also, that no one more than himself would wish our advocacy of his proposal to be as discriminating and candid as we are able to make it.

The value of Dr. Moore's suggestion lies not in the bare fact that he proposes the sending of an address, but that he describes the kind of an address that should be sent—the only kind that will gain the ear of other Christians.

It is not a new thing for the Disciples to send overtures to other Christians on the subject of Christian union. From the day, forty years ago, when the fruitless call went forth for a Christian Union Conference of representatives of all evangelical denominations to be held in Louisville, to the present year, in which the President of the American Missionary Society issued to the clergy and editors of English and American Christendom a finely composed address on the "Unfinished Task of the Reformation"—from that day to this the Disciples have been issuing pamphlets and tracts and addresses and overtures on Christian union.

Despite this unparalleled prolificacy in issuing addresses on this theme, the plea of the Disciples is startlingly unknown. Not one of the overtures from this brotherhood has met with decent respect at the ecclesiastical courts of Christendom.

It may be admitted as perfectly true, as Dr. Moore says, that the Disciples have done more than any other religious people to foster the union sentiment. But this conceit is empty enough. Other religious bodies were not organized for the purpose of union, but of division. The Disciples were organized for the especial business of promoting unity by pleading for it and practicing it among themselves and with all Christians. It is scant praise, therefore, to say that we have done more than other religious bodies.

But why is it that our overtures have found their way in an unchecked stream into Christendom's waste basket? There are two answers. One is that in actual practice the Disciples have not seemed to exemplify the Christian union ideal any more plainly than the denominational bodies.

The other answer is that no single overture has yet been issued by the Disciples in a genuine Christian union spirit.

This is the answer that has to do with the proposed address to be authorized by the Topeka Convention, so we may pass by answer number one until some occasion calls upon us to consider it also.

Answer number two is a very blunt putting of the case. But the Disciples are a very blunt speaking folk and prefer to be spoken to in plain, unflattering terms.

The truth is that the long line of overtures on unity issued by the Disciples of Christ to their Christian brethren have been vitiated by the sectarian insistence upon something that has been called "our position." Such an overture naturally would be treated with no more consideration than would any other sect's invitation to all the rest to come and join it.

Usually this "position" has been stated as the restoration of New Testament Christianity. This has been put forward with all the zest of a new discovery and a unique possession. But to the Christian leader of another fold this New Testament Christianity idea is a truism. He, too, and his church, are striving to restore New Testament Christianity as they understand it.

The difference between the Christian denominations and the Disciples of Christ is not that they are trying to maintain some other kind of Christianity than the New Testament kind, while the Disciples are trying to maintain the New Testament kind. The difference consists in a different understanding among all the evangelical bodies as to what New Testament Christianity is.

Does anybody think the Disciples care more for New Testament Christianity than Presbyterians or Baptists or Episcopalians? It is this gratuitous and impertinent assumption that has rendered our plea abortive and caused our overtures, even such a graciously worded appeal as that of President Peter Ainslie, to produce less conviction than irritation.

Now the significant thing in Dr. Moore's proposal is that the address to be authorized by the Disciples' convention shall be conceived and formulated in a Christian union spirit. He would have the address embody what he says "has been and still is the position of the Disciples," but only as a "contribution and a hopeful solution, at the same time asking for more light."

That is to say, if we may amplify and interpret his words, the Disciples wish the Christian world to seriously study the problem of union and to study it together; we, the Disciples, do ourselves wish to study it, to inquire afresh into the complex conditions of the modern church, to open anew the pages of God's word; and we wish to do this not in the privacy of our own sectarian chambers, but in the common class-room, side by side with all disciples who sit devoutly at the great Teacher's feet.

If the Disciples prepare an address in that temper and conveying that spirit, it will be received by Christians of all denominations as a message from God. And it will not return unto Him void.

But we see one danger in Dr. Moore's description of the letter he would have the convention authorize. It is the opposite defect to that which has characterized our overtures hitherto.

There are two kinds of appeals for union. One is sectarian—the "come to our position" kind of appeal. The other is sentimental—it sheds tears and whines over our divisions, but it opens up no pathway in which Christians may walk together.

The Disciples' appeal is neither sectarian nor sentimental. If the proposed overture is not to be sectarian neither must it be sentimental. What characterizes the Disciples' plea essentially is not a so-called "position" or "basis" of union, nor yet a vague emotion about union, but a positive principle of union.

The "position" upon which Christian union may be practiced is a variable one, progressively changing as new problems and new light arise. But the principle upon which union is to be achieved, and maintained when once it is achieved, is constant through all the changes of "position" or practice.

Our fear concerning the address defined by Dr. Moore's resolutions is that in avoiding the Scylla of sectarian presumption it would be lost on the Charybdis of sentimentality. There was never as at this hour so great a yearning for positive leadership in Christian union. It is no time to speak gingerly and apologetically. It is no time to state "our position" and then say we will not insist upon it. It is no time at the opening of a new century to belie our first century.

Rather is it a time to clearly reinterpret and firmly grasp the great deep meaning of our movement. The Disciples have the fundamental contribution to make to the enterprise of reuniting Christ's church.

Instead, therefore, of putting into the proposed address a so-called "position" and then withdrawing it, The Christian Century would urge that the convention leave out of the address all talk of "our position," and press in conscience-searching, vision-kindling words the great principle of unity by which the Disciples have sought, however blindly and even contradictorily, through one hundred years to answer their Lord's great prayer.

The Fall and Rise of Peter

"Allah is merciful." This is the answer Mr. William F. Curtis received when he asked a Mohammedan why he got drunk. The man admitted that is was contrary to the teaching of his religion but he was evidently of the opinion that Allah did not expect his commands to be taken very seriously. It is possible that some of us who think we are Christians have no better idea of God. The gospel of forgiveness is the gospel of upright conduct. None but a very stupid or a dishonest person will plead the mercy of God as an excuse for repeated sinning. The mercy of God in Christ assures us that it is worth while to make the fight for character.

Ignorance was one cause of Peter's fall. He did not know how insignificant were the opinions of the servants and officers in the court of the high priest. The game of politics can be learned from men in office and their dependents. It is safe to look elsewhere for the deeper movements of the spirit. Peter the fisherman had too much reverence for the official representatives of religion and not enough confidence in his own judgment. In his fear he forgot what he saw in Jesus at Caesarea Philippi and he forgot the glory of his Master's ministry. Thus do men substitute the coarse judgment of the world for their finer, truer insights.

The desertion of the other apostles undermined Peter's courage. The poets do well to sing of men who stand alone. But even Elijah asked that he might die when he felt that he was the only loyal worshiper of Jehovah. The education of Peter was incomplete. He needed the encouragement of other friends of Jesus. Later in life he was able to stand against the world. In the dark hour of temptation every man needs a friend to speak to his better nature. If he can have recalled vividly the good men and women that have loved and trusted him, if he can be made to see again the ideals he once cherished, wickedness will lose its charm and stern duty will wear a kind face.

Peter was not entirely freed from false notions of the kingdom of God. It was hard for him to believe in a suffering Messiah. Doubtless he felt that his nation had endured its full measure of suffering and that the coming of the Messiah would mean its speady vindication and exaltation. He was unprepared to see his Master in the hands of the priests and apparently unable to save himself from condemnation and death. He was confused and in his confusion he denied that he had ever been with Jesus. Men who break with custom and tradition at the call of God are apt to act inconsistently. They do not see at once what is involved in the new way of living. The disciples of Jesus were in the transition stage at the time of the crucifixion. They did not realize whither the principles already accepted by them would lead in the end. Had Peter been aware of the full significance of discipleship, he would not have been so quick to deny his relation to Jesus.

The look of Jesus brought Peter to himself. The jeering mob was forgotten when the disciple saw the face of the Master. That look brought back the memory of what Jesus had been to Peter. The denial was a sin against love. The meanness of all sin is that it is a denial of love. All obligation is rooted in love. We ought to tell the truth because lying injures some one. We ought to be honest because dishonesty robs some one of what he is entitled to have. The way of recovery from sin is the way of love. The love of Jesus saved Peter. An essay on loyalty would not have helped him much. The philosophy of religion is useful to persons who are already religious. The doctrine of the atonement is satisfying after we have been forgiven. It is divine love incarnate that lays hold upon broken lives and restores them to health.

The resurrection convinced Peter that what he saw in Jesus was an expression of that which is eternal. It was pleasant to know Jesus. But what if his kindness was something alien to the heart of things? What if the ruling passions of men were greed and lust for power? The disciple would have had no gospel if he had been driven to the belief that Jesus was out of harmony with the order of things. The gospel of Pentecost was that of victorious love. It is this sort of gospel that is needed by every sinful soul. "If God is for us, who is against us?" To convince men that God is for them is the business of the church of Christ.

Midweek service, Sept. 21. Luke 22:31-34, 54-62; Acts 2:14.

What means this sense of lateness that so comes over one now, as if the rest of the year were downhill, and if we had not performed anything before we should not now? . . . . How early in the year it begins to be late!—H. D. Thoreau.

Editorial Table Talk

The New Prohibition Leader

A little bit the best piece of oratory we have read since we laboriously dug out the classic treasures of Demosthenes and Cicero in their original tongues, is the reported speech of William J. Bryan at the democratic convention of Nebraska. The speech is printed in full in Mr. Bryan's Commoner. It is the utterance of a great leader. It rings with challenge and glows with appeal. It meets an immediate situation with marvelous delicacy and power, and yet it reaches out to the larger situation which his democratic auditors did not see, and deals with it with statesmanly grasp and insight. At his first leap into the arena where the anti-saloon fight is waging, Mr. Bryan deals blows which warrant the prediction that he will lead the prohibition forces of the nation. In one paragraph throbbing with eloquence, he lays bare his heart and his conception of the battle that is now on:

> Do not accuse me of bringing this question into politics; I met an issue after it had been introduced, and if I have any apologies to offer, I shall not offer them to the liquor interests for speaking now; I shall offer them to the fathers and mothers of this state for not speaking sooner. If I am to blame at all, it is for keeping silent when they had more reason to ask me to speak, than the brewers have to expect me to keep silent at this time.
> But even after I had expressed an opinion on this subject, I did not at once decide to make an active fight. I dreaded, as I have never dreaded anything before, entering a discussion where I might find myself out of harmony with these men whom I have loved and with whom I have worked all these years. Not until I came home from a trip to South America, arriving here in April, did I decide what I would do. When I reached home I learned what was being done; I found that the liquor interests of the nation had entered Nebraska politics, and that the liquor interests of the nation were joined with the brewers of Omaha, for I received the information from one who talked with both. They were banded together to select the senators in this state that they might block legislation that was unfavorable to them. I satisfied myself that the other special interests were allied with the brewery interests, and that they were about to burglarize the state of Nebraska and that they intended to use the democratic party as the tool with which to break into the state house. What could I do but give the alarm? I acted as I would if I saw a man attempting to burglarize the house of a neighbor. You may not believe me, or if you do, you may be indifferent, but I shall warn you that the conspiracy is going on.

The Heresy Test

Those three young candidates for the Presbyterian ministry, among them a brother of Professor Hugh Black, whose heresy cases have been appealed by their accusers from presbytery to Synod and from Synod to General Assembly, have had almost as uncomfortable a time as their ancient prototypes, the three Hebrews, who were cast into the fiery furnace. The Assembly held last May denied the appeal of the minority from New York Presbytry by an overwhelming majority. The Commissioners were strongly set against bringing such questions up to the Assembly. This ended the cases of these three young men. But the shrewd minority leaders proposed on overture to the presbyteries providing that if the theological examination of a ministerial candidate is unsatisfactory to one fourth of the members, that minority shall have a right to formulate a series of questions to which the candidate shall make answer in writing. The intention of the overture is to make it easy to get these cases before the General Assembly by the use of the candidate's written replies. In a vigorous editorial The Interior characterizes this as unfair both to presbyteries and to candidates. It contends that it should remain as now a possible but difficult matter to bring a heresy trial into the General Assembly. The right to determine the ministry of the church should lodge with the presbyteries, where candidates are well known and can be judged in their life and spirit as well as their words. "It is unfair to the church's sons," says the editorial. "What a lad believes counts much in his fitness for the ministry, but try him on that alone and you commit a gross wrong against him. How he believes and why he believes and whereunto he believes and how much life he has put back of his beliefs, and what quality of life withal—whether it is Christ-like or not—all these things you must know to be just. And all that is what can't be carried up to Assembly on a piece of paper."

These are immense words, applicable not only to the discussion of Presbyterian technical procedure, but to the whole church's conception of its ministry. Real heresy is not a question of doctrine that it can be communicated on paper, but of life. Rightness in life, in enthusiasm, in spiritual delicacy is infinitely more vital in the minister than correctness of thinking.

A Four Square Corner Stone Laying

How it could have gotten away from The Christian Century to tell its readers of a most interesting cornerstone-laying service in the parish of its London correspondent, Rev. Leslie W. Morgan, no one could understand unless he were made to see the heaps of work which the editor has been trying to level down since his return from England. But here it is at the bottom of the heap. We give it now with shame-faced apologies to the man whose words our readers eagerly watch for, and to the faithful congregation to which the self-same delinquent editor had the pleasure of preaching a Sunday last summer. The Hornsey Church, in London, has been worshipping since its organization in a temporary iron building. Three years ago determined efforts were begun to build an acceptable house of worship. Steadily through these years the fund has accumulated until on the Sunday the editor preached there it was announced by the pastor that the house would be begun at once. The corner stones were laid August 18 with as appropriate and beautiful a cermony as one could wish. Not one stone, but four—a stone for each corner was set in its place. On one was inscribed this, "The Children's Stone, Laid by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Traxler, to the Honor and Glory of God"; on another, "This stone was laid by F. Coop, Esq., President of the Christian Association, in Honor of New Testament Christianity, in Faith, Ordinances and Life"; on another, "This Stone was Laid by Wm. Durban, B. A., Pastor of this Church 1891-1901, in Memory of Dr. J. W. Kirton, (Temperance Advocate, Founder and First Pastor of this Church), in recognition of the Increasing Triumph of Temperance Principles"; and on the fourth, "This Stone was Laid by Leslie W. Morgan, B. A., B. D., (Pastor of this Church, 1905—), in Joyful Recognition of the Growing Spirit of Christian Unity." Mr. and Mrs. Charles Traxler, who learned to be Disciples of Christ in Akron, Ohio, and have been teaching others during a twelve years' residence in London, are paying more than one-half the cost of the new buidling. They are a gracious influence in the work of the Disciples throughout England. Mr. Morgan's ministry has been singularly prosperous and is full of promise of greater things in the future.

Christian Union Foundation

As a tangible outcome of the Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union held in London last July, a Christian Union League was launched for the purpose of promoting the sentiment of unity and studying the practical problem of bringing it about. The Christian Century regards this league as the most significant and promising enterprise in connection with the Disciples' work in Great Britain. The intention is to relieve it entirely from the suspicion of being a denominational propaganda by officering it with influential leaders of various denominations. Later on we purpose to say something more about this league. Just now our attention is called to "The Christian Unity Foundation," to the establishment of which a layman of the Episcopal church in this county has contributed $10,000. The purpose of this new foundation is declared to be "to promote Christian unity at home and throughout the world. To this end to gather and disseminate accurate information relative to the faith and works of all Christian bodies; to set forth the great danger of our unhappy divisions, and the waste of spiritual energy due thereto; to devise and suggest practical methods of coöperation, substituting comity for rivalry in the propagation of the common faith; to bring together all who are laboring in the same field, and this in the belief that full knowledge of one another will emphasize our actual membership in the one body of Christ, and our common agreement in the essentials of faith. "That, finally, by the operation of the Spirit of God, the various Christian bodies may be knit together in more evident unity in the essentials of faith and practice and in one organic life." This declared purpose is every way admirable. The officers of the foundation are, however, all members of the Episcopal church thus neutralizing considerably the good effect of the Catholic sentiments expressed in the declaration. Nevertheless, if so be that Christian Unity be preached even with sectarian motives, we have reason still to thank God.

Prospects are growing brighter constantly for the consumation of the union of Methodists, Presbyterians and Congregationalists of Canada. On August 26, the Canadian General Conference of the M. E. Church, voted by an overwhelming majority in favor of the union. Previously the other two denominations had agreed to the proposal. It is earnestly hopel that the fate of other similar attempts to unite denominations of so separate a history may not overtake this one. Disciples everywhere and especially in their conventions now being held will implore the divine guidance for this movement.

A Prayer for Unity

OFFERED IN WESTMINISTER ABBEY.

By Bishop Brent of the Philippine Islands.

"O God, who didst plan the gospel for an undivided church, refuse not, because of the misunderstandings of its message which rend the unity of Christendom, to continue thy saving work in the broken order of our making. Prosper the labors of all churches bearing the name of Christ and striving to further righteousness and faith in him. Help us to place the truth above our conception of it, and joyfully to recognize the presence of thy Holy Spirit wherever he may choose to dwell among men. Teach us wherein we are sectarian in our contentions, and give us grace humbly to confess our fault to those whom in past days our Communion has driven from its fellowship by ecclesiastical tyranny, spiritual barrenness, or moral inefficiency, that we may become worthy and competent to bind up in the church the wounds of which we are guilty, and so to hasten the day when there will be one flock under one Shepherd, Jesus Christ our Lord."

"Fear Not, Little Flock"

It was only a little flock that truly belonged to Christ during the days of his incarnate ministry. Sometimes there were crowds that pressed upon him—multitudes who followed in his train to hear his wonderful words and see his amazing works; but those who had truly accepted him as their Lord and Master were only a small company. With what pathetic tenderness did he comfort and inspire them when he said to them, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Often since then in the shifting tides of the history of the Church of Christ, there have been times when the number of the true children of the Kingdom has been small indeed. Have we not fallen upon such a day? Whatever may be said of great religious movements of this period and of the numbers of those who are sometimes found in the train of our divine Lord, yet how few are those to whom the Christ life is the supreme purpose and joy of living. Such are mainly found in little inner circles of the Church made up of those to whom holy living is more than all the world beside. The multitudes are taken up with, and devoted to, the absorbing and exciting and appealing things of modern life with which the world is now ablaze. It takes a high order of sainthood to turn away from these things or to make them secondary to the life concealed with Christ in God, to belong to the little flock and to walk in white before the world. May the hour not be at hand when the true children of the Kingdom must be content to be a small body separate from the world? Has not the great outer court of the Church again become thronged with those who are intent alone on the joys and gains and triumphs of worldly life?—Northern Christian Advocate.

Good Fellowship

Ho, brother, it's the handclasp and the good word and the smile
That does the most and helps the most to make the world worth while!
It's all of us together, or it's only you and I—
A ringing song of friendship and the heart beats high;
A ringing song of friendship, and a word or two of cheer,
Then all the world is gladder, and the bending sky is clear!

It's you and I together—and we're brothers one and all
Whenever through good fellowship we hear the subtle call.
Whenever in the ruck of things we feel the helping hand
Or see the deeper glow that none but we may understand—
Then all the world is good to us and all is worth the while;
Ho, brother, it's the handclasp and the good word and the smile!

—Wilbur D. Nesbit.

The Jews in Russia.

From time to time we have referred to the persecution of the Jews in Russia, and the subject is always a live one, for the persecution never wholly dies out. Just at present there is a lull, but there is no telling when it will break out afresh, accompanied by bloodshed and horror. The feeling against the Jews seems to be well-nigh universal and quite ineradicable. It is out of all proportion to the number of Jews in the empire. The first census ever taken in which the Jews were counted separately was in 1897. The total population at that time was fixed at 126,368,827, of whom only 5,189,401, or 4.13 per cent, were Jews. They are not allowed to reside in villages. The Jewish "pale," the prescribed territory in which they are permitted to reside, is mostly confined to the cities. Within the "pale," according to official statistics, Jews form about 11½ per cent of the population. There are, however, about a quarter of a million Jews residing outside the "pale," in various parts of the country. The idea of the "pale" is to keep them herded together as much as possible, and in some cities they form from 40 to 70 per cent of the population. The various anti-Semitic elements are now joining forces, and are opposing the abolition of the "pale" system. In their petitions to the Czar the Jews are charged with all the crimes in the calendar, including corruption of the press and of the police and with illicit cornering of trade.

Medical Inspection of Working Children.

A new law has just gone into effect in Massachusetts which might be copied by other states with good effect. It provides for the medical inspection of working children between the ages of fourteen and sixteen. Provision had already been made, by an act of 1906, for the appointment of physicians for each public school. By this new law however, children who are about to go to work are to undergo a special examination by the appointed physicians. The physician must certify in writing whether or not the child is sufficiently sound in health to start work. Superintendents or principals must have satisfactory medical reports in hand before giving their approval. Another act which will help conserve child life in Massachusetts, was passed by the legislature of 1910 and is already in effect. It gives the State Board of Health power to determine whether or not any particular trade or process of manufacture is sufficiently injurious to the health of minors under eighteen to justify their exclusion from it. After the State Board of Health has notified a manufacturer that his industry is injurious to children under eighteen he is subject to a $200 fine if he continues to employ them.

Rapid Railway Transit in Europe.

Americans do not have anything particular to boast about in the speed of railway trains. Of course we are proud of our "limited" trains which make the long trip between New York and Chicago in record time, but the speed of these trains does not come up to that of the regular schedule of several European roads. In England for instance, the Northeastern railroad runs a daily train each way betwen York and Darlington, a 44½ mile run, at a rate of 61.7 miles an hour. This is said to be the fastest non-stop regular run in England. The next best speed is Nottingham and Leicester, a distance of 22½ miles, which is 61.3 miles an hour. Next to that is Caledonian Railroad's expresses, which cover the distance from Forfar to Perth, 32½ miles, at a 60.9 rate. The Great Western Railroad has some remarkably fast trains. Those between London and Bristol, 118 miles, go at a 59 miles an hour rate. Americans landing at Plymouth [illegible] 225 miles, usually at a 54.8 mile rate. Part of the way the country is hilly, and the speed is reduced in consequence; but over the level stretches a 75 mile an hour is often attained. France also has something to show in the way of fast trains. The Northern Railway covers the distance from Paris to Arras daily, 120 miles, in 117 minutes. The expresses between Paris and Busigny do the 112½ miles in 112 minutes. The morning train from Paris to the Belgian frontier is timed thus: Paris-St. Quentin, 95¼ miles in 93 minutes; St. Quentin-Erquelines, 53½ miles, in 51 miuutes, or at the rate of 62.9 miles an hour. The French railroad men think this is going some, and it is.

Americans Traveling in Steerage.

On an average 1,000 American citizens have arrived weekly in New York from European ports in the steerage of the various trans-Atlantic liners this summer. The official figures for August show that 4,019 Americans arrived at New York as steerage passengers during the past month. Vessels from British ports brought most of them. The explanation advanced at Ellis Island for the large number of Americans who are coming home in the cheapest way is that the passengers are "dead broke." They went over first or second class, but used up their funds in their travels.

Horse Meat in Paris.

Some people seem to regard it as a newspaper joke, about the people of Paris eating horse meat. It is no joke at all. The French official statistics for 1909 show that during that year there were slaughtered for food in Paris, 48,795 horses, 3,305 donkeys, and 861 mules. Now to see how the quantity of horse, donkey and mule meat consumed compares with the consumption of other meats, the above figures should be considered in connection with the following, of other animals slaughtered for food: Cattle, 179,161; calves, 111,391; sheep, 1,118,832; hogs, 215,138. Of course it will be seen from these figures that horse meat does not form a very large percentage of the total amount of meat consumed, but the fact that it is so used at all is the remarkable thing. If the cost of living continues to increase, and meat goes higher and higher in price, the use of horse meat is bound to increase in cities like Paris. How long will it be before the poorer classes in our American cities will be forced into the habit of eating horse meat?

The Protection of Children.

Behold how great a flame a little spark kindleth. Thirty-four years ago a case of cruelty to a little girl gave rise to the formation of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Since that time this society has received more than a quarter of a million complaints, involving the custody of nearly three-quarters of a million children. Of these cases, 122,623 were prosecuted, resulting in 105,903 convictions, and about 161,000 children have been received and cared for. This society was located in New York City. Today there are 350 similar societies on the North American continent, and others are scattered all over Europe, South America, Asia, and even Africa. The original society at first occupied a single modest room in New York City. It now occupies an eight-story building, entirely devoted to the work of child rescue. The man who abused that child thirty-four years ago had no idea what a magnificent work he was setting in motion.

Food Prices in 1823.

It may not be comforting, but at any rate it is interesting, to compare the present high prices of food products with those which prevailed three-quarters of a century ago. A copy of the journal, or diary, of Moses Guest, a citizen of Cincinnati, for the year 1823 has been resurrected, and this entry is reproduced in "Americana," showing market prices in that city: "Markets in this city are abundantly supplied with the best kinds of meats and vegetables. Beef, mutton, and veal sell for from 2 to 4 cents a pound, pork from 1½ to 2½ cents; butter, 12½ to 18¾ cents; cheese, 6 to 8 cents, and eggs 4 to 10 cents per dozen. Wheat flour costs from $1.25 to $1.75 per hundredweight, buckwheat costs the same, cornmeal, 18¾ to 25 cents per bushel; wheat, 45 to 50 cents; corn, 18¾ to 25 cents, and oats from 12½ to 18¾ cents. Chickens sell for 10 to 25 cents per pair, turkeys for 3 to 4 cents per pound; potatoes, 25 to 37 cents, and turnips, 18¾ to 25 cents per bushel."

Religious Work in Canal Zone.

The spiritual interests of the workmen and others engaged in constructing the Panama canal are not neglected. The first building erected was that of the Roman Catholic chapel on the hospital grounds near Panama, begun in November, 1906, and in July, 1908, the Episcopalians also built a chapel on the grounds. There are now 39 churches on the list, of which 26 are owned by the Isthmian Canal Commission and served by fifteen chaplains in their employment. The list shows that there are 7 Catholic, 13 Episcopal, 7 Baptist, 8 non-denominational (Lodge Hall Seventh Day Adventists. These figures are churches), 2 Wesleyan, 1 Methodist and 1 furnished by the "Canal Record," and may be regarded as correct.

War Expenses in Time of Peace.

The report of the Treasurer of the United States shows that the total expenditures were $662,324,442, and the total receipts $603,589,489, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909. Thus there was a deficit at the close of that fiscal year of $58,734,953. The total army and navy expenses for that year were $279,659,737, and there was paid out for pensions, $161,710,367. Thus the total war expenditures for the year were $441,370,104. In other words, two-thirds of the money expended by the United States government went for war purposes. Yet we have had no war of any great consequence for nearly half a century.

How People Travel.

A German countess has made the following observations on how the people of three nations, England, France and Germany, travel:

"The Englishman follows his inclination, the German his guide, the Frenchman his wife.

"The Englishman drives, the German is driven, the Frenchman promenades.

"The Englishman makes excursions and purchases, the German observations and economies, the Frenchman conquests.

"The Englishman goes out to see, the German to inspect, the Frenchman to be seen."

It would be interesting to learn what she thinks of Americans as travelers, only it might not be very complimentary.

The Object of Christian Faith

Through Illusion to Reality

Lure of the Fantasy and the Dream

BY REV. FRANK W. GUNSAULUS, D. D.

"The mirage shall become a pool."—Isaiah XXXV. 7.

The text had its strange illustration one day as I passed over the desert in Arizona. There is nothing so brilliant and enchanting in all that country of silver and gold and turquoise and emerald as this unearthly and yet most earthy thing—a mirage. As you go on and on you seem to have lost all mental connection with the world of fact. Suddenly rising before you and almost controlling the operations of the mind—especially if one is weary, thirsty, expectant, looking forward to the goal towards which one has started in the early morning—there is a most glowing and superb spectacle. Away yonder are tracks and mountains innumerable. Between them run great streets as of opal and pearl and jasper, as of emerald blazing now with the whiteness of the diamond. It is true that these streets have upon their sides huge temples with domes and spires upside down. But the mind suddenly shifts its position, and the eye catches the secret of the mind, and by-and-by the whole fantasy glows with a strange realism, and you feel that your horse as you advance is likely to be stepping at the next moment in a ruby street, or will be pushing on in the great streams—streams that are opalescent, that reflect almost every color and tint.

Always Water.

For it is always water, and it is usually associated with a day of thirst. The horse neighs for the water in the distance, stopping and looking and catching himself something of the strange fantastic glory. A new thirst is developed in your steed, and it is wonderful how it operates upon the human personality. We are sure that there is water just beyond. If one only had a bucket to go out there and to take a great bucketful of that gem-like water on the hot afternoon—an afternoon that is waning towards evening, evening making all these colours still more distinct and beautiful against the approaching background of the night! It is a mirage, a rich experience, which the Indian had for centuries no language adequately to describe. It is an experience that you can never forget.

Perpetual and Imperious Laws.

And religion is either the most brilliant of phantasms or it is the most satisfying of realities. The laws which have to do with the light by which a man unerringly follows the path of duty are the same inevitable, consistent, perpetual, imperious laws, that belong to the making of this fantasy, this dream, this illusion, this thing that is not so and yet is so, for it is just as much a reality as if it were made of the pools that seem to compose your dream. Your superstition is very nearly a religion; your religion is very near to a superstition. It is not merely that this thing is upside down. It is not that which misleads you. It is that which keeps your mental feet sometimes from slipping and the mind from falling into the illusion entirely. Of course it is upside down; these towers and spires are all wrong; but they are so brilliant, so enchanting! It is the enchantment, the superb, weird loveliness of it all—it is this that in all the history of superstition, in all the history of all that which is not quite true, which confuses the mind. And it is that which oftimes brings us face to face with the most seriou mental problems of religion.

Christianity The Imperial Fact.

Christianity alone, that has to do with the most imperial fact the world has ever seen, will rescue you from the finest superstitions, the most beautiful delusions of all the history of the human mind. Nothing but a fact can meet the brilliant and marvelous discoveries which a thirsty mind under the rule of a superior imagination must always find in life's pathway across the desert. It is not bad to have illusions, but it is bad for an illusion to have you or me. It is fatal to have delusions. An illusion in the history of the human mind and the development of the race seems almost necessary. The child-mind of man—a man is still a child—wakes to reality by way of unreality.

Illusion In History.

America today is the result of an illusion. Columbus was looking for Japan and China, not by way of the East, but by way of the West. He was moving towards the Orient, but he bumped against the Occident—a tremendous reality in the midst of the illusion of getting towards the Orient. And at last Columbus has come to the Orient, for Japan is the Yankeedom of tomorrow, and China is the most westerly nation in the world! The history of the discovery of the great Mississippi river is the history of an illusion. A great imaginative man was searching for something utterly different from the deep, wide, muddy stream; he was looking not for water, but for land. But the reality would never have come to one whose feet had not been moving to the music of an illusion. Your alchemist laid the foundations of chemistry. The mirage has become a pool.

Our Debt to the Dreamers.

So also in the spiritual life, we find that man moves from dream to dream, from mirage to mirage. But the glory of God's universe lies in this, that the mirage shall become a pool. Think what every great nation owes to its dreamers. Have you ever followed John Milton to Italy, and heard him and Galileo taking together of liberty? There were the dreamers. And England today is impossible without the poetry of the Latin secretary of Oliver Cromwell, and the day of modern science impossible in its fulness without Galileo.

The mighty transformer of dreams and illusions into the reality of truth is Jesus. Dream on, dream on, in your desert path! Be not discouraged or hopeless because you move from mirage to mirage. Let all the poetry and art of life be yours. But be sure that the crowning fact is that the mirage shall become a pool by the fact of Jesus Christ.

Christ the Beautiful.

Think of the three mighty nations—of Greece, and Rome, and Hebrewdom. The mirage of Greece was beauty and wisdom. Greece had wisdom and beauty, but her good was immoral. Let Phidias build as he did in the Parthenon a statue of gold and ivory. The very failure of it reveals the fact that it was a mirage.

The Greek dream is a permanent thing in the mind of man. Beauty and wisdom, they must be joined; they must be made real indeed. We look to Jesus. Here is one wiser than any Greek. Here is one more beautiful than any object created by Greek chisel or formed out of the imaginative glory of the Greek religion. Here is the beauty of wisdom, the wisdom of beauty. God in humanity, all-beautiful, all-wise! The mirage has become a pool.

Christ the King.

And Rome had her dream, her mirage—the dream of universal empire. But Rome dissolved and the dream faded, and where Nero stood in wrath and violence the accents of a Christian preacher came, and where Rome sent a spear into His heart Jesus created for humanity a great trysting-place, a place where the heart of man should gather all sympathies and all aspirations and all loves, and there should be a universal empire of goodness and truth and justice.

Christ the Redeemer.

And Hebrewdom had her glorious mirage, and the utter failure of Israel to accomplish the dream of righteousness was no more pathetic than the failure of Rome to achieve universal empire, or of Greece to wed wisdom to beauty. The mirage faded, and lo! a pool, a fresh, inspiriting, cool, crystal water—the reality of righteousness. The rightening of the world. Right that died on the Cross to conquer evil: right that wrought on Calvary the ruin of wrong. The mirage has become a pool.

Dreamer, let him be the reality of your life. You shall keep all your fine faculties. All the training that you have had in following the illusions of life will come into a beautiful relationship of power to this Reality. "I am the water of life." "I am the light of the world."

The Kindly Moon

The red moon rises from the sea
And seems to pave a path for me,
As if inviting me to come
And join it in its distant home.

A sparkling ladder made of gold
It throws athwart the ripples cold,
And bids me climb to starry heights
There to partake of its delights.

And when perchance it comes to know
That while I would I may not go,
It smiles benignly on me still,
And lingers on my window-sill.

It peeps in at me through the pane
Until the night is on the wane,
And at the coming of the day,
Still smiling back, tiptoes away.

work. The psalms more than any other part of the Bible have been the inspiration of our Christian literature. They have had a large place in the heart-life of men. They spring from the spontaneous soul of the writers and are therefore of more practical value than writings more creedal in their nature. The author in this volume traces the influence of the Psalms in human life. Every writing gains added value to us when we know of its preciousness to others. The book divides the history of the church into several periods and sets forth the influence the Psalms have had upon persons in these respective periods. The volume cannot help but add to the value of the Psalms in the minds of every reader. Ministers will find it rich in illustration. It is well indexed. (J. M. Dent, E. P. Dutton.)

WHEN A MAN MARRIES, by Mary Roberts Rienehert. This novel is a best seller. The best sellers, however, we have long since learned, are not always the best. This, however, is the story of a pleasing little mix-up among eight or ten people who while at a party were quarantined on account of a smallpox scare. During the days they were together human nature asserted itself in the form of an assertive old aunt, an over-devoted divorced husband regaining his wife, a true lover winning his love and in other personages who give an interesting setting. The style is a very readable one and is appropriate to the story. There are the cigarette, the bridge, the swearing, and the champagne usual to the society novel of today. (Bobbs-Merrill.)

RESPECTABLE SINS, by John Watson, D. D. This is a posthumous volume by the author popularly known as Ian McLaren. His son, in the preface, writes: "It is curious that one who was above all a student of human nature, and always in close touch with men and affairs, never amid the literary productions of some fourteen years, published a volume exclusively for young men." This volume comprising sermons to young men aims to supply the gap. Such practical themes as the following are considered: Evil Temper, A False Tongue, Jealousy, Egotism, Why a Young Man is not a Christian, Why a Young Man Should be a Christian, etc. Under the topic Why a Young Man is not a Christian, he considers these objections: Because he does not understand Christianity, the many divisions in the church, the difficulty of the Christian life, and offended by Christians. The style is simple and lucid. There are throughout the book, flashes of spiritual intuition. (New York: Hodder & Stoughton.)

BY-GONE DAYS IN CHICAGO, by Frederick Francis Cook. The author, who is an old-time Chicago newspaper reporter, declares as his aim in this book to rebuild for the mind's eye a vanished city; restore to the streets their varied life; rehabilitate past types in their proper setting; recall with due regard for values some of the moving events of a memorable epoch; and so provide a faithful transcript for whomsoever may be interested in the "Garden City" of a classic past as a somewhat unique social integral, or feel moved to re-people it in fancy with the offspring of his imagination.

As one might expect, the style of the book is chatty. Chicago now compared with the Chicago of the sixties, described by the author, is on a much higher moral level. We suspect, however, that the reporter saw "the underworld" out of proportion. We are Nottingham and Leicester, a distance of 22½ miles, which it did in 30 miles an hour. Next to that is Caledonian Railroad's express, which covers the distance from Forfar to Perth, 32½ miles, at a 60.2 rate. The Great Western Railroad [illegible] remarkably fast [illegible] gains.

In the chapter on "The Pulpit as a War Force" he mentions the following ministers as especially forceful: Robert Collyer, Robert H. Clarkson, W. W. Patton, Robert W. Patterson, W. W. Everts, T. M. Eddy, O. H. Tiffany and W. H. Ryder. The First Congregational Church, of which W. W. Patton was pastor, sent of its membership, sixty-nine men to the front. The author gives some interesting sidelights on Evangelist D. L. Moody and on Robert G. Ingersoll. Both seemed to know the value of press publicity. The volume has perhaps seventy-five good illustrations. (A. C. McClurg & Company, Publishers. Chicago. $2.75, net.)

LIBERALISM AND THE SOCIAL PROBLEM, by Winston Spencer Churchill, M. P. This is a volume containing several addresses of the Honorable Mr. Churchill on the main political questions now confronting England. Coming from a man occupying the position of Mr. Churchill they may be regarded as possessing the authoritative sanction of the present government of England. As is well known the author is one of the most aggressive and active of the brilliant ministry of Premier Asquith. This volume of addresses considers almost every mooted economical question of the British Empire. In the contents the addresses are grouped under three main heads, viz., (1) The Record of the Government; (2) Social Organization; (3) The Budget. Every address deals with vital current topics. Mr. Churchill regards the big problem of England to be that of the "rear-guard." He says: "The cause of the Liberal party is the cause of the left-out millions." Throughout the book he contends that the remedy for present evils is to be brought about by the Liberal party. Labor and Liberalism have their interests bound up together. He thinks the Liberal party is getting much more for the common people of England than the Socialistic party is for those of Germany; nor does he think socialism will grow in England so as to insure any victories. "Liberalism at once supplies the higher impulse and the practicable path." Yet Mr. Churchill is a good deal of a Collectivist himself. He regrets that England does not own its railways, as he says "the whole tendency of civilization is towards the multiplication of the collective functions of society." In his chapter on the House of Lords the author echoes the heat of the tremendous struggle now taking place in England with regard to the power of the second chamber. This chamber on "The House of Lords" is a speech delivered in the House of Commons, June 29, 1907. The battle is more fierce now, even than then. Mr. Churchill has many pungent paragraphs in this address, as for instance, mark this one: "I will retort the question of the leader of the opposition by another question. Has the House of Lords ever been right? Has it ever been right in any of the great settled controversies which are now beyond the reach of party argument?" Then he proceeds to enumerate a number of issues, and asks concerning each of these, "Was the House of Lords Right?" Of course he concludes it was never right on any great question now settled. His treatment of the Budget is worth careful reading. Americans who want to understand the controversy in England could not do better than study this volume. (New York: Hodder & Stoughton.

SOCIAL INSURANCE. A PROGRAM OF SOCIAL REFORM, by Henry Rogers Seager, Ph. D., Columbia, University. Professor

York City. It now occupies an eight-story building, entirely devoted to the work of child rescue. The man who abused that child thirty-four years ago had no idea what a magnificent work he was setting in motion.

[illegible] student of social conditions. In this little volume he presents a social policy regarding competition for industrial accidents, illness and premature death, the causes and remedies for unemployment and provision for old age, that is sure to rapidly gain advocates in America. Professor Seager's style is fluent. The book is easily read. The author concludes with the following statement: "There are no hard and fast answers to the social problems that have been touched on in these chapters. Solutions that would be true and wise in one time and place would be quite unworkable in others. On the whole, however, these United States are progressing. Government is becoming more efficient, we are growing more social, our absorption in our individual interests is giving way to deep and intelligent appreciation of our common interests. Under these circumstances, policies that a short time ago would have been quite unsuited to our conditions come each year within the range of practical politics. I am sufficiently optimistic to think that this progress is going to continue, and that any social policy that is sound and wise for a people sufficiently developed to make use of it will one day be sound and wise for the United States. Let us not be frightened by phrases, by the bugaboo of 'destroying local self-government.' of 'projecting the United States into the banking business,' of 'undermining individual thrift,' or of 'socialism.' With open minds, let us rather examine each new proposal on its merits. This is the truly scientific attitude toward a field of phenomena where all is change and development. It is also the attitude which will contribute most to that betterment of social conditions which is the purpose of every program of social reform." (The Macmillan Co., New York, $1.00, net.)

WHAT IS ESSENTIAL, by George Arthur Andrews. There is no more hopeful or healthful sign today than the effort being made to discover and state the things that are fundamental in religious experience and practice. This book by Mr. Andrews is a worthy contribution to this movement. The purpose of the author is expressed in the following words from the preface of the volume: "An effort to ascertain the bed-rock bottom of our religion, . . . to make a few soundings, in the hope that some human craft, in danger of religious shipwreck, may be piloted to a place of firm anchorage." The author's work is true to this purpose. There is in it a fine sympathy with the practical man who is really troubled about the statements of faith, and a grasp of truth that enables them to appreciate the things that are really fundamental. The style is clear and concise, the manner direct and practical. The presentation grips one, for it is true to the experience of many a man who has come to doubt former statements of doctrine without having yet found his way to the things that are fundamental. Here are the chapter headings: "Who is the Essential Christian?"; What is the Essential Creed?"; "What is the Essential Christian Experience?"; "What is the Essential Christian Revelation?"; "What is the Essential Christian Church?"; "What is the Essential Christian Activity?" The work is most suggestive, and will be found helpful to preachers who are seeking to lead their people to an appreciation of the fundamental things of our holy religion, while for the man in practical life it will furnish an interpretation of his religious experience. Our Readers' Opinions

Little did I think when I wrote a brief article which appeared in The Christian Century of August 25, under the caption, "Heresy! Heresy! Heresy!," that any sane person would fail to understand me, or would seriously call in question my position, namely, that Jesus Christ is the object of Christian faith.

Some years ago I was passing through an asylum for the insane when I paused to listen to one of the inmates who was delivering an address to a company of his fellow patients. His auditors failing to understand him, he exclaimed, in a tone that revealed his intense disgust, "I cannot give you brains!"

In the paper referred to, I took issue with a thoroughly good man, a teacher of Christianity, who had presented doctrines as the object of Christian faith. In opposition to this position I maintained that Jesus, the Son of God, is the object of faith. I quoted Paul, who said, "I know Him whom I believe." I quoted Jesus who said, "Dost thou believe in the Son of God?" I quoted John 3:16, "Whosoever believeth in Him shall have eternal life." I quoted the language of Paul and Silas to the affrighted pagan prison keeper, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ."

These quotations certainly, and clearly, affirm that the belief required by the teaching contained in the New Testament, reaches out and lays hold on the Son of God. Jesus Christ is the object of true evangelical faith. This is the faith that saves. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," is a word of the Lord to an earnest inquirer.

Now comes a venerable correspondent who says, "I am unable to get your full idea."

The fruitage of this belief in the Son of God is Christly character, and this is the great desideratum in the teaching of the New Testament. To be like the Christ in thought, in affection, in speech, in conduct, is the one all important achievement. The enemies of Jesus and his religion in Jerusalem, witnessing the behavior of Peter and John, on an unusually interesting occasion, "took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus."

The remark was once made, in my presence, that there were "Disciples" who had but little use for the man Christ Jesus—that if one only held with steady, and sturdy, mental grip, the doctrine that faith, repentance and baptism, are for the remission of sins, he was surely safe. This formula, he said, constituted "the faith" for which there must be earnest contention.

At the time I regarded this statement as a gross misrepresentation of an excellent and much maligned people.

I am now compelled to admit that this is the conception of some as to the faith that saves. Here it is in black and white before my eyes. With this small company doctrinal correctness is the most important feature of the Christian religion. Jesus is not the paramount issue. The character and official dignity of the Son of Man is secondary. The Son of God becomes a side issue. The great thing is doctrinal correctness.

From the position of my correspondent I differ in toto.

A man may not understand and believe that faith, repentance and baptism are for the remission of sins, and yet be "sound in the faith." He may think that he obtained remission of sins previous to his baptism, and yet be worthy of a place in "the Christian Church," or if you prefer "the Church of Christ." "What think you of Christ?" is the true test of orthodoxy. Whoever thinks right about Jesus of Nazareth is orthodox. He may entertain c... color notions about many things, but as long as he is able to underwrite the statements of Jesus concerning himself, and the statements of his elect embassadors concerning his nature, official dignity and authority, he is, in the right sense of the word, orthodox. Such a man is my brother. Jesus is the object of Christian faith. "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?"

Whom, Not What

"Yea mine own familiar friend in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me." I have sympathy for David. My old time and life-long friend has said some unpretty things about me in the Christian Century. My name is E. L. Frazier. You need not turn to age 8 (670) of August 11, 1910, Christian Century, to see who is the "heretic' and "the narrowest kind of a narrow sectarian." "Serve in the ministry for pay." "Receive pay for preaching what the people want." Advocating "low down business." "May be a hireling," etc. I make no effort to defend myself against these charges. I have no countercharge to make. I have no poisoned arrows in my quiver. I have no arguments of that kind.

All this comes of the question, Whom? or What?

I had said of a preacher: He does not believe what we believe. And advanced the thought that he ought not to live on the money given to promulgate what we believe.

Mine accuser's position is this: It is not what we believe, but whom. Now I may be quite obtuse, but don't think I am. If there is any logic or any sense, or anything of any kind in this position, the conclusion is reached that if one accepts the whom, there is nothing whatever in the what. If one believes on Jesus Christ, it matters not what he believes beside.

This "prophet of Jehovah" is the minister in charge of a local congregation. There is in his audience a devout Mormon who has two or more wives. He offers himself for membership. The minister knows the Mormon. Will he receive him into the fellowship or membership of the local congregation? He is all right on the whom.

There is something in the what. One may believe too much. He may believe the whom, and believe too much of the what, for even this "prophet" who is far from being a "narrow sectarian." He would not take this man in on his "whom" even to associate membership. He believes too much.

I have a neighbor who is a mighty fine man. His character and behavior is just like that of the best Christian. He is a Unitarian. He accepts the "whom." He speaks in terms of highest praise of Jesus Christ. He loves Jesus Christ. Ask him if he believes the "whom," he will say he does. This Unitarian comes to the city where dwells this "prophet of Jehovah" and attends his church week after week. He is charmed with the broadmindedness of the eloquent and genial minister. He would like to be a member of a local congregation presided over by a man who says it is all in "whom" none in "what." He offers himself for membership. Will he be received? Not into full fellowship and membership, but being quite respectable and his church respectable, he would probably be taken as an association member. He believes too little. I am still persuaded that there is something yet much in the What. Further, I am persuaded that the highest proof one may give of the Whom is found in the What. He who truly believes on or in Jesus Christ also believes Jesus Christ and makes proof of it by carefully doing what Jesus tells him to do.

I am to be taken literally and seriously. When a preacher in any religious body finds that he does not believe what that body of people believe in fundamentals, that preacher ought to change base. Common honesty demands it. If this is "low down business" in my brother's mind, he has liberty to differ with me. In my mind it is business of a high Christian order Here I stand.

The Christian Standard reports the receipt of a subscription recently which was accompanied by the following note:

"With two of our former state evangelists, who were ardent admirers of Professor Willett, now practicing Christian Science, and a former dean of Berkeley Bible Seminary in the Episcopal Church, sprinkling infants, there is great need to circulate The Standard." To which The Standard replies "we heartily coincide with the diagnosis, but have no comment to offer."

With one of our preachers who was an ardent admirer of "Isaac Errett's son" and a reader of the Christian Standard in jail in Texas for making out a false draft for a large amount of money there is great need to circulate The Christian Century. "We heartily coincide with the diagnosis but have no comment to offer."

Additional Book Reviews

FULL ALLEGIANCE, by G. H. Knight. This is a volume of 140 pages pleading for "Full allegiance and the holy way." The words "holy," "saint," etc., have been so strained by devotional writers that we have come to expect an over-pious and unnatural treatment of them. The author of Full Allegiance, however, is sane in his treatment. He says: "For what is a saint? Simply one to whom the will of Christ is everything, and who is striving heartily to do that will, and that is what not some, but all believing men are pledged to do." (A. C. Armstrong & Son.)

A WORKINGMAN'S VIEW OF THE BIBLE, by O. F. Donaldson. We do not know what kind of a workingman Mr. Donaldson is, but he certainly could have made a theologian of mark. This volume is suggestive. More systematic knowledge would have relieved it from some fantastic interpretations, but it is suggestive, free, and human. (Sherman, French & Company, Boston. $1.20, net.)

THE WINNING OF IMMORTALITY, by Frederick Palmer. The position of this book is well set forth in its fifth chapter, which is entitled "Immortality as not Inherent but Possible." We do not share this view. We believe every man by birth is so allied to God as to be immortal. The Rev. Mr. Palmer, however, in this volume of 230 pages succinctly sets forth the theory that immortality is conditional on spirituality, unity with Christ. He supports his position with many scriptural quotations. We commend the book to those interested in this theory, held by many Bible students, but not convincing to us. (Thomas Y. CHAPTER XVII. (Continued).

"You cannot be seriously hurt, Archie, or they would not all have left you. As it is, if Mr. Sinclair's injuries were not terrible, they would not all be there. Oh, I will never forgive myself for encouraging him to go with you."

"Are you mad, dear Jeanie, to think that I would endanger my own life to harm him?" An apprentice from the shop put in a white scared face at the door. His eyes were red with weeping.

"Miss Jeanie, is the meenister deid?"

"Oh, no, Jack, I hope not."

"What for, are the doctors sae lang wi' him?"

"I can't tell, lad, we must wait," she spoke hopelessly. Jack drew nearer.

"Miss Jeanie, it's no sae bad as ye think, they werena baith killed on the spot."

"So it is, Jack. If it had been only clear ground. But that horrid iron," she shuddered.

"Ay, but there was somethin' else Miss Jeanie."

"Come here and tell us, Jack," called Archie feebly from the sofa.

"Mercy me, Maister Erchie, are you there? They a' say you're no a peen the waur—the wull saved ye."

"What do you mean, Jack?" inquired Jeanie.

"They a' say that baith o' them wad ha' been killed if it had na been for the wull."

"What wool, Jack? How could wool save them?"

"Did ye no ken Miss Jeanie that auld drab cameron brocht a load o' wull, no five minutes afore the motor came up. He laid it doon by the iron, tae he put on the laft. Ye can see it frae the winda gin ye like."

"It has been a merciful escape—thank you Jack for telling us." As the lad turned to leave the room Archie feebly asked him to bring him a glass of water. Jeanie looked at her cousin. Great drops of perspiration stood on his brow. His face was ashen. In a moment she was holding a glass of water to his lips. He quickly revived and thanked her gratefully. There was compassion in her sad eyes as she said gently:

"I fear you are more hurt than I at first thought, Archie."

"Perhaps it is only shock, Jeanie."

"Let us hope so. It has been almost a miraculous escape. For you, at any rate, Archie."

"It seems so. And yet I would change places with Mr. Sinclair if I could. No matter how bad his case may be. You have not lost faith in him." She looked cold as marble as she replied:

"No one will ever lose faith in Mr. Sinclair. He is one of God's good men." Archie grew impatient.

"And yet his God did not save him in the time of danger. I, who am but a mere worldling, came off better than he."

"That depends. I hold that so long as a man's soul remains stainless, he cannot sustain permanent loss."

"You speak like a philosopher, Jeanie. Who taught you?"

"All that is worth knowing in life. Mr. Sinclair taught me, cousin Archie. And now, he lies in the next room dying perhaps, through you."

"I may be as badly hurt as he is, for all you know, and yet you reproach me cruelly, for what I cannot help." She saw that he was growing excited and she calmed herself at once. But she could not keep quiet. From window to window, and from window to door she flitted, listening and waiting for words that would remove the terrible anxiety she endured. At last one of the doctors hurriedly came into the room. With trembling lips, Jeanie asked:

"Tell us, doctor, is the minister's life in danger?"

"Not at all, my dear young lady. He has the strength of three men. But we have another case here which I must attend to. Please stay near the door Miss Graeme. I may need you."

She saw that he did not mean to give her further information at that time. She went out to the lobby, only slightly relieved from the weight of dread which seemed to be crushing her. In a short time the doctor came to the door and said cheerfully, but in low tones:

"Miss Graeme, I am glad to be able to inform you that Mr. Monteith's injuries are very slight. Shock to the system there is, of course, but it will not prove serious. He will be quite fit to return to Glasgow by tomorrow. I will send in a draught bye and bye, to quiet his nerves, a good night's rest is all he requires."

"I am very glad doctor that it's no worse with my cousin," she paused, afraid to ask for the whole truth. "I fear you have a much worse case in Mr. Sinclair."

"Much more serious," he replied, gravely. But it might have been worse, you know. It might have been his right arm."

"Is it the left, then? I did not know which it was. Is it very badly broken, doctor?" He looked at her out of kind eyes.

"Yes, very."

"I did not think it took so long to set an arm. It seems an age since you all came in." Again the doctor looked compassionate. He saw her lips tremble. He noted the white, anxious face. He knew that Mr. Sinclair was one of their most cherished friends, even if he guessed no more, it was enough. He could not bring himself to tell her the worst, so he answered evasively, as good men sometimes do:

"Some cases are much more serious than others. We had to put him under choloroform. Your father has been most thoughtful, Miss Graeme. He says the minister must not be moved from here at present. Have you a room, a spare one on this landing? It may be some hours you know before the effects of the chloroform pass off."

"Yes, doctor, our best bedroom is here. Mother always keeps it well aired. Shall I light the fire?"

"Yes, but mind that the room does not get overheated." Before she had time to ask further, he had turned away. She watched him wistfully as he crossed the lobby and once more entered the dining room. She moved almost mechanically towards the guest chamber, turned on the gas, and lit the fire. She looked round hoping to find something she might do. But everything was in order. The suspense was sickening. Were there other injuries besides the broken arm? Would he die? She trembled at the thought. Oh, if she could stop thinking. But she could not. She would go back to Archie. Distasteful as his presence had become to her, it was easier to listen to his conversation than endure her own thoughts. She went out into the lobby again and was about to go into the drawing room, when the dining room door opened and Donald came out slowly, backwards. They were bearing the sufferer to bed. She saw the death-like face and form stretched on the leaf of the dining table. They would pass where she stood. Oh, surely he was dead. She swayed rather than walked into the drawing room, and fell fainting on the floor. In a moment Archie Monteith was kneeling by her side, his own weakness quite forgotten in anxiety for her. He rang the bell wildly, and Sarah came in frightened, and so nervous, that she scarcely heard him, when he called for water. Sarah ran into the best bedroom for water. But they were all there, with the poor minister. Then she fled to the bathroom, but found no glass there, so had to go down stairs for water after all. It seemed to wretched Archie that she never meant to come back. As his fingers touched the white throat while he loosened her collar, he bitterly told himself that he had brought all this suffering upon her. But he loved her, he loved her, and would give his very soul to win her. Had he not proved even to himself that day, that he had been ready to die rather than lose her? Then Sarah came, and they bathed her temples and her wrists. Soon she revived, and gazed around wondering what was the matter. Sarah slipped one arm under her head and Archie knelt beside her, one of her limp hands fondly clasped in his own.

"You are better, Jeanie," he said, softly, his soul in his eyes.

"Yes, I am better. How weak of me to go off like that, when I am needed perhaps."

"They dinna need ye, Miss Jeanie. Lie still, pet, till the blood comes back tae yer white, bit face."

"The shock has been too much for you, darling," whispered Archie, heedless of Sarah's presence. The words seemed to sting her. Drawing her hand away from his, she rested it on Sarah's shoulder and was on her feet before he could assist her.

"Come to the sofa, Jeanie, and lie down, you must rest."

"No Archie, I will not lie down nor rest till I know the truth in the next room." As she spoke, Donald, haggard and pale, came in. She forgot herself, forgot everything but the dread which possessed her. She was ashen to the very lips, as she looked into her brother's troubled face.

"Donald tell me the truth, all. Is he dead?"

"He might as well be," he groaned as he flung himself in an armchair, sobbing as if his heart would break. It was Jeanie's turn to be calm.

"Is there no hope, Donald? Will he die?"

"No, no, not that, I tell you. But if I were in his place I would rather die.

"Donald tell me. Suspense is killing me."

"Yes, I know Jeanie, dear. So I may as well tell you at once. The doctors said it was the only thing they could do. The arm had to be taken off." The last part of the sentence was a hoarse whisper. She grasped his hand to steady herself.

"Our minister, with only one arm! Oh, Donald."

"I wish it had been mine instead of his, Jeanie," whispered Donald. Archie Monteith's eyes gleamed with a strange light. Had it been under other circumstances, they might have thought his expression was one of exaltation as he replied to Donald's words:

"I think we all have reason to be thankful that it has been no worse. It is almost a miracle, that we were not both killed."

Donald seemed not to have been aware of Archie's presence, till he spoke.

"I tell you I would rather be killed outright than go maimed all my life. And it was your fault, Archie, only gross carelessness could have done it, or worse," he said, bitterly.

Archie professed himself deeply aggrieved.

"Was it I, who placed those iron things where they were?" he said, hotly.

"They were there, when you went out, Archie. You have no excuse."

"I made a terrible blunder, I know it. But other men, true and good ones too, have made mistakes as well as I. If I had been killed on the spot, I suppose none of you would have cared."

"Oh, yes, we would all have cared, Archie." Donald answered gravely.

"No, Jeanie there, is more grieved over the minister's lost arm, than she would have been for me soul and body." She was sorry for him, much as she doubted him.

"You know perfectly well we all would have been grieved for you, Cousin Archie. But that is no reason why we should not grieve for Mr. Sinclair. Oh, the pity of it, the pity of it. It is a day of mourning for the whole congregation."

"If he were a poor working man with a wife and little children to support, Cousin Jeanie, I should say this is a terrible calamity. But think of it. Mr. Sinclair who does not even need to write out his sermons, so gifted is he. Besides, he has neither wife nor child to suffer with him. Of course we are all very sorry for him. Yet we ought to be thankful that it is not worse." Jeanie gazed at him with great sad eyes. Then without another word, she turned slowly and quitted the room.

Donald felt that Archie looked upon the accident with calmer eyes than could be expected from his share in it. He thought however, that his cousin might be too dazed to realize the extent of the calamity, so he merely said:

"Come away to my room and lie down, Archie. You are not yourself." Archie lost self-control. Jeanie's silent contempt had been too much for him.

"Is it any wonder I am not myself?" he hissed between his teeth. "The woman I would die for, is cold to me as an icicle. But at least, she will surely not be mad enough to throw herself away on the one-armed minister."

CHAPTER XVIII.

Off to Oban.

They were all of one opinion about it. James Douglas was not to hear of the accident to Mr. Sinclair, till such time as strength enough returned, to enable him to bear the shock the sad news would be. His progress towards recovery was rapid as was to be expected from a young man who had lived so simply as he had done. One by one the whole household had been to see him, even in the weak days, when talking was prohibited. By the time he began to be mad hungry, Jeanie and Donald paid brief, flying visits. They could not bear to see the disappointed look in his eyes, when they refused to bring him eatables, contrary to doctor's orders. Once, Jeanie had met Sarah guiltily stealing upstairs, something in her hand neatly folded up in a serviette. It proved to be two potatoes and a piece of roast beef. The nurse had to be told, and poor Sarah was ordered not to enter the invalid's room, for an indefinite period. But while James made rapid strides towards renewed strength and health, Mr. Sinclair, in the room below, languished in pain and seemed scarcely to care whether or not he recovered from the effects of the terrible accident from which he had so narrowly escaped with life. Jeanie had tried to comfort him more than once, but somehow, when she saw the hopeless look on his face, she was seized with unconquerable shyness and she felt that her words were strained and unnatural. So the days passed on, till at last one day they told the minister that James Douglas was at last allowed to sit up for an hour in his own room. It was Jeanie herself who came to Mr. Sinclair with the good news.

"You will be glad to hear, Mr. Sinclair, that James is allowed to be out of bed tomorrow." He smiled as he noticed how glad she was. But the saddened look still haunted his great dark eyes. She did not know that he was thinking bitterly that he would never be really well again—henceforth a poor, maimed creature, for all time.

"I am very glad Jeanie. James is a good lad—a man who will never shirk duty. Has anyone told him about—about this?" He touched the bandaged stump of arm with wistfulness in his eyes, pitiful to see. Hers tearful as she replied:

"Oh no, Mr. Sinclair, we could not tell him, yet."

"I know, it was wiser not. And better keep him in the dark yet awhile."

"It has not been easy to keep the truth from him. Every day he talks of you, and is always wanting to know when you will be allowed to get out of doors. I think myself that he is beginning to suspect that we have not told him all—he said to me only today—'My greatest wish to get strong now is that I may be able to go to see the minister—it's no small thing that keeps him from being here to see me.'"

"Good James—he little knows his minister's loss. No one knows it Jeanie, but myself and my God." He seemed to shrink away from her as he spoke, the longing was in her heart to stoop and kiss his white brow. But how could she, when he did not seem to realize that she was longing to comfort him. Presently, Donald came in looking like his old self once more, and beaming with joy at James' speedy recovery. Jeanie stole away to have a good cry in her own room. Mr. Sinclair brightened as Donald talked of James. The idea was growing on the minister that Donald was surely innocent of the crime that he was suspected of. Would it be possible for such eyes to be hiding a lie? And if Donald were really guiltless, with whom did the guilt rest?

"It will be grand to see James quite well again, Donald. Your poor old minister will need strong young arms to help him, now that he's robbed of one of his own. You'll not fail me either lad—you'll be an arm for me sometimes?"

"Oh Mr. Sinclair, Mr. Sinclair, if you will but trust me. God helping me I'll be such a man as I never was before—Oh, if I could but prove my innocence."

"I do trust you Donald. I believe you will be true to your promise, whatever the past may have been, in the future you have work to do—it will be true and brave."

"Forgive me, Mr. Sinclair for speaking of my trouble. You will be feverish again, and then the doctor and the nurse between them will eat me. Please don't think any more about it."

"I am trying hard not to think of any horrible thing, Donald, but you can guess that I fail in the attempt all too often. Do what I will, I cannot help thinking of the man who did this." He glanced at the empty place where his good left arm once was.

"And no wonder. I can't for the life of me know how it could happen. Poor Archie, too, —it is a great pity of him, he is so grieved about it."

"Grieved? Is he? Does he really say he is?"

"Yes. When he went home he made us promise to send him a card daily to let him know how you get on." There was a flash as of anger in the minister's eyes.

"And you believe"—he paused and then added calmly—"was he not hurt? Did he escape scot free?"

"He has suffered a good bit from shock. He persisted in going home next morning. All the same he did not appear a bit like himself, when I saw him off. He has been in the doctor's hands since he went home. He says today though, that he hopes soon to be able to come to see us."

"Just so Donald. Well, that's enough about him for the present. There is another thing troubling me now. James Douglas will shortly be allowed downstairs. If I remain here he will soon find me. I don't want him to see this wreck yet awhile. So bring a carriage tomorrow morning, Donald, and take me home to the manse."

"Oh no, Mr. Sinclair, you can't go from us till you can move about again. We would all be more sorry to see you go than you can guess. Think of the loneliness at the manse. You must not think of going home for ever so long."

"I may as well make up my mind to the manse and loneliness for the remainder of life. I must go back to my fate at once." He tried to smile, but it was a forlorn attempt. "Never fear, Mr. Sinclair, we'll not let you be lonely at the manse. There will be an invasion every evening till you are tired of us all. If you could only hear young Gordon talk of what he's going to do for you —and hosts of others. Indeed you'll find you never knew how much we all thought of you, till now."

"I know Donald, I know I have the kindest hearted people in the whole of Scotland. All the same, I know well that a man's congregation can never make a home for him. I am tasting what a home is here. It is like getting better of a fever. The little taste of good things I am getting only seems to make me hungrier."

"I don't see why you shouldn't look forward to having a happy home, some day, Mr. Sinclair. You, who deserve one so much more than most men. Why should you not?"

"My hopes are cut off as surely as this arm is. I know it perfectly. It only remains for me to try to be resigned. But it is hard Donald, it is hard, just when life seemed brightest."

"Life will be bright and glad again for you, Mr. Sinclair. I wish I could change places with you. I would lose an arm and a leg too, rather than lose my good name."

"That's spoken like a true man, Donald. I'll take courage lad, from what you've said. And if the lost arm loses me some thing else, dear to me as life—well, I must bear it. And my work is still left to me."

"That is good. And now have we not talked enough for today?"

"I am not in the very least feverish you see. So don't go yet. The doctor will be here in a few minutes. Just to satisfy you all, I'll ask him if I may go home tomorrow. His consent will surely be enough. Then you will go to Mrs. Johnson in the evening and tell her to have my room ready—I really wish to go, Donald."

"You think you are giving trouble here, Mr. Sinclair."

"I am not thinking of that at all. I know the sincerity of your friendship too well. I am thinking most of James Douglas. A shock now might retard his progress to recovery very seriously."

"I fear he will have to know the truth soon. He told me yesterday that the moment he is allowed to go outside of the house, he will drive straight to you."

"I just thought so. But you must keep him away as long as possible. Fortunately the powers that be, will not allow him out soon this cold weather."

"Who's talking of the powers that be" exclaimed Dr. Forbes. He came into the room rubbing his hands and looking his cheeriest.

"Talk of angels, we hear their wings." How much longer am I to lie here doctor?"

"You want up? Eh? That's a good sign. But you must keep still for a few days more."

"Could I not venture to return to the manse tomorrow? I hear that James Douglas will soon be downstairs. We don't want him to know anything of this yet awhile. If I were away in the manse it would be easy enough to keep him in the dark."

The Song Sparrow's Toilet

A splash into a silver brook,
  A dainty little dipping;
A dart into a quiet nook,
  With all his feathers dripping;
A little shake, a little tweak,
  To stir up every feather;
A pretty preening with his beak
  To lay them all together;
A stretch of wings, some fluffy shakes,
  A flash—he's flown away!
That is how the sparrow makes
  His toilet for the day. —Selected.

Grandpa's Dog Stories

BY NELLIE LEONARD.

It was a hot, sultry July day. Grandpa and Harold were working in the hay field. Helen had kept busy carrying the ginger water that grandma sent to them.

After dinner grandma and Helen took some chairs out of doors where the grape-arbor made a deep, cool shadow. The white phlox, tiger lilies, poppies, nasturtiums and petunias were abloom in the gardens.

Helen drew a long, contented breath.

"O, grandma!" she exclaimed, "isn't it just like fairyland? See that hummingbird on the phlox and the butterflies, bumblebees and even grandpa's pet toad. This red poppy will make a lovely silk bonnet for my doll and I'll find the biggest 'sturtium leaf in the garden for her umbrella."

Grandma rocked smilingly to and fro as she sewed patches on grandpa's overalls and watched Helen playing happily among the blossoms.

By-and-by, grandpa and Harold returned warm and tired.

"Now I can rest a few minutes and then it will be time to go after Brindle and feed the hens," said grandpa as he sat upon the grass and leaned comfortably against a tree.

"That's just time enough to tell that story you promised if I'd bring you a good drink," planned Helen. She put her dolls in the hollow under the grape-vine and settled cosily upon the grass beside grandma's chair.

"Now I'm all ready to listen, grandpa," she announced.

"Well, well, I never did see such a girl for stories!" cried grandpa, shaking his head. "I don't believe there's a single story left in this old gray head that you haven't heard time and again."

"Tell her about some of your dogs, David," suggested grandma. "You've had a plenty; enough to reach from here over to Cameron's farm if you could stand 'em in Indian file."

"That'll suit me," agreed Harold.

"Soon after we were married," began grandpa, "I bought a pet for Lucy. It was a little Japanese dog—a cute fellow he was, with about as much hair as a baby mouse. The house wasn't finished upstairs, so he used to sleep in the open chamber. Every night when Lucy told him it was bedtime he would run upstairs and cuddle down to sleep in his basket. Most always the old cat slept with him and they were great friends. He seemed more like a baby than a dog. Your grandma cried when he was sick and had to be killed.

"I had a hound named Dan. He was a great rabbit hunter. One day I took him to Halifax on a gunning trip and he scared up a fox. At night I couldn't call that dog from the chase and finally I had to leave him and come home. The next day I went back and found him so tired that he couldn't stand; he had to ride home in the wagon. If the fire-bell rang in the night, he would sit under my window and howl till I awoke. When your mother played on the organ he sat up and sang until we drove him from the room. He finally died of old age.

"There was a little silver-gray terrier named Jack. How he used to catch rats and kill 'em with one good snap! He was a great pet and would follow your mother everywhere. Poor Jack got run over when the electric cars first came through here.

"Then I had Fritz, part blood-hound and part English shepherd. He was a good fellow to chase the hens into their yard. If he couldn't manage otherwise, he would hold 'em carefully in his mouth until I came. He never barked like other dogs. We used to say he talked. He would answer back very earnestly and with a good deal of expression when we spoke to him. If he got excited, he would use a good many sentences of his dog language before he stopped; then throwing his head saucily back, he listened for our reply. He could play ball, shake hands, sit up and beg, and do all sorts of tricks. He was afraid of lightning and trembled every time it thundered. Lucy had to hold his paw and comfort him. Fourth of July was a miserable day for Fritz; he didn't like patriotic noises one bit. I think he was the most intelligent dog I ever owned.

"I had a Newfoundland puppy; your grandma named him Nixie. He looked like a little baby bear, but the poor cub had fits and never grew up."

"Oh, that was too bad!" cried Helen.

"Not as bad as when a cunning shepherd puppy, little Laddie, went mad and had to be shot right in the kitchen," replied grandma. "Laddie was a splendid dog. I remember how he used to beg for candy and ice cream. One day he was very naughty and ran away. He came home at night with his ear bitten. In a short time he went mad."

"Any more dogs, grandpa?" asked Harold.

"Oh, yes," laughed grandpa. "There was Leo, a great yellow Saint Bernard as big as a calf. He ate almost as much as an elephant. Lucy baked meal cakes every day and then he would steal the hens' food. One morning I put it inside a chicken coop and first thing I knew, Leo had rooted his big head underneath, lifted the coop, let out the chickens and old hen and ate all the warm mash he wanted. The neighbors complained that he spoiled their gardens, tramping through them. One foot would smash a whole squash vine. I had to sell him."

"Any more?" persisted Helen.

"Land sakes, yes! There was Nero, and Don, Skip, Fido, Sport, Prince, Rover—I don't know how many more. It would take all night to tell all the dog stories I know, so I might as well stop now. Guess I've paid for my ginger drink, haven't I, Helen?" and grandpa sauntered toward the barn.

A Thousand and One

BY H. SAMUEL FRITSCH.

A thousand blossoms scent the air
  By field and lane and river:
But only one is picked with care
  And pressed to last forever.

A thousand song-birds sing their part
  In tree and shrub and arbor:
But only one song finds a heart
  That will its music harbor.

A thousand kindly deeds are wrought
  In home and street and market:
But only one calls serious thought
  From him who stops to mark it.

But flowers and birds do not despair,
  But bloom and sing untiring:
So let my thousand deeds cease ne'er,
  If only one's inspiring.

A Poor Boy from the Country

"I'm just a poor boy from the country." The few people who of themselves had value enough to know O. Henry well, perhaps loved him best when, with this whimsical deprecation, he would excuse his own penetrating humor or generosities that were super-Quixotic. It was his personal password, his humorous apologia, and his saying it always seemed to break one of the alabaster boxes of life's perfume and diffuse a warm essence of good feeling, enough to make the hearer inwardly beam with some new contentment. He did not use it as an affectation or "stunt," such as literary men of a cheaper grain go in for; he had none of those traits. Never was there purer individuality than that of Sydney Porter, whom America claimed as the greatest living short story writer with the exception of Rudyard Kipling. O. Henry knew his world, read its closest secrets so simply that his supreme knowledge of human nature of itself formed that aspect of reserve which appeared even mysterious to looser minds. He allowed himself little affections where his feeling for some things was concerned. Music he claimed to detest. "What do you think of it?" some one asked him of a lovely minor-keyed song. "Sounds like a wagon going down hill," was his cheerful reply. "Music," he continued, in answer to a protest, "doesn't mean anything. It's the lowest of arts. It plays upon the emotions; it doesn't get at the brain. I would give all the operas ever harped for the dull, concrete roar of one block of New York. That's music." But later he said to a friend, a trifle wistfully, "You know I talk a lot about hating it; but I don't." "New York," he said, when he returned from the rest and exercise he couldn't allow himself, "doesn't seem to agree with me as it used to. I'm all run down physically and have been ordered out of doors for the summer. Don't know where I'll go—a sea trip, maybe, or somewhere in the woods. Yet New York," he added in a voice grown tired, as if the soul already spoke from a little greater distance, "is all the mountains and the streams, the hills and the purple valleys of mother earth. All the daffodils of spring meadows are blooming here. There's more poetry in a block of New York than in twenty daisied lanes!"—Exchange.

and abiding concern for all the social ills which afflict our country. How much are our pulpits thundering against the common practice of grafting both in public and private life? As a matter of fact there is relatively little said about it, and when something is said often the minister is accused of not preaching the gospel. Because of the fact that we have not appreciated the significance of Jesus' teaching of brotherhood we have little to say and are doing still less about prison reform; labor conditions; the conflict between organized labor on the one hand, and organized capital on the other; public utilities; civic corruption; hoousing conditions in the great icities; mmigration; gainful occupation of women; and the blight of child labor. These are all big human problems, all of national importance and significance. Some of the leading denominations have departmental organizations designed to deal with some of these problems We have no such organizations; we have one lone little hospital in all this broad land which is located in a little country town. This should humiliate us. What better service could we as a brotherhood render our country than to establish along with our other organized work an institute of social service, the object of which would be to keep before the churches the pressing needs of the hour and teach the churches that they in turn might teach their members their Christian obligation to concern themselves with conditions which menace human life and seek to improve them?

The Family Altar League

Its Purposes and Progress

BY REV. FRANK HAYES.

Within the last twenty-five years the church has felt the thrill and blessing of several new and sudden movements for progress and uplift within her own bounds; but of these movements not one has been received more gratefully or has given promise of more profound results and widespread blessing than that of the Family Altar League.

From being almost universally observed in the families of the church two generations ago, it had suffered neglect till its observance was the exception and not the rule, even among Christian famlies that were busy with many of the lines of work in the church and in philanthropic movements.

The whole world is feeling an acceleration in the movement of its activities and enterprises, but nowhere is the rush of life as great as in America; and this rush seems to have left its mark first of all on the family worship.

But this rush of life would inevitably make itself felt. The multitude of enterprises and the tremendous energy required by them called more and more for time. Every movement must be rendered to the great cause of haste. The head of the family is in haste to reach his business, the mother is compelled to be in haste to fulfill the domestic and social requirements of her life, the children are in haste to go to school. With all this tremendous pressure constantly brought to bear upon the time of the family, it was easy for people to yield a little here and there, and that yielding led to the complete neglect of the household altar. This was, undoubtedly, the history of the falling away of family worship.

But in permitting this falling away, Christians were involving a loss far greater than they realized, and many families have been slowly awakening to the conviction that the family altar is not only a duty but a privilege and a necessity to the best interests and the highest happiness of the individual and the family: and also that the neglect of the family altar is a menace to the well-being of both the church and the state, because the quality of the life in either church or state will not be better than the quality of the average family life.

Less than two years ago, the Family Altar League was founded by Dr. Biederwolf, the well-known evangelist, and a few of his associates, but in this incredibly short time the movement has become world-wide.

Up to the present time about 85,000 requests have come in for covenant cards, and letters are pouring in daily to the main office asking for information on the subject and particulars as to the plans of the League and the conditions of membership. These letters are coming from all parts of the world. The work of the League is being carried on actively in China, and it is expecteo that in a very short time it will be circulated in the other Foreign Mission fields.

Steps are being taken to bring the matter before the various ecclesiastical organizations of our country and to secure their endorsement and co-operation. The General Assembly of the Canadian Presbyterian Church has already taken the matter in hand to organize the work in connection with the work of their churches.

The League is unique in the fact that it has no organizations, no meetings, and no fees. It is simply a world-wide company of people who have taken the same vows and are seeking the same blessing.

The plan of the League is thus: Attractive cards are issued, bearing the following covenant:

"Believing myself to be largely responsible for the eternal salvation and religious training of my children, and realizing the need of God's grace for my own Christian life, I covenant with God to make it the rule of my life to gather together, each day, so far as possible, the members of my family, and together read some portion of His Word and pray for His blessing upon my home.

Husband .....
Wife .....

This card is signed by the husband and the wife, and sent to the headquarters of the League in Chicago, 602 Lakeside building, where it is filed, and in its place is sent without cost, a beautifully engraved wall card, certifying that "This home is enrolled in the Family Altar League," and bearing also the words of the covenant. A detachable portion of the card is given to the pastor as a reminder that the family is registered in the League.

Thus far all the expenses of the movement have been met by voluntary contributions of persons who were interested in the work. Into the homes of the members is sent each month, a series of daily Bible readings and other helpful material. A most kindly suggestion comes from the League that the churches of our country observe a "Family Altar Day;" the thought is not for some particular day to be fixed upon for all the churches alike, but if the pastor could devote the morning service on some day of his own choosing to this vital thing, atwhich time the need of family prayer in the home could be emphasized, and the work of the League presented to his people, such a plan would most certainly be productive of large results for the Kingdom. The League has prepared an Order of Service, a sample of which will be sent free, and copies by the hundred furnished at cost.

The work is not commercial in any sense of the work; whatever revenue is received from any of its departments, being spent to further the work at home and abroad.

Pastors and others who are interested in this splendid movement can obtain full information of the work and samples of the literature, by addressing The Family Altar League, 602 Lakeside building, Chicago, Ill. Covenant cards will be sent free although the actual cost including postage is twenty-six cents per hundred. If those ordering care to bear a part or the whole of this expense it will be appreciated.

Waning Catholicism

That the Roman Catholic Church is slowly and surely losing its great power in Europe is becoming more evident each week. "The Missionary Review of the World" says:

"German religious papers bring the news of Rome's continually increasing losses upon the continent of Europe. In Germany a surprising large number of Roman Catholic priests have entered the Protestant ranks recently. Six priests of the diocese of Breslau, Silesia, have resigned their offices lately and avowed their purpose of becoming followers of Luther, and one of the six is preparing for the ministry. The now well-known Thaddeus Engert, D. D., and two other ex-priests of Bavaria, are also studying evangelical theology, while in Budapest, Hungary, the Lutheran Bishop Scholz ordained two ex-priests a short time ago. The famous Roman Catholic theologian, Hugo Koch, of Braunsberg, has published a book entitled "Cyprian and the Romish Primate" as one of the volumes of Harnack's series of "Studies in Ecclesiastical History." It deals with the matter according to the recognized results of historical investigation, which are in sharp contrast with the standpoint taken by Roman Catholic authorities in general, so that our readers will not be surprised to hear that Professor Koch will no longer occupy the position of a Roman Catholic professor of theology.

In Russian Poland a peculiar Losvon-Rome movement has been started. Almost one hundred thousand Roman Catholic Poles have announced their separation from the Roman Catholic Church, and have founded a new denomination called the Church of the Followers of Mary (Mariawiten Kirche). They have a considerable number of beautiful churches, large parsonages, and well-kept cemeteries. The members of the new sect are scattered over the whole country, though their largest numbers are found in the big cities, especially in Warsaw and Lodz. It is to be regretted, however, that the new sect has simply gone from Roman Catholicism into a peculiar heresy, because it was started by Maria Felicia Koslowska, who claimed to be the representative of Mary, the "holy" mother of Jesus upon earth. A certain Bishop Koswalski has joined Mary Koslowska, and both are actively working for a movement to lead the Roman Catholic people away from the Pope and, as they express it, under the direct rule of the Lord Jesus Christ. In spite of the fact that the followers of the new faith are forced to acknowledge the rule of a woman instead of that of the Pope, the numbers of the Followers of Mary are rapidly increasing unto the weakening of popery in Russian Poland though not unto the strengthening of the Protestant forces.

Labor Appeals to the Pulpit

President of American Federation Urges Co-operation of Ministers

Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, has issued an address to "ministers of the Gospel," in which he defends labor unions and attempts to answer common criticisms. Extracts from the appeal appear below:

The Labor Union Not the Labor Question.

It is sometimes forgotten that the labor union is not the labor question. If every labor union in existence was wiped out the labor question would still be present, and that, too, in more aggravated form than it is today. It cannot be denied that unionism has brought nearer a solution of the industrial problem. It is easier and more satisfactory to deal with men collectively than to attempt to deal with them as individuals. As a matter of fact, in this day of great corporate interests, individual contracting has practically gone out of practice. Furthermore, if workingmen were to be denied the right to organize and to elect representatives to care for their interests, such denial could only result in a state of individualism which would end in chaos and anarchy. It is the fact that this right still belongs to them that makes our American life so free from so-called anarchistic propaganda, and which accounts for small response on the part of the American workingmen to such appeals. It seems almost superfluous to add that trades unionism does not indorse the plea for the disruption of our American form of government. Nowhere can be found more loyal citizens than in the ranks of organized labor.

The Right to Protest.

We are not opposed to employers' associations that are organized for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of their members, but we deplore "union-smashing" alliances of any kind that deny the same right to us. We would respectfully suggest that ministers of the gospel, who are associated with such organizations, are identified with societies to whose membership an adherent of organized labor, who believes in strikes, is not eligible, and that in the line-up which is taking place between capital and labor, these ministers seem to be against us. There are times when a strike is justifiable. God help us if the day should ever come when the right to protest is denied the workingman. In so far as these organizations stand for law and order, we are with them, but in their present attitude, which only makes for class distinctions, class privileges, and, as a result, class hatred, we are diametrically opposed to them.

The Employers' "Walking Delegate."

The manager or superintendent of a great corporation who refuses to deal with the elected representatives of the trades union who may not be in the employ of the corporation, does not seem to realize that he himself is the elected or appointed representative of a number of stockholders, thus practically becoming the business agent or "walking delegate" of his corporation. Taking human nature as one finds it, it would be only natural for that superintendent to be prejudiced against the workman who, representing his fellow-employes, dared to present a grievance in their behalf. To avoid this unpleasant and almost inevitable discrimination, organized labor prefers to appoint to this difficult task a man who cannot be touched by the corporation because of his aggressive interest in behalf of its employes.

Some General Misconceptions.

Certain misconceptions in regard to the position taken by the trades unions on the question of equal earnings for all workmen, the color line, a "labor trust," and labor-saving machinery have made it difficult for many ministers to declare for organized labor. For the benefit of such we would respectfully submit the following statements:

The unions do not demand equal earnings for all workmen, thus reducing the skilled workmen to the level of the lowest. They do insist that a minimum or living wage be paid; but there is nothing in the laws of the American Federation of Labor or any of its affiliated unions that prevents an employer from paying any employe as much as he pleases. Nor in connection with this do the unions insist upon the employment of incompetent men. Where agreements exist, the employer can hire any man he pleases in compliance with the terms of the agreement. Where no agreement exists, the union exercises no jurisdiction in the matter, but in either case the employer has every right to discharge the incompetent, shiftless employe.

No Color Line.

The American Federation of Labor does not draw the color line, nor do its affiliated national and international unions. A union that does, cannot be admitted into affiliation with this body. A portion of the pledge taken by every candidate for membership reads: "I promise never to discriminate against a fellow-worker on account of color, creed, or nationality." Colored men are sometimes rejected, but there is no discrimination in such cases, as white men are more often treated in a like manner. Even in the South, where race hatred is so prevalent, the negroes have been admitted into the trades unions, while they have been barred from other organizations that are antagonistic to organized labor. The color barriers have been broken down by labor unions, and not his color, but his character, bars the negro when he is barred.

Not a "Labor Trust."

Trades unionism is not a "labor trust." A trust excludes the many for the benefit of the few. Trades unionism opens wide its door to every workingman in the craft, frequently reducing or abrogating the initiation fee in order to make it easier for the candidate. A trust is a close corporation; a trades union diligently seeks new members. Its officers are not high-salaried officials. They are usually underpaid, when one considers the character of the work and the other demands which are made upon them. The business agent of a labor union receives as his salary only the rate of wages which prevails in his craft. The international officers, who carry great responsibilities, which demand executive ability of a high order, receive only what is paid an ordinary clerk in the office of a corporation. It will be interesting to note that the term "walking delegate" had its origin in the action of a New York labor union which refused to pay the car fare of its business agent.

The "walking delegate" does not have unlimited power in the matter of calling a strike. The men do not blindly follow his dictates. The business agent can order a strike only when the question has been voted upon by the members of the union. He then simply announces the strike.

Membership of Trade Unions.

It has been and is now asserted that labor unions admit immoral and even vicious men to membership. The charge is malicious. Trades unions have character qualifications, and men are required to be "sober, steady, and industrious workmen" before membership can be gained. It would be foolish to assert that the trades unions did not have immoral or even vicious members, but not to a greater extent than other organizations that are supposed to have a higher standard of ethics.

It is unqualifiedly true that trades unions have been and are directing their efforts to bring into their ranks importations from other countries that are not always considered desirable. But it must be admitted that the employers, and not the trades unionists, are responsible for the presence of this class of labor in our country. The employers brought them here. If they are good enough to be brought here and employed for profit by the employers, and the opponents of organized labor, who profess a high order of morality and good citizenship, then it follows as a natural sequence that they must be good enough for us to try and organize them in trades unions, and thus protect themselves, help and receive help for man's social and moral uplift.

The "Closed" Shop.

The principle of the so-called "closed shop" is accepted in everyday business life; why may not an organization of workingmen similarly make a bargain with an organization of employers?

The dealer will agree with the manufacturer to handle only a certain kind of goods. This is considered perfectly legitimate. Why does it seem unconstitutional when precisely the same bargain is entered into between the employer and his employes? The labor union says to the employer: "We will agree to furnish you with competent men at so much per day. We can control the men in our organization. They will abide by the contract that we shall make. We cannot control the men who are outside of our organization, so we ask you to employ only our men, thus making your shop a union shop. If these outside men will agree to make the same contract with you that we have made, we shall be glad to have them come into our organization, thus giving them the same privilege that we enjoy."

Relation of the Labor Union to the Non-Union Man.

The non-union man, by accepting lower wages and longer hours, sets up the standard of living for the entire craft. He may degrade the men who required years of hard work to bring themselves up to their present social and economic level. It is because of this fact that workingmen object so strongly to Chinese and Japanese immigration. But what about the non-union man who demands and receives everything that the unionist asks for? Surely, it may be said, he is not degrading the workingmen. That may be true, for the present. The time may come, however, when the workingmen of his craft may have a grievance which will require a united protest against the unfair treatment of the employer. Outside of the organization, that nonunion man may become a menace to our interests, even though he is receiving union wages and working union hours. He may be used against us. Furthermore, he is receiving the benefit of the years of sacrifice and hardship of his fellow-workmen without assuming any of the obligations of the union. He is quite willing to have others fight his battles, without subjecting himself to the perils of the warfare, and frequently his "conscientious scruples" against joining the labor union consist simply of an unwillingness to assume these obligations.

"Limitation of Output."

Limitation of output is sometimes urged against the trades union. This is untrue, but actically no attention is given the regular eetings of manufacturers and dealers in which they openly discuss and agree upon prices and the limitation of their product in order to maintain these prices. This applies to practically every great corporation. In some industries the producer will cut off the supply of the dealer if he sells the product cheaper than the price demanded. Meanwhile the same concern will insist on the workingman's right to sell his labor for whatever price he pleases. Every storekeeper despises the merchant who cuts his prices, but he will usually defend the workingman who cuts his.

We are sometimes accused of limiting the number of apprentices in a particular shop. But we have been compelled to resort to this measure at times because some employers have filled their shops with boys, who were frequently kept at work on a particular machine or on the same kind of special work, which enabled them to earn a man's wages in a year or two, thus not only depriving the full-fledged mechanic of his position, but, at the end of his apprenticeship, the young man found himself a "specialist," unable to pursue his craft as a journeyman, and therefore replaced by another boy, who would pass through the same experience.

In the matter of piecework, when the employers found that by hard spurts their employes could earn a little more than was customary, it frequently happened that a reduction was ordered in the piecework price, so that soon this system in many trades became "the pace that kills."

In practically every instance where the rules of the labor union seem unjust or tyrannical we have been compelled, in self-defense, to establish such laws as would guarantee us some protection against further encroachment by unscrupulous employers.

The extra five minutes at the end of the day in order to "finish a job" became a regular thing, and soon it lengthened into a quarter of an hour or longer, while frequently a protest brought only abuse. Hence, the apparently arbitrary ruling that under no circumstances must a man work beyond the time limit.

Moral and Ethical Value.

The labor union has an ethical value which is rarely appreciated. Labor halls have become social centers. Frequently helpful lecture courses are given. Social features, uplifting in character, are often supported. The labor press educates the trades unionist in technical matters, presents higher ideals, and urges better living.

I Killed a Robin

BY SIDNEY DAYRE.

I killed a robin. The little thing,
With scarlet breast and glossy wing,
That comes in the apple-tree to sing.

I flung a stone as he twittered there;
I only meant to give him a scare,
But off it went—and hit him square.

A little flutter—a little cry—
Then on the ground I saw him lie;
I didn't think he was going to die.

But as I watched him I soon could see
He never would sing for you and me
Any more on the apple-tree.

Never more in the morning light,
Never more in the sunshine bright,
Trilling his song in gay delight.

And I'm thinking every summer day,
How never, never I can repay
The little life that I took away!

Foreign Mission Notes

Miss Emma Lyon of Nankin, China, reports that there are ninety girls in her school. She calls urgently for another missionary to be associated with her. The society has not the money to send another worker this year. Miss Lyon is doing a noble, heroic work.

The program of the Foreign Socieety at Topeka will be turned over largely to the missionaries this year. There will be ringing messages from China, India, Africa, Japan and the Philippines. The returned workers from the fields will report of the work on the firing line.

Dr. Eliott Osgood of Chu Cheo will be the happiest man in China when he hears the good news. J. M. Tisdale and his good wife of Covington, Ky., have given $5,000 for the erection and equipment of the hospital at Chu Cheo, where Dr. Osgood has so faithfully toiled. Mr. and Mrs. Tisdale will build this hospital in memory of their sisters, Anna G. and Aria C. Tisdale. They could not erect a better monument to the memory of their loved ones. After monuments of stone have crumbled to dust, thousands in China will rise up to call these names blessed. May this noble gift stir up others to do likewise. Most urgent appeals come for a Bible College in Nankin, China, $6,000; a chapel at Lu Cheo Fu, $2,500; a hospital at Laoag, Philippines, $7,000; a kindergarten at Akita, Japan, $1,500; a home for Dr. Shelton in Tibet, $3,000.

The church at Beatrice, Neb., J. E. Davis, pastor, reports that Miss Myrtle Warren joins with the Sunday school in supporting their fourth living link. This is a great record for the Beatrice people.

The Foreign Society will use "Breaking Down Chinese Walls," by Dr. E. I.. Osgood of China, as a mission study text book this fall and winter. "Bolenge," by Mrs. Dye, will also be used, besides many other excellent text books.

The Congo missionaries report a wonderful opening of the new station at Lotumbe, Africa. They start off with a membership of seventy-five.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon of Laoag, Philippines, reports 1,067 medical treatments for the month; 189 surgical treatments, 55 major and minor operations; six visits to outside towns, fifty-three professional visits in Laoag. Dr. Lemmon removed a tumor weighing eighty pounds and holding twelve gallons of fluid from a woman. This is the second or third largest on records, so far as he knows. Dr. Lemmon also reports for Laoag: 316 sermons, 7,442 hearers, 146 homes visited, 1,636 tracts distributed, 22 baptisms, five funerals, three marriages.

R. D. McCoy of Tokyo, Japan, reports three graduates from the Bible College this year.

In the last ten weeks there have been twenty-nine boys baptized in Damoh, India. W. B. Alexander writes that the missionaries are all well and happy.

B. L. Kershner states seven have been baptized in the central district of Manila.

George B. Baird of Luchowfu, China, writes that the little waiting room in the hospital, which is used for a church, is crowded to overflowing at the morning service. A suitable chapel is greatly needed. This building will cost $3,000. It may be that some one will provide this amount for this purpose.

Dr. Dye writes that eighty-eight have been baptized at Monieka, and eleven at Lotumbe, Africa.

Church Life

—Do not delay ordering your first quarter supplies for the Bethany Graded Lessons.

—The first quarter begins October 1.

—Start the children of your Sunday-school on as true and adequate a method of religious instruction as they have in the day school.

—Some superintendents imagine they must grade the school before they have graded lessons.

—This is putting the cart before the horse.

—The grading of the school will take care of itself when you introduce a graded course of study.

—And a graded school will almost certainly backslide if it does not have a graded curriculum.

—This is one weakness of the Front Rank standard to which many Disciple schools are striving. It makes a virtue of grading the school without grading the course of study.

—No doubt our national Sunday-school leaders will soon add Graded Lessons to the Front Rank Standard.

—The publishers of Bethany Granded Lessons receive many inquiries as to whether the "Foreword" is included in the autumn quarter's textbooks. Yes, the "Foreword" is in all the text for next quarter.

—And that is one very important reason why your school should begin the Bethany Lessons, October 1.

—A Primary Teacher writes that she learned more in this "Foreword" about teaching her children than she ever knew before.

—Send today for a sample of the Bethany Lessons and for prices and order blank.

—When this paper reaches our readers the editors will be in attendance at the Illinois convention in Springfield. The capital city church is an experienced convention entertainer. Two national conventions have been held here and we predict that when the new First Church building is completed the brotherhood will want to "come again."

R. M. Cummings has removed from Harrison, Ark., to Barnard, Mo.

First Church, Oakland, Cal., will dedicate its new house of worship on September 11.

The last word from Mr. Rains was mailed in Honolulu. He has had a continuous ovation since he left Cincinnati.

Clifton Rash has been compelled to resign his pastorate at Plainfield, Kans., on account of ill-health.

Evangelistic meetings are being held at Cooksville, Ill. At the latest report there had been fourteen additions to the church.

Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Clemmer conducted a successful meeting at Woodland Park, Colo., during August. Mr. Clemmer is pastor of our church at Rockford, Ill.

W. R. Hunt writes that land has been bought in Wuhu for his home. Money is now needed for a building. It will take $3,000 to put up a suitable home.

The church at Brewerton, N. Y., has been overhauled at a cost of more than $1,200 and is now among the fine auditoriums of central New York. D. H. Patterson will shortly take charge of this church.

Dr. Burchart reports the erection of a store house in which medicine and other supplies can be kept. This is as nearly fireproof as any building can be made in China.

R. D. McCoy, Toyko, Japan, writes that his home is rebuilt. The first house he erected was burned; the insurance money replaces the building that was destroyed.

The Topeka Convention begins on October 11 and closes on the 17th. There will be a registration fee of one dollar. This entitles one to a program and badge.

J. P. Myers, recently pastor of the church at Shelbyville, Ind., has accepted a call to Marion, Ind., succeeding J. Boyd Jones, who goes to Anderson, Ind.

The congregation at Estherville, Ia., are happy in the completion of their new church home, services having been held there on August 28.

The seventy-ninth annual session of the New York Northern Christian convention will be held at Brushton, N. Y., September 23-25.

At Lebanon, Mo., union services were held on August 28, services being arranged by the Ministers' Alliance in the interests of statewide prohibition.

Twenty-five hundred dollars is being spent in improvements at the First Church, Topeka, Kansas, and a new $10,000 organ has just been installed.

A farewell reception was tendered Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Richard at Hutchinson, Kans., last week. Mr. Richard has been assistant pastor of the church there.

The missionary year ends on the last day of September. The books close at that time. All moneys intended to be paid this year should be in Cincinnati by noon September 30.

P. C. Macfarlane, general secretary for the Brotherhood of Disciples, stated in an address at Los Angeles that the Brotherhood now has a membership of 15,000, though it is but a year old.

The work at Corona, Cal., is progressing and the new part of the church building will soon be ready for occupancy. E. J. Harlow has occupied this pastorate for the past two years.

The Central district convention of Iowa Disciples was held last week at Newton. Several members of the faculty of Drake University gave addresses at the various sessions.

J. H. Gilliland dedicated the church at Macomb, Ill., Sunday, September 4, and after conducting an evangelistic meeting there, will hold meetings in Cedar Rapids and Nevada, Ia.

The Varneys opened a meeting at Belding, Mich., September 5. The pastor, Isaac Bussing, has made great preparations for this meeting, and a splendid ingathering is looked forward to.

Charles Reign Scoville is now in a successful meeting at Litchfield. Benjamin Mitchell is our pastor there. Mr. Scoville has a new musical director this year, J. V. Baird, formerly of Spokane.

Clifford S. and Mrs. Weaver will not return to Japan for some time on account of the state of Mrs. Weaver's health. They did good work in Japan and are greatly needed there. They did good work in Latham, Ill., while on furlough.

It will be a great thing for the work everywhere if $400,000 is received before the year closes. This will cheer the hearts of the workers and will give a mighty impetus to the work.

Miss Stella Franklin, Mrs. George W. Brown and Miss Mary Stanley sail from Boston for Naples on the "Canopie," September 14. India is their destination. Miss Franklin enters upon her third term; Mrs. Brown on her second and Miss Stanley on her first.

Prof. A. M. Haggard, of the Bible department of Drake University, with his family, has been spending the summer at Pinecliffe, Colo., and supplying the pulpit at Central Church Denver, during August.

George H. Southgate, former assistant pastor of the First Church, Bloomington, Ill., has assumed the pastorate of the church at Colfax. No successor has as yet been appointed to fill his place.

Charles C. Wilson, of Bellefontaine, O., preached on "Labor's Greatest Need" at the evening service, September 4. Members of the labor union were especially invited to this service.

Recently at the Monroe St. Church, Chicago, J. Wood Miller gave a reading of St. Mark's Gospel. Mr. Wood gives this reading entirely from memory and in Norwegian and German, in addition to the English rendition.

Wilbur Forsythe Robinson arrived in Japan August 7, 1910. His weight is nine pounds; he is said to be worth his weight in gold. The Lord bless the lad and make him a blessing, and bless his parents who will have the training of him for service in the kingdom

The Presbyterians are asking five dollars from every member and an aggregate of offerings of six millions. They hope to attain to this standard in a few years. The Methodists are aiming at a like amount. Last year they gave over two millions for Foreign Missions.

After a successful pastorate of three years at Troy, Kans., Jesse Bader has accepted the pulpit at Colfax, Iowa. While here, Mr. Bader will continue his studies at Drake University, after which he expects to enter the evangelistic field.

George H. Brown, of First Church, Charleston, Ill., who recently resigned to accept a call to Covington, Ky., has reconsidered his decision and will remain in Charleston, in response to the unanimous call of his congregation. Mr. Brown has occupied this pastorate for the past five years.

The church at Arkansas City, Kan., Thomas H. Papplewell, pastor, reports seven additions on a recent Sunday. Their Sunday-school is on a contest with the school at Blackwell, Okla., and look forward to bringing the enrollment up to 600.

Evangelist Wm. J. Lockhart, of Des Moines, Ia., and the Linnt Brothers, of Lincoln, Neb., will begin a meeting at Sullivan, Ill., September 18. J. Will Walters, the pastor there, is superintending the erection of a tabernacle preparatory to the meeting.

A new church edifice was dedicated at Atlanta, Ind., Sunday, Sept. 4, with subscriptions that more than sufficed to pay the indebtedness. Several persons were present who attended the dedicatory service of the old church forty-four years ago.

For their annual rally day on September 25, the Sunday-school of First Church, Lincoln, Neb., has organized itself in military form, the intervening Sundays to be recruiting days, culminating in a review of the forces by the general superintendent on rally day. They are looking forward to a thousand in attendance.

Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., was reopened Sunday, September 4, having been closed for six weeks for interior redecoration. The last number of their weekly church paper contains a pertinent article relative to the duties of the congregation to the chorus choir.

On August 28, Central Church of San Diego, Cal., held a dedicatory service, the occasion being the installation of a new pipe organ. The pastor, W. E. Crabtree, preached an appropriate sermon on "Worshipping God," taking up in his theme the place of music in divine worship.

The September issue of the Christian Banner, published by the Michigan Christian Missionary Society, tells of a plan to "besiege" the town of Flint in order that work may be opened up there during the fall. Flint is a desirable field, owing to its rapid development as an automobile manufacturing center.

J. F. Findley, of Ft. Collins, Colo., who is spending some time abroad, writes of attending the Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau. There were about four thousand people in attendance, for the greater part Americans. Mr. Findley expected to continue his journey to Rome.

The congregation of South Lawrence Ave. Church, Wichita, Kans., are looking forward to the erection of a new church. The rapid growth of every department in the church during the past three months has made it necessary for increase both in capacity and equipment. The pastor, C. C. Sinclair, feels that a new church is almost assured.

During the month of September Austin Hunter, pastor of Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, will give a series of Sunday evening sermons dealing with various social problems. The following are the subjects: The Gospel and the Labor Problem; The Gospel and Mammonism; The Gospel and Saloonism; The Gospel and Socialism.

Edgar DeWitt Jones, of First Church, Bloomington, Ill., was expected home last week from his vacation, which was spent in touring Europe and the British Isles. His congregation had made great preparation for a rousing welcome on his return, an effort being made to have at least a thousand in attendance at the Sunday-school, September 4. The Christian Century hopes to print two articles on the Passion Play from the pen of Mr. Jones.

Beckley Institute, the C. W. B. M. School at Beckley, W. Va., is doing a good work among the mountain boys and girls of this locality. All grades are taught from kindergarten to high school, this being the only school in the town offering the advantages of the higher grades. It has an enrollment of 346 pupils, and is in need of more teachers and better equipment.

Members of the Little Flat Rock Church near Rushville, Ind., celebrated the eightieth anniversary of the church Sunday, September 4, with a home-coming meeting. Many members from other states were present and reminiscent talks were made by former ministers and S. J. Corey, of Cincinnati, O. The church is said to be the oldest religious organization in the state.

President E. V. Zollars recently addressed the congregation of First Church, Warren, O., emphasizing in particular the obligation of the church to Christian education. Our colleges are giving us approximately three hundred preachers a year, but we are losing that many by reason of death or retirement, so that able and experienced men do not need to look for fields of activity; the difficulty lies rather in the direction of securing men for the open doors now awaiting them.

Jay Elwood Lynn, a former pastor of First Church, Springfield, Ill., and Warren,

O., has completed the first four months of his pastorate at Pueblo, Colo. During this time he has visited the entire membership of Central Church, and at a recent service reported the result of his findings. This included the number of workers, number of substantial supporters and many other details and will prove an interesting and valuable document for purposes of development and organization.

The wonderful Sunday-school at Nelsonville, O., had its Fall Rally, September 5, with an attendance of 1,208, and an offering of $40. The Berean class had 512 men present, Loyal Women 124, Primary 200. The largest previous attendance was 978. The population of Nelsonville is only about 7,000. U. S. Cook is the pastor and leader in this remarkable work.

On Sunday, September 4, the new house of worship at West Liberty, Ky., was formally opened for service. The building is a handsome one of stone and brick, and furnished throughout in exquisite taste. J. W. Hatcher, formerly of Hamilton, O., has been minister of the congregation for nearly two years, and it was largely due to his efforts that this enterprise was accomplished. In striking contrast with the way in which almost all of the school and church buildings are built, the congregation at West Liberty has built this church without outside help. R. H. Crossfield, president of Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky., spoke at the dedicatory services.

In yielding up his pastorate in Kansas City, to become State Secretary of Missouri Missions, D. Y. Donaldson wrote a gracious communication to the Disciples of his state. He speaks feelingly of his love for his pastorate and his great satisfaction in the successorship of L. J. Marshall to this charge. "I find myself," he says, "standing with one hand extended to the weak and needy and one extended to the host who are strong ready to help. Blessed bond, if I may hold firmly to both and so become a double blessing. Such is my conception of the place to which you have called me." Mr. Donaldson speaks in words of frank appreciation of his predecessor in the secretarial office, T. A. Abbott, "who has put the best years of his life into this work. He has been generous to give me freely much help. He is now and offers ever to be my willing counsellor." Recently Mr. Donaldson's church gave a reception in his honor and that of Mrs. Donaldson, presenting the former with a gold watch and the later a handsome silver service. The Christian Century joins in wishing constant success to the new leader in Missouri missions.

The Englewood (Chicago) Church, of which C. G. Kindred is pastor, will mark its twenty-fifth anniversary by a two days' celebration, Sunday and Monday, September 18 and 19. At the morning service, on Sunday, the pastor will preach. At the evening service, Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of The Christian Century, will preach. On Monday evening, all the Disciples, ministers and congregations, of the city and vicinity are invited to rejoice with the Englewood Church. Mr. Morrison will address this meeting, speaking on the Edinburgh Missionary Conference and the London Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union. It is desired by the committee that former members of this great church, now residing elsewhere, send letters suitable to be read to the congregation. The reading of these will be an interesting part of the program. Such congratulatory communications should be addressed to O. A. Harding, Room 1201, 100 Washington St., Chicago. On Mr. Kindred's first Sunday after his vacation, large congregations greeted him and nine persons united with the church.

Southern California News Letter

The work of the new year in Southern California Missionary circles is fairly begun. A number of pastors were able to take vacations immediately following the Long Beach gathering. The secretary has had his fling at a vacation, has been conducting a meeting with Oscar Sweeney at Oceanside, filling the pulpit of the First Church on Sunday mornings, during the absence of the pastor in Alaska, and spending a few days each week in the office. In the midst of all this he has found time for a couple of days good fishing, and a surf bath often enough to make it interesting. Such a vacation puts him in such an attitude of mind that he feels now like tackling the more serious problems of the year.

On Thursday evening, September 1, the church at Santa Paula extended a warm welcome to the pastor, Dan Trundle and his wife. Addresses were delivered by representatives of the church board at Santa Paula and of the congregation and of the ministerial forces of the city. The formal installation service was conducted by the secretary at the close of the other exercises. Bishop J. P. Ralstin, of Ventura county, offered the installation prayer. Refreshments were served at the close by the ladies of the church. This was the auspicious beginning of what we earnestly hope and trust will be a most successful work. The promises of this work are very great.

One of the most self-sacrificing missionary workers in our Southern California field is Oscar Sweeney at Oceanside. He has done loyal service in this field for the past two years. He tried to get away last January, but the citizens rose up en masse and forbut the citizens rose up en masse and forbade any such action on his part. The result was that he remained. His church work has been done on the broad basis of community enterprise. He has stood personally, and his church as a body for everything moral and upright in the community and against every immoral and degrading influence. This is a dry town today, so a banker belonging to the Methodist church in that city told the secretary, because of the fact that Rev. Sweeney has remained in it. He has had the courage of a hero and exhibits the consecration of a martyr for the cause of the work there. His accomplished wife is no less important in the community and no less appreciated than is her worthy husband.

Pastor Clubb, of Pomona, will dedicate the new church at Oakland the 11th of September. He is a strong man for such a service and will without doubt accomplish the desired end, whatever that may be, in the matter of raising finances or the spiritual hopes of the people.

Pastor McCash, of Ontario, preached on Sunday night, August 28, at Beaumont. The mission here is to be under the supervision of the Ontario church during the coming year. They will support it financially, morally and every other way that is necessary until it becomes a self-supporting church. This is a splendid example for our churches to follow. All financial support for this church will be paid through the Southern California treasury and will be under the supervision of the Evangelizing Board though supported by the Ontario church.

Santa Barbara is looking toward the location of a pastor. Two or three splendid men are in view for this work. It is a church of great latent possibilities, the development of which means the establishment of one of the strongest churches in all this southland. The man with the ability to handle the situtation will achieve success.

L. J. McConnell closes his work at South Pasadena the first of October. He has done a successful work here, and though there are some problems that are exceedingly difficult, the work will be in far better shape for his successor than when he took hold of it. A strong man is needed for this place.

Sumner T. Martin is doing service at Redondo Beach during the summer, expecting to return to the Imperial Valley and take up the work under the board the first of October. The brethren at Redondo are very much encouraged and will be able to locate a permanent pastor before he has left them.

Willis S. Myers, state evangelist of the board, begins a meeting at Sawtelle September 4. His time is completely taken up till the holidays, and a number of calls for meetings that could not be filled before that time. His work was very successful last year, and with the splendid openings that are before him in this year's work, a record will no doubt exceed that of the last year. He is one of our best young evangelists and has given splendid satisfaction in the fields in which he has worked. The board was fortunate to be able to retain his services for this year's campaign.

Attention is now being directed toward our national convention at Topeka. The Western railway lines were very slow in making rates for the delegates from this section, but at least we have a report on the matter. Tickets will be on sale good going October 7 and 8, and returning up to and including the 31st. Round trip fare will be $60, including Omaha as well as Topeka. We are in hopes that at least seventy-five delegates can be secured from Southern California, that a special train may be given us for the trip. Twenty-five persons will secure a special car. The route will be the Santa Fe from Los Angeles. We hope to be able to make a junction with the Northern California delegation and also pick up the Arizona delegation on the way. This will make a splendid company to travel with. Any who may be going will confer a great favor by sending their names and addresses to the secretary, 1005 Wright and Callender building, Los Angeles, Cal.

W. G. Conley is closing his work at Covina and expects to go to El Centro in the Imperial Valley and begin service with that church about the 1st of the month. Brother Conley has held two very successful pastorates since coming to Southern California. Redlands and Covina. He is known and loved for his works' sake. He has been for several years a safe and sound counsellor on the Board of the Southern California Christian Missionary Society. Through some sort of oversight he was left o ffof the board this year. We have so many good men in Southern California that it is hardto put all who ought to be on the evangelizing board, without making it too unwieldy for the accomplishment of business, but a man like Brother Conley will serve well the interests of our co-operation in whatever place he may be.

The church at El Centro will begin the construction of a building on September 12. This building will be a great credit to the town and will make it possible to do a large and influential work there, in the county seat of this new county. Brother W. F. Holt, of Redlands, who has done so much for the development of Imperial Valley has been one of the largest contributors to the establishment of our work in that section. He is very liberal and during the three or four years of the develoment of the valley has expended in various ways an aggregate of $10,000 or $12,000 for our work there. Such consecrated and far-sighted men are an honor to our cause anywhere.

The Student's Aid Fund of nearly $12,000 will be put in available shape just as quickly as possible. The plan is to invest this fund, which was raised at Long Beach at the convention and use the interest only as a loan fund to students who are preparing themselves for Christian work. It is no doubt the foundation of a large enterrise for the furnishing and equipping of consecrated young people for the field in which they are so badly needed.

The outlook in Southern California for the coming year is a decidedly promising one. The new secretary has been kept exceedingly busy but the response and enthusiasm from the preaching brethren, of the board and of the congregations of the state, are such that results are sure and there is no slavishness in a work that is accomplishing the desired end.

F. W. EMERSON, Sec'y.

American Missions

August achievements are most gratifying. Eight churches were organized; 550 persons baptized: 667 accessions by letters, statement and reclaimed; 1.217 total added to the church.

In the month twenty-one churches increased their gifts; five gave less; thirty-eight gave which made no contribution last year.

A godly Ohio sister, this week gave the A. C. M. S. an annuity of $7,000. No safer or better investment can be made than in an annuity bond of the Home Society. Let others do likewise for our Master's and country's sake.

September of the centennial year gave the Home Society in total receipts, $26,699.60. Of that amount the churches gave $21,283.87. If September offerings of this second century year equal last, every missionary and station now supported can be maintained. No backward step must be taken; no backsliding in Home Missions is pardonable. Brethren please see to it at once that your congregation has a part in this blessed ministry. Send your remittances promptly, our books close September 30.

I. N. MCCASH, Sec'y.

Ahead of Roosevelt in Africa

One of the most popular of the lectures conducted by the Chicago Daily News during the past year is that by Guy Walter Sarvis on his trip through the heart of Africa. Mr. Sarvis is now under appointment of the Disciples' Foreign Missionary Society to go as a missionary to China. He will be supported by the Hyde Park Church of Chicago. The slides which are used in his lecture are not only pictures, but works of art, done in the colors which are really found in Central Africa. Mr. Sarvis' journey was through the most unfrequented part of the African jungle, and he is one of four living men who have made this journey. He passed through the heart of the pigmy country and the great forest of which Stanley wrote. The journey from Mombasa on the east coast to Banana at the mouth of the Congo occupied five months, half of which time was spent in marching. The first part of the journey was through the country in which ex-President Roosevelt hunted during the past year, and the last third was over the historic ground traversed by Stanley in his Emin Pasha Relief expedition.

The lecturer combines the point of view of the traveler and the scientist in a way that makes his lecture fascinating to young and old, and to audiences of all degrees of education. He deals especially with the customs of the people, and gives a sympathetic interpretation of a life which to many seems only savage. Mr. Sarvis has a fluent and interesting delivery, and makes the audience feel that for the time they are with him in central Africa. Churches within reach of Chicago will do well to invite Mr. Sarvis to give his lecture before them. He is now supplying the pulpit of the Hyde Park Church during the absence abroad of Dr. E. S. Ames.

Springfield's Welcome

The following communication from Springfield's three pastors to the Disciples of Illinois came too late for publication last week. It will have no effect now in inducing the wavering ones to decide to go, but it will suggest to the stay-at-homes something of the good things they are missing. At this writing the prospects are good for one of the best conventions Illinois has ever known. The following is the Pastors' Letter:

The Illinois Convention.

The Disciples of Christ in Illinois are invited to the State Missionary Convention which meets at Springfield Sept. 12 to 15.

The three churches of Springfield join in the invitation and will do all they can to make the convention great. The churches in the Capital city of Illinois have an honorable history which marks steady growth. The old First Church now has a membership of about 1,200, and is led in the work by Frederick W. Burnham. They are now undertaking the erection of a new building to cost, when finished, $100,000. The church is in flourishing condition. The brethren of Illinois will behold the aggressive work of their people at the Capital.

The West Side Church, where the convention meets, was organized by the First Church in 1902, and started in a splendid building with ninety-eight members. Its membership now numbers 726, and last year saw the church building enlarged and greatly improved by the addition of the Bible-school department at an expenditure of $13.000. John R. Golden, the present pastor has led in this development during two years.

The Stuart Street Church was organized in 1905, under the ministry of Charles Clayton Morrison, and has grown in a wonderful way. It now enrolls over 500 members. H. H. Jenner is the present pastor and with his people is planning yet larger work for the future.

The sessions of the State Convention will be held at the West Side Church, corner State and Edwards streets. Members of the reception committee will try to meet all incoming trains during the convention. If they should not see you at the station, take any car going toward the court-house, transfer to West Lawrence car, and get off at State street. Go one block north to the church.

The Brotherhood Sessions will be held on Tuesday afternoon at the Masonic Temple, one block south of the New Leland Hotel, and will conclude with the address of Arthur Holmes at the West Side Church in the evening. A banquet will be served in the basement of the Temple at 5:30 p. m., for 60 cents per plate; 500 men are expected to participate. Special delegations are preparing to come from central Illinois cities and towns.

The Springfield churches propose to furnish lodging and breakfast to all delegates to the convention. Dinner and supper will be served in the basement of the church at 35c and 25c, respectively. Those prefering hotel accommodations can secure same at good hotels at 50c and up, for each person for room, two or more in a room. Information regarding hotels can be obtained from the committee.

Plans are under way for some special evangelistic services at the city Rescue Mission, on the streets and perhaps at the shops. It is our hope to have the convention leave a favorable and lasting impression upon the city, and to have the delegates carry away the most helpful results of their coming.

F. W. BURNHAM,
JOHN R. GOLDEN,
H. H. JENNER.

Kentucky State Convention

The annual gathering of Kentucky Disciples will be held at Owensboro, Sept. 19-23. Monday evening's feature will be the Convention Sermon, by Joseph W. Hagin. Tuesday's three sessions are devoted to the C. W. B. M., with addresses by Prof. Charles T. Paul, of the Missionary Training School. Indianapolis, on "The Secret of Power in Missionary Service," and "The Romance of Christian Conquest." Mrs. John Gay will deliver the president's address and Mrs. Ida M. Harrison will report the Edinburgh Missionary Conference. On Tuesday the President of the Convention, W. E. Ellis, of Cynthiana, will deliver an address. The general interests of the brotherhood will be represented by G. W. Muckley, S. J. Corey, I. N. McCash, Robt. M. Hopkins and others. We note that E. L. Powell will conduct a one o'clock service on Thursday, at the Court House steps. The Sunday-school work occupies a large place on the program. H. W. Elliott, the efficient state secretary, will present a splendid report showing heartening growth in state missions.

Attention Topeka Delegates

Delegates who will send $1 to R. K. Wilson, Box 50, Topeka, Kansas, who is chairman of the entertainment committee, will find awaiting them on their arrival at the registration and assignment tables at the State Capitol building, a program and a badge which will be given them without any delay. It will be impossible to send program and badge by mail, but the committee will have you located and your badge and program awaiting you at a special table for the convenience of those who have sent their names in advance.

The registration fee will be $1. All delegates please remember this, that there may be no misunderstanding.

It is the desire of the secretaries of the different societies that this rule shall be enforced. At the Laymen's Convention at Chicago, concluding the series of Missionary Laymen's Conventions in the seventy-five different cities of the United States, a fee of $5 was charged for registration. At the World's Sunday School convention at Washington the fee for registration was $2. At the recent great Missionary Conference in Edinburgh the fee for registration was $3. The $1 fee is being followed quite generally by Christian Endeavor Societies and other religious bodies. The time has come in the history of our movement when a great deal of money is needed to handle the immense crowd that attends such gatherings as our National Conventions, and beginning with Pittsburg our secretaries insist that this plan of charging $1 for registration, with program and badge accompanying this fee, should hereafter become the rule, and have asked that it be applied at Topeka, that all our conventions in the future may be handled in a satisfactory and dignified manner. worthy of a great people.

It is hoped that a large number of delegates will avail themselves of this foreword and secure rooms and their programs and badges in advance, saving themselves much worry, and the committee much work.

We are expecting daily to hear that rates have been granted by the Western Passenger Association. Already the break has been made below the two-cent rates, namely, a special rate from Louisville, Kentucky, and another one for the entire Pacific Coast, and the Western Passenger Association have granted us a rehearing. We feel that there is no doubt concerning their actions.

CHARLES A. FINCH.

Conference of Evangelists

The conference of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, which has just closed its sixth session at Winona Lake, was in many respects the greatest in its history. The following officers were elected: President, W. E. Biederwolf; Vice-Presidents, J. Wilbur Chapman, Tilman Hobson, William A. Sunday, and C. R. Scoville; Secretary and Treasurer, Henry W. Stough. Fifty-one members were received, making a total membership of 253. The following eminent speakers addressed the conference: Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, D. D., of London, England; Rev. George R. Stuart, Cleveland, Tennessee; Rev. Tilman Hobson, Pasadena, California, and Rev. A. P. Gill, of Kansas. Measures were adopted by the association looking toward the improvement of evangelistic methods, the high moral and spiritual character and the practical efficiency of the members of the association for evangelistic work. There were over two hundred members of the association in attendance at the conference, among whom were many of the most prominent evangelists of the country.

Rates to Topeka Convention

Up to this date the railroads of the middle west have made concessions for a two-cent fare only. Dr. I. N. McCash, of the American Society, says that every pressure has been used to secure the best rates. Success has especially crowned their efforts in the case of the Pacific coast. The Santa Fe will sell tickets on Oct. 7 and 8, from the Pacific coast to Topeka and return, at the rate of one fare for the round trip, viz., $60, with going limit of 15 days and final return limit Oct. 31. Tickets at this rate will be sold via diverse routes going and returning, viz., one way via Albuquerque or El Paso, and the reverse direction via Ogden, or vice versa. Tickets reading one way via Portland will be sold at rate $15 higher.

Topeka and the Sunday-school

Topeka is getting ready for a great convention in October. A recent visit has revealed all in readiness for the oncoming hosts. Among the attractive features of the convention will be the Bible-school sessions on October 15 and 16. The program opens with a monster parade at one o'clock on Saturday, under the direction of D. P. Gribben, of Kansas City. At least 5,000 men, members and friends of Adult Bible Classes are expected to participate. Topeka has promised 300, Lawrence has a class of 100 that will come, Kansas City and Jackson County, Mo., will have more than 1,000 men over for the day. Governor Stubbs will head the procession and will deliver the first address of the afternoon session along lines of civic righteousness. The parade will be reviewed by 5,000 women and children banked on the beautiful entrance steps to the Kansas Capitol Building.

Following the address of Governor Stubbs, will come an address from the National Bible School Superintendent, and another from Hugh McLellan of Texas. The afternoon session will also include the Front Rank recognition service when all 1910 Front Rank schools will be appropriately recognized and congratulated.

Between the afternoon and night sessions, there will be two conferences. The first will be held in the First Christian Church and will be in charge of Mrs. Myron C. Settle, for the elementary workers. All workers and teachers in the Cradle Roll, Beginners, Primary and Junior Departments will want to attend this conference. The other will be a Teacher Training Luncheon in charge of Clarence L. DePew, the Illinois State Superintendent. The work of training teachers is certainly the greatest work of a Bible-school, hence there is urgent need that this fundamental service shall receive careful attention.

The night session is to include two addresses from Bible School specialists. R. P. Shepherd of St. Louis will speak on "The Church and Religious Education," and Herbert Moninger, of Cincinnati, will give an illustration on "Men's Work in the Bible School."

Sunday morning Myron C. Settle, the Kansas man, will conduct the record Bible-school of the convention in the Auditorium. He has set for his aim, 4,000 in attendance, and he asks all persons coming to Topeka to bring their Bibles for use on Sunday in this Bible-school. This will probably be the largest Bible-school service ever held among our people.

Certainly there will not be a dull moment at Topeka for Bible-school workers and many of them should plan to attend. The state men will also meet in conference each morning for the discussion of Front Rank standards.

ROBT. M. HOPKINS.
National Sunday-school Secretary.

American Society Program Features

Friday, Oct. 14, is the American Christian Missionary Society's day at the Topeka Convention. Besides the report of all the branches of this society, and the Presidential address, by Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, addresses are to be delivered by L. W. Marshall, Independence, Mo.; Albert Clot, of the American Waldensian Society; Secretary I. N. McCash, on "America's Challenge"; John R. Ewers, Pittsburg, on "Church Extension"; and C. M. Chilton, St. Joseph, Mo., on "Strangers Within Our Gates." The latter two divide the evening session between them. The annual meeting of the National Board of A. C. M. S. will be held in the First M. E. Church, Tuesday, Oct. 11, at two p. m. Life Directors, Life and Annual Members constitute this board.

The wheat crop of France is said to be 67,000,000 bushels short this year. French merchants are buying wheat in New York.

DRAKE UNIVERSITY AND CAMPUS

Drake University is twenty-nine years old, has eleven buildings devoted exclusively to school purposes, employs more than 150 instructors, and has an annual attendance of more than 1,800 students The University is located in the best suburb of "Beautiful Des Moines," with easy access to every point of educational and religious interest in the city. Library facilities are unexcelled in the West, living expenses are moderate and opportunities for remunerative employment are unusually good. School is in session throughout the year.

THE COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE

The Bible College of Drake University was established at the opening of the school in 1881. It is

Free from the limitations of man-made creeds and sectarian domination; has a faculty of earnest scholars, each an expert in some branch of Bible study; maintains that spirit of loyalty to Christ which leaves the mind free to "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good"; has organic union with a large and rapidly growing university and affords an opportunity of hearing in lecture or recital many of the most famous world characters. Des Moines is an educational, artistic, industrial and religious center.

MEDICAL MISSIONARIES

Drake University has more Medical Missionaries in the field than any other of our schools. No other institution in the Brotherhood offers the advantages to be found at Drake University. The College of Medicine of Drake University is standard by every test applied to such institutions. The training of the medical missionary in the College of Liberal Arts, the College of the Bible and the College of Medicine assures the best preparation for complete service.

Scholarships for Bible College Students

Free scholarships are provided by the university and its friends for all students preparing for the ministry or the mission field.

The Essential Significance of Graded Lessons

RULING PRINCIPLE

The new education puts the pupil at the center and requires the instruction to be adapted to his needs. The history of education shows that the pupil for a very long while was denied this central position. The question of interest belonged to the instructor, not to the instructed. But modern education entirely reverses this. The nature of the pupil, and the consequent needs of the pupil, receive first consideration. Modern psychology, particularly the study of the child-mind, has shifted the educational center from subjects to persons.

BEGINNERS

The series begins where the child's conscious thought always begins, with the parental idea, and presents God to the child-mind as the heavenly Father, and leads it to the conception of this divine fatherhood through the simple and familiar relations of the child to its earthly parents. The very reading of the topics which are the subjects of the lessons in the course for Beginners is like sweet and simple music, and to any heart capable of appreciating the simplicities of truth it will indicate how natural and simple religion is as belonging to the very nature of the soul, entering into its most germinal development and working itself out in all the processes of growth.

PRIMARY

In the Primary grade the same simple but great themes touched upon in the Beginners course are continued, but just sufficiently developed to correspond to the growing capabilities of the child's mind, including, but not going beyond the widening circle of the child's extending associations and experiences. Nothing is forced in upon the child that is unchildlike in character; truths which the child can comprehend and that have natural place in his life are presented and repeated with that reiteration which the child's mind requires, while the teacher is content to wait for the germination and silent growth of the simplest seeds of truth in the child's heart.

JUNIOR

In the Junior lessons the pulse of life begins to throb more strongly. The great subjects of religious thought begin to enter; the simple introduction to the great story of history begins; the wonderful stories of the Bible begin to exercise their fascination; duties growing out of natural relationships are recognized; the choice of good and evil, and the fateful results of such choices, are made to be seen and felt; and the thought of God's providence over individual life is given manifold illustration in the biblical stories. In the fourth year of the series a more careful study of the briefer of the four Gospels is entered upon, followed by a study of the most striking incidents described in the book of Acts, and closing with stories from that larger book of Acts, the lives of later Christian missionaries.

INTERMEDIATE

Here we find ourselves where adolescent life begins, when the child ceases and the man begins; when the stirrings of those ambitions which are to issue in great deeds begin to manifest themselves; when the sympathies and affections become more intense; when the great choices and decisions are made; when the heroic spirit becomes dominant and when ideals are set up; when the great temptations open their deadly assaults; when the reason begins to exercise itself: a period of strife, and tumult, and strain, of high resolving, of deadly peril, of glorious victory. To this fateful period our new series of lessons comes with definite and intelligent understanding. Christ forever knocks at the door of life in every stage, but more distinctly and strongly does he knock at the door of the heart of youth at this period than at any other time.

SENIOR

This is the period for constructive study. It is the altruistic period of life and its spirit is optimistic. The individual begins to define his relations to others and the duties growing out of those relations. The sense of obligation and responsibility grows, purpose becomes more definite and the formulation of a life program is undertaken. Consequently the steady aim of the study and instruction in this period is to help the pupil to find his place and work in the world.

NEW CONCEPTION

The new movement is the outgrowth of the larger conception of religious education. According to this new conception the factors entering into the process are much more varied than was formerly supposed. All truth belongs to religious education, from whatever source it may be derived. Moreover, the aim of all genuine education is the production of sound character, and all instruction must be directed to this purpose. Consequently into these new courses is to be introduced the study of great characters other than those included in the Scriptures. And the moral heroes of every generation will be summoned to illustrate and impress the great elements of noble character.

THE BIBLE

The Bible is used as the most valuable material in moral and religious instruction; and it is used with discrimination, with a clear understanding that we must select from it in the progressive education of the child such material as answers to the needs of the child at the various stages of his growth. The Bible is a great storehouse of spiritual food, but in its stores is food for the little child and the strong man. Henceforth we are to give to the child only that which belongs to the child and to the man only what belongs to the man.

TOPEKA, KANSAS
for the National Convention Disciples of Christ
OCTOBER 11 TO 17, 1910

This train, equipped with Standard Pullman Sleepers, Santa Fe Tourist sleepers and reclining chair cars (seats free), will leave Dearborn Station, Chicago, at 10 p. m., Monday, October 10, arriving in Topeka at one o'clock the next afternoon.

This special train will be operated under the auspices of the Christian Century, for the use of delegates and others attending the National Convention.

The equipment is all new and modern. The engine powerful and fast. The Santa Fe track is heavily ballasted,—double track most of the way—safeguarded by block signals and kept in perfect condition.

Fred Harvey will serve breakfast in a dining car that will be attached before the train reaches Kansas City and lunch at the dining room at Topeka after the train arrives.

You should not fail to attend the National Convention. It is of great importance that you be there.

You should make up your mind early and secure space on the Christian Century Special.

Santa Fe

I will be glad to reserve your Pullman or Tourist berth in advance.

What Can the Men Do?

DISCIPLE MEN HAVE ORGANIZED A BROTHERHOOD AND NOW THEY ARE ASKING WHAT THEY CAN DO WITH IT.

To the cynic and the critic that seems an anomolous if not a ridiculous procedure.

Why, the critic complains, do you add yet another organization to the already too complex and cumbrous machinery of the church when there is no obvious service for it to render?

The cynic declares that this new much-heralded organization without a function is typical of the delusion which obsesses the whole church—a delusion which imagines that the piling up of elaborate machinery is the same as success.

There is some ground for the position of both critic and cynic.

The truth is that the church is organized overmuch. There is great danger that man shall be lost in the very machinery devised to save him. It is not strange, therefore, that a new organization must give the countersign of service before it is allowed to pass the picket line where the critic stands.

And it is likewise true that the church is easily deluded into mistaking the clatter and roar of ecclesiastical machinery for the coming of the kingdom of God. The Roman Catholic church, the hypnotic revival, and a certain type of Sunday-school boom, are three instances in point, to name no more.

But neither of these admissions nor both of them together justify the attitude of the critic or the cynic toward the Brotherhood.

At the Illinois convention last week a Men's Meeting was held under the auspices of this Brotherhood. Two hundred men—half of them laymen—sat together in an afternoon's discussion of the question of giving this new organization something to do.

Some suggested that the men specialize in missions after the fashion of the Women's Society. Others argued that the men's business was to develop so-called institutional features in the church like baseball clubs, swimming pools, reading rooms and political reform clubs. Still others said that the fellowship principle expressed in occasional social meetings of the men, with perhaps a dinner attachment, would justify the existence of the new organization. The most insistent bidder for support was Eureka College, on whose behalf several urgent speeches were made asking that the Brotherhood devote itself during the next year or five years to the raising of at least a decent endowment for this pivotal institution.

It seemed as if there were as many opinions as there were minds. The meeting adjourned, after the chairman announced that the parade would be abandoned, and went out in front of the building to have its picture taken.

There was a bad taste in the mouth of the men. The critic and the cynic spoke freely. One man said, "The Brotherhood is a white elephant." Another replied, "What shall we do with it, kill it or starve it?" Thus criticism and cynicism ran through the company.

That evening, with a hundred citizens of Springfield added to the group, all sat down to a dinner together. Afterward, a national officer of the Brotherhood acting as toastmaster, a number of men were called upon to speak. Every man cracked jokes. There was not a serious effort made to rescue the Brotherhood from the pit into which it had fallen in the afternoon. Nobody evinced any sense of responsibility, not even the national officer. Not one illuminating speech was made.

As the men passed out one of the banqueters remarked that the trouble with the Brotherhood was that its leaders did not take it seriously. His neighbor replied, Yes, the Brotherhood is a huge joke.

And a third, more thoughtful and deliberate than the others, added that both in the Brotherhood's literature and its personal leadership there is evidence that a certain sort of swagger is mistaken for manliness.

In the judgment of The Christian Century it is immensely important at the present moment for the leaders of this movement to make a convincing interpretation of it to the laymen and ministers of the Disciples. This awakening of the masculine element of the churches is one of the most significant and promising facts in the Christian world.

But it is perilous to leave men to grope for themselves. Spiritual leadership in the Brotherhood, as Judge C. P. Kane declared, is the desideratum of the hour.

Dinners, parades, banners, social fellowship, big conventions, clever story-telling—down at the bottom of their hearts men have a contempt for an enterprise of which these are outstanding features.

The sooner the leaders of this movement come to have a contempt for these things also, and directly and frankly, with clear spiritual insight, and without apology, state to Disciple men the religious significance of the Brotherhood the sooner and the surer will the movement disarm the critic and the cynic and justify itself in the mind of the plain earnest man.

It is wrong for this criticism to continue. It is a fatal defect in the enterprise if its leaders are not able to speak an illuminating word which will open the eyes of earnest men whose enthusiasm is inhibited by persistent doubt as to the serviceableness of the new organization.

The men need to be shown that the essential meaning of their organization is not to be found in the taking up of this or that specific object more or less remote and romantic, nor yet in mere purposeless fellowship, but primarily in the assuming of the unregarded tasks of the local home church.

Of the multitudinous objects upon which Christian effort is today expended, none is so much in need of fostering love as the local home church. This is logically and naturally the men's job.

There are three phases of the present situation which may be made clear to the men if we have the wit and the heart but to try.

There is first, the fact that the central and vital weakness of the church today is its lack of spirituality. It isn't money the church lacks, nor members, nor machinery, nor property. It lacks spiritual life.

The second aspect of the situation is that the church lacks spiritual life because it lacks spiritual leadership. Our ministers are turning from their true calling to serve tables. They are organizers and administrators of the mechanics of religion, more than prophets of the most high God.

The third phase of the situation that the men can be made to see is that not the minister but they themselves are to blame for his lack of spiritual leadership. They have compelled him to do their work because if he did not do it it went undone.

He lets the contract for the new church house. He raises the money to pay for it. He hires the members of the choir. He may insist on an exhaustive pledge list being made up for current expenses before he accepts their call, but before six months have passed his pastoral calls have been turned into a money canvass—and that for his own salary.

On Sunday, he comes to the pulpit with a mind so filled with institutional responsibility that he preaches about the mere pragmatic affairs of the church. There is no prophet's message in his heart. His soul has had no chance to feel its way into and through some deep mystery of life whose secret he might now be interpreting to his people.

He has no vision; and the people perish!

Here is what his men can do: They can forbid his doing their work by doing it themselves. They can be made to see that his long college training, his temperament, his yearning and, more than all, God's purpose in him, fit him but ill for the mechanics of the church. That is their business.

His is to preach and to comfort God's children.

And finally, if this men's awakening be indeed a religious awakening, and not just a bit of fun, these Christian men can be made to see that their own spiritual life and growth depends tremendously upon the spiritual leadership of their minister.

Thus in the interest of their own deeper welfare, they will make such an inexorable, though tacit, demand upon him to be a spiritual leader that the compulsion of their expectation will be equalled only by the compulsion of God's call.

This, if men are made to see it, is a man's work to be done in a man's way. Its chief blessing will be that it will set the pastor free to do a preacher's work in a preacher's way.

Chapters From A Travel Journal

In Manor House and Cathedral

I am consenting to publish this chapter of my travel journal more for the sake of personal friends who have expressed an interest in following the route of our trip than because there are in it any observations of interest to the general reader.

Our trip through the Grampian hills from the very north to the extreme south of Scotland was taken on an ideal day. The out-of-the-window charms of British railway travel are fascinating. The scenery is unlike our own. If it is mountainous it is not awe-full, if it is level it is not monotonous. One feels that he can be on familiar terms with these mountains. And as for the farm lands, they are checkered with hedges and stone fences in such variety as to stand in marked contrast to our far-stretching prairie corn-fields.

It was our great pleasure to be the guests of Lord and Lady Polwarth and their three daughters at Mertoun House, near St. Boswell's. The personal acquaintance of this gracious family was one of the fruits of the Edinburgh Conference. Lord Polwarth was the President of the World Missionary Conference held in London in 1888. His interest in things missionary is deep and abiding. One of his daughters is a missionary in Tibet, and his son, the Master of Polwarth, was Chairman of the British delegation at the Edinburgh Conference.

His lordship is a gracious and venerable gentleman. A profound and unaffected piety characterizes him and pervades the home life of Mertoun House. We walked through the beautiful gardens about the house, investigated an old pigeon house dating back six hundred years, and an old chapel on the estate on whose outer wall still hung the chain devices used long since for punishing those who misbehaved in church. But more interesting than all were the storied pictures and tokens within the house. The dining room is hung with ancestral paintings covering several centuries back into the dim history where the family originated. A cabinet belonging to Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots, richly done in inlay work, and a little casket containing vari-colored silk threads with which Queen Mary worked, interested us.

The family name of Lord Polwarth is Scott. Sir Walter Scott, of the same family, is buried at Dryborough Abbey, not more than two miles from Mertoun House. This old abbey is almost an unrecognizable ruin, save for a buttressed corner or two and the tombs of the poet and his family. Mertoun House is redolent of the memory of Sir Walter. Here many of his poems were written. The reader who will look up his "Marmion" will find it dated at and descriptive of Mertoun House:

> "In these dear halls, where welcome kind,
> Is with fair liberty combined;
> Where cordial friendship gives the hand,
> And flies constraint the magic wand
> Of the fair dame that rules the land.
> Little we heed the tempest drear,
> While music, mirth, and social cheer,
> Speed on their wings the passing year.
> And Mertoun's halls are fair e'en now,
> When not a leaf is on the bough."

There was not a little emotion in our hearts as we retired with the information that our bed-chamber was often the guest-room of Scotland's greatest literary interpreter.

Our talks with these fine Christian people were most instructive. With complete American frankness we confessed our ignorance of any but the meagerest significance of nobility. And with equal frankness they modestly explained much to us. There was a keen rivalry of conversational leadership, they trying to lead us to talk about things American and we to induce them to tell us of their noble history and the changing social order in which the status of nobility is today undergoing modification. I found his lordship most frank in his expressions of regret at the course of the Lloyd George taxation principles. But instead of resentment I thought I discerned in his speech a tone of acquiescence in the inevitable.

They, on their part, were deeply interested in our American negro problem and the Laymen's Missionary Movement, of which much had been said in Great Britain and especially at the Edinburgh Conference. It is most difficult for our cousins across the sea to understand the negro question as it exists in our southland. The negro there is a novelty and not a little fascinating. Indeed, in London we saw negro men quite frequently on the streets and in the restaurants —and, almost without exception, always accompanied by white women, well dressed and apparently respectable. As for the Laymen's Movement, my heart was still warm with the enthusiasm kindled by the great Chicago Congress, and I found myself most happy in telling the interesting story to such eager inquirers.

On leaving Mertoun House and St. Boswell's we began our tour of the cathedral route, beginning with beautiful Melrose, thence to Durham, York, Lincoln and Ely. Of them all, Durham most impressed me and York most impressed Mrs. Morrison. The situation of Durham Cathedral was peculiarly suggestive. At the base of a noble hill, and three-quarters the distance around it, runs the river. Half way up is the castle, and at the top, capping all, is the cathedral. The symbolism of this situation cannot be overlooked by the most unheeding. The river represents man's commercial life, protected from above by the castle, and crowned at the top by the church. Here is the true place of religion—at the top of life. Only as life passes up from the self-regard of the commercial to the heroism of knightly self-giving and reaches the summit of worship is it full and complete. More than by the vast dignity of the cathedral itself was I impressed with this artistry of its situation.

In York it was the sheer artistry of the interior that charmed and awed us. Here we found the Gothic lines in perfection. Not as an ejaculation, but as a thoughtful description, one felt that no word would do but "sublime." There was an uplift about it which grew more and more conscious as one sat long under those arches. They pointed the soul to God.

We took a short excursion from the cathedral route to make a trip to the important manufacturing cities of Leeds and Bradford, going out to Ilkley, a suburb of the latter city, to pay a short visit to relatives of some dear Chicago friends. From Ely, a small village surrounding the old but less interesting cathedral, we went to Cambridge. What a fascinating exploration trip it is to hunt out these twenty-four colleges which, together, constitute the University! Walking up the streets one has no suggestion of the rich old stoned walls and halls lying back of the quaint shops. But no sooner does one enter upon the search than he passes from one surprise to another. Through an old gate one walks into a beautiful quadrangle, the walls of the surrounding buildings are thick with vines and in every window-ledge flowers are growing. Through this quadrangle one passes into another and another and out into the alluring vista of Trinity college grounds, through which runs the classic Cam.

I must not speak of college after college in the order of our exploration, but I cannot begin to tell of our stop in Cambridge without just saying that the chapel of King's College is the most exquisite piece of architecture our eyes beheld in all Great Britain. In lines as ultimate in Gothic perfection as York minister, but more delicate and subtle, the fan-vaulting of this ceiling seems impossible to human skill. We lingered here a long time, and worshipped without organ or sermon. It is not orthodox, but I must be truthful and admit that for beauty and variety and richness of architecture Cambridge fascinated me more than did Oxford, which we visited some weeks later. In neither place was school in session during our visit, so I am comparing the two only upon the side of their architecture and landscape attractiveness. As a place of residence, I think I would prefer Cambridge to Oxford.

We arrived in London on Saturday evening from Cambridge and felt at home as soon as we entered the city. London is so roomy and welcoming! That evening we took a 'bus ride and saw the town! I cannot get over wishing that we had 'busses in Chicago! They are such a joy. In the main part of London there is not a street car rail, but just those great motor 'busses with seats on the top. What impressed me most at the first glance of London was the omnipresence of the silk hat and the flamboyant advertising.

Next morning I preached at Hornsey Church, of which Rev. Leslie W. Morgan, English correspondent of The Christian Century, is pastor. This church was alive with its hope of a new house of worship, a goal toward which it had been working for a number of years. [Announcement of the corner-stone laying was made in these pages last week.] In the evening I visited the West London Tabernacle and preached there. At this service we met a number of Disciples from America, ministers and other church workers, who were gathering for the Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union which was to be convened July 4, the next day. The next chapter of this travel journal will be devoted to this interesting meeting.

Scientific Temperance

The temperance advocate is sometimes so earnest in his efforts to remove the evils of drink that he forgets that there are causes which must be understood and removed before the habits of men can be changed. He is keenly aware of the effects of drinking intoxicating liquors. It seems to him that any man ought to have sense enough to leave off a bad habit as soon as its badness has once been pointed out. But men keep on drinking, and new generations learn to drink in spite of the solemn warnings of the wise. If we still believed in the doctrine of total depravity, an easy explanation of continuance in wrong-doing would be at hand. The sin of the drink habit is not to be minimized, but we can never cure the world of this particular sin by denouncing it.

It must be recognized that many persons do not see any harm in the habit of using intoxicating drinks. They have been taught that such drinks are necessary to health and happiness. That this teaching is wrong may be perfectly evident to one who has the facts and is able to appreciate their meaning, but a man is not easily convinced that the customs and sentiments of his ancestors are not good for him and his children. A long process of education is needed before some of our citizens will be able to feel the force of the arguments in favor of abstinence and prohibition. They are sincere in denouncing us as fanatics when we attempt to close the saloons. While we do not have to accept their view of our attacks on the saloon, we do have to reckon with their sentiments.

We have had it drilled into us that we must learn well the trade or profession we choose as our life work. Very little has been said of the way in which we are to enjoy ourselves after we have done our work. It is just as important to learn how to play as it is to learn how to work. If a man knows how to enjoy himself in a manner that befits a human being, you can say to him, if he gets drunk, that he is a fool and he will agree with you. But if he does not know what wholesome amusement is, if he is left to follow the desire of the moment, he is in danger of seeking enjoyment in the gratification of his lower appetites. The educated man is interested in nature and in the higher activities of man. He can always find something to delight him. When the state educates all its citizens with a view to fitting them to enjoy to the full each day, the drink problem will not be so difficult to solve as it now is.

Overwork causes men to seek relief in the glass of beer or whiskey. It makes no difference whether the overwork is due to the greed of the worker or of his employer, when one is physically exhausted he becomes an easy victim of the elemental appetites. A glass of beer then appeals to the man more strongly than sentiments of patriotism and religion. He cannot remember vividly the high obligations he owes to his family. A lecture on temperance is a waste of words. Of course he is made worse physically by drink. He does not look to the future. This means that society is under obligation to see that no man is overworked. The obligation goes further; children must receive such care that they will grow into men and women with strength of body and mind sufficient for the work society has a right to demand of them.

A low estimate of life enables one to drink without shame. The higher the estimate we place upon intelligence and virtue, the stronger will be our opposition to any habit that undermines the health of body or mind. The incongruity between the drink habit and the life of the spirit does not yet appear to be seen by all who have a good degree of intellectual power and virtue; we may confidently believe that honest facing of the facts will at last convince thinking people that a drink which intoxicates is an enemy of civilization. The religion of Jesus, since it teaches us to think well of ourselves, is the great foe of the drink evil. We are the companions and co-workers of God. This is a fact of which science has to take account. Our business as Christians is to use all the means at our command to give to all men the conceptions of value which are distinctly Christian. We often preach in vain against the saloon because those whom we address do not have the Christian view of what it is to live. They have not the inspiration which comes from the vision of the kingdom of God.

Midweek Service, September 28. Dan. 1:8-20.

Editorial Table Talk

Centennial of Oldest Congregation

An everyway notable event will be the centennial celebration of the oldest congregation of Disciples of Christ in existence, the First Church of New York City, to take place October 2-9, inclusive. The week between these two Sundays is filled with services. The program sets forth the names of Doctors B. B. Tyler, E. L. Powell, J. H. Garrison and H. L. Willett, and President M. L. Bates, as speakers at various services. Those informed on the early history of the Disciples will recall that this church had independent existence on the same lines as those along which the Campbells were teaching, and that as a result of Alexander Campbell's visit to them they became attached to the Christian union movement of which he was the leader. In the celebration of their anniversary The Christian Century joins heartily.

A Newspaper's Duty to Earnest Men

Now and then a reader of The Christian Century sends the editors a message which strikes through the mind like a shaft of light, revealing the purpose of true journalism and encouraging us to continue the pursuit of the highest ideals. Such a message is before us. It comes from a veteran preacher, himself a sufferer on behalf of the truth as God has given him to see it. He cries out against what he believes to be the mercenariness of motive which underlies so much of Disciple journalism and organization. And without any apparent consciousness that he is formulating a pregnant epigram he adds, "I hope The Christian Century will not fear to hit hard enough to make earnest men feel good." That states the ideal of a decent newspaper. Such a newspaper strikes at cant and commercialism in church and society not so much to make time-serving leaders feel bad as to hearten earnest men, to make them feel like being brave in their utterances of the truth that is in them and to give them hope in the ultimate success of the righteous cause.

A Good Paper to Be Made Better

We venture the statement that no religious paper published in America is read by religious editors with more avidity than The Interior, the Presbyterian weekly printed in Chicago. For wielding his way straight into the heart of a subject and splitting it wide open Mr. Nolan R. Best, the editor of The Interior, is without a superior in the craft. His paper always says something. Devoid of cant, it grips reality in every editorial utterance. The deadly conventionalism that lies like a pall over most religious papers is conspicuously absent from The Interior. It is alive. It holds a point of view above academic and sectarian prejudices, and translates the truth of all schools into terms of life such that no one would think of contradicting it. Having spoken this word of appreciation our readers will know without our saying what significance is to be attached to the announcement that The Interior has purchased The Westminster of Philadelphia and will hereafter be published as The Continent. It is the purpose of the publishers and editors to make it "a national Presbyterian journal to serve the kingdom of God." One of the causes the new paper will serve, we predict, even more valiantly than did The Interior is that of Christian union, a theme on which its editor has clear-cut convictions for which he contends with arguments of exceptional lucidity and power. The Christian Century bids Messrs. Best and Williamson godspeed in editing The Continent.

Must Have Misunderstood

Dr. J. H. Garrison would be the last man in the world to intentionally misrepresent the views of another, but there is an editorial from his pen in the Christian-Evangelist of September 1, the direct implication of which seems to us to do injustice to Rev. T. E. Ruth, the Baptist preacher who spoke at the London Anglo-American Conference on Christian union last summer. Dr. Garrison is reporting a conversation with Mr. Ruth on the subjects of church membership, baptism, etc. In stating Mr. Ruth's position he says the latter "argued that the Disciples were inconsistent with their plea for Christian union in insisting on restoring the original New Testament baptism, which he believed to be immersion." Over against this position Dr. Garrison tells us that he argued that the Disciples

"would not be justified in changing the form and, therefore, the symbolic significance and testimony of a divine institution for the sake of healing such division, that in attempting to do so we would go contrary to the conscientious convictions of millions of loyal believers and would create division thereby, instead of promoting unity." At the close of the conversation Mr. Ruth "did not acknowledge any change of opinion," says Dr. Garrison. The editor of The Christian Century also had a talk about this subject with Mr. Ruth and found him clear as a bell in his conviction that immersion only is the proper form of baptism. No faintest suggestion of willingness to change the form from that practiced in apostolic times did we discern in him, but quite the contrary. Dr. Garrison must have misunderstood him.

The Peril of Complacency

How far this Disciple movement for Christian union, inaugurated a century ago, has settled down to a sectarian satisfaction with itself is revealed in a statement made by one of the brotherhood's most influential leaders who said recently in a published article that "it would be far better that those conscientiously practicing affusion, and infant baptism, should form congregations of their own, while those adhering to the primitive practice of believers' baptism should form local churches, composed of such believers alone, that they might give their united testimony to what they believed to be a divine institution; and that by thus respecting each other's conscientious convictions, and meanwhile co-operating in every possible way for the advancement of the kingdom of God, they would come to a unity of understanding concerning the will of Christ, and realize the complete unity for which he prayed, much sooner than by compromises which would violate honest convictions of truth." This utterance is the denial of the fundamental principle for the promulgation of which the Disciples were called into existence. Their fundamental thesis is that to continue the division among God's people is not only wrong but unnecessary. Christian union is not a goal which must be postponed into the distant future until all Christians agree in their understanding of the Bible. It is a present duty. That so representative a Disciple could tolerate complacently the segregation or sectarian picture described in the words quoted above is startling, when one thinks into its significance. Technically, of course, the quotation is a truism, because of the phrase "compromises which would violate honest convictions of truth" put on to describe the alternative. But of course no one is urging union on a compromise of conscience. And the essential gospel of the Disciples, the "good news" we were commissioned to tell the Christian world is that Christian union is possible now, over a large portion of the divided church of Christ, without any compromise of convictions. Complacency with the sectarian order of things is the subtlest and deadliest peril against which Disciples of Christ must be evermore on their guard.

Numbering Chicago's Israel

Chicago is to have a religious census taken of all its population. It is to be done in a single afternoon, by volunteer workers enlisted from the churches and going out two by two. The districts covered by these workers will be very small, of course, and the company of workers very large. Into vicious districts only mature persons will be sent. The young peoples' societies will be given charge of the respectable districts and the foreign-speaking sections will be canvassed by people of the nationality most prevalent in a given territory. The immediate occasion of this census-taking is the opening of a city-wide evangelistic campaign by Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and his associates. The date of the census is October 8, on Saturday, and Dr. Chapman's meetings simultaneous in thirty neighborhoods of the city, begins the next day. The Laymen's Evangelistic Council of Chicago and the International Sunday-School Association are jointly behind the undertaking. The data will be decidedly simpler than the government collected—only name, residence, age, church-membership or church preference, and relation to the Sunday-school for each person. But if even so much is accomplished among the two million and a quarter of Chicago's population we may expect the taking of religious censuses in other cities to be taken up with a determined purpose to secure this data in every city in the country. The leader of the enterprise is Mr. J. Shreve Durham, head of the department of visitation in the Sunday-school headquarter's office. He has had unexpected success in finding interested and competent workers for the foreign sections. When the blanks are filled and returned to headquarters, the more tedious task of collating the information recorded on them will be pushed through as rapidly as possible. In due course the name of every person in the city will be sent to the clergyman or other representative of the religion with which he has indicated his sympathy. Protestants, Catholics, both Roman and Greek, Jews, spiritualists, theosophists and the adherents of every other cult, civilized or uncivilized, will be treated exactly alike in this manner. It is the belief of those concerned that this process will put into the hands of every Protestant pastor at least twice as many names as he has now on his church roll or pastoral record. In case of persons who express no religious preference the names will be sent impartially to all clergymen of all faiths within a certain radius of the addresses where such persons are found.

Ministering to College Students

The problem of how to conserve the religious life of the young people who attend the state university has been for a long time one of moment among all religious workers. The fact that serious effort is being made by practically all religious bodies to find a plan by which the spiritual life of future leaders may be carefully conserved while being trained in the state school is one of the significant phases of the modern educational world.

Without doubt one of the important actions of the Illinois State convention last week was that inaugurated by the state board in providing plans by which boys and girls who go up to the University of Illinois from the homes of the Disciples of Christ may have specific aid in meeting the spiritual crisis in student life. A committee of the board consisting of O. W. Lawrence, F. W. Burnham and J. W. Walters, had been appointed in May to investigate the need of such work and report at the time of the Springfield convention. After visiting the State University and acquainting themselves with the need, and with the various plans by which several of the churches are seeking to meet the need, the committee submitted a recommendation that the I. C. M. S. provide two student workers, a young man and young woman, to devote one-half time to specific pastoral work among the students. The status of these workers will be that of associates to the pastor of University Place Church of Christ and their sole business will be to seek to so hold the young men and women from our churches and church homes to the Christian life and service that when the college days are done they may be returned to the church and home, not only with spiritual life unimpaired, but as carefully trained for usefulness in the church as for service in the profession for which preparation has been made.

The Disciples of Christ have approximately 300 young people attending the State University of Illinois, either members of the church or more or less directly associated with the homes of Disciples. The local church, under the leadership of Rev. S. E. Fisher, the pastor, to better meet the student problem and to provide for its growing life, is rebuilding its plant this summer. The new University Place church will be more than double its present capacity. Thirty rooms for Bible classes and social purposes are being provided. The energies of the local church, and the special workers, will be centered in efforts to bring the young people into the Sunday morning Bible classes. There will be seven courses of Bible study offered for students in connection with the regular Sunday-school work. These classes will be led by strong Christian men from the faculty or students from the graduate school. The Presbyterians of Illinois employ a student pastor at the university at a salary of $2,500. Other denominations are expecting to build student churches and supply student pastors. The plan proposed by our state board is not an experiment, having been tried in neighboring states with excellent results, notably at Ames, in Iowa.

Humanity Is One

Humanity is one; no weakest brother
Can fail or falter, sin or suffer woe,
But that the suffering reacheth every other
And all the world with him doth fainter grow.

Humanity is one; who thinks to conquer
By crushing down a weaker in the way,
Knows not that in his own unreasoning rancour
He beateth down the steps that lead to day.

Humanity is one: there is no heaven
If one unholy lingers far apart;
It worketh in their bliss as evil leaven
That taints at last the universal heart.

Humanity is one: thou that o'ercomest,
O thou be strong for those who are but weak;
So shall a thousand triumph where thou winnest
And many find what few know how to seek.

Social Survey

BY ALVA W. TAYLOR

The Irish Priest

Catholics boast that Ireland is the most faithful of all the lands that render homage to Rome. At Montreal a few days ago the renowned and prophetic Father Vaughan, of London, commented upon this fact. Father Vaughan is a fiery preacher of civic and social righteousness and has made his pulpit famous by his prophetic denunciation of the modern social sins. He attributed Ireland's great religious devotion to faithful attendance upon the sacraments. He illustrates the hold the Roman system has upon its devotees in this priestly commendation of the ceremonial as a means of religious devotion. One would expect to hear a prophetic voice like his speaking out on the marked derelictions of the Irish church in its relations to the social problems that have made that island a forsaken land.

We found the characteristic Irish priest a very sunny-tempered, genial, pleasant fellow. He feels keenly his country's troubles and will labor diligently for amelioration in all ways that the church will allow. But he is devoted to the church and apparently finds no contradiction between the ecclesiastical and ceremonial demands of the hierarchy and the enlightened demands of modern social endeavor. To one interested in modern welfare movements, he himself appears a contradiction. It is difficult to harmonize in the same man a devotion to the mass as a means of grace, the confessional as a means of absolution, merit through acts of penance, the pomp and parade of ecclesiastical forms as acts of religion, absolute compliance with the demands of an "infallible" curia and prayers for souls in purgatory, with another devotion for fellow help as the demands of a good conscience and a fulfillment of the Kingdom of God. He will do all he can personally for the landlord's victim, but bow meekly when the ecclesiastical authorities demand compliance with the rule of the vested interests that make that same tenant a victim. The local priest has ever been the friend of the men of his parish, but he has raised no protest because the cardinals have commanded meek compliance with the demands of the landlords. There is a contradiction between his service of the people about him on the one hand and his service to the powers above him on the other, just as there has been a contradiction between his administration of sacramentarianism as a means of salvation on the one hand and the application of his energies, between masses, to those real means of salvation that are summed up in fellow-help.

The Man and the System

Of course there are Irish priests who are simply servants of the system. They say their masses, shrive the poor superstitious souls that come with their dole to ask it, perform the ceremonies of the church at birth, marriage and death and spend the remainder of their lives with pipe and bottle and those sports and recreations that go with them. But to characterize the Irish priesthood by a description of these would be a libel. He is more often a true father to his people than a mere ecclesiastical machine. He does not draw them up to that refined personal plane of living that our Protestant ministry sets as an ideal for our people, but he is devoted to their purity of life in matters of chastity and to neighborhood honesty. We listened to a sermon at Kenmare that was rudely but incisively put and that dealt with matters of shop and trade morals in a manner that could leave no doubt of what the priest meant. He did not give an abstract ethical homily, he all but said "thou art the man" as he spoke of the petty means of gain resorted to by his people in buying and selling and all he said could be as well said in any country town on this side of the water. It was not rhetoric, it was real preaching.

If there is a local committee to distribute the fund for helping to improve peasant cottages the priest will be found at the head of it. His is a paternalistic function and right well does he perform it. One parish priest showed us the cottages all over the hillside where he had made grants-in-aid from that fund and turned the old cabins into habitable cottages, but he mournfully shook his head as we asked him about what he had been able to do for a neighboring estate where the tenantry had not yet purchased their holdings. If there is a local contest over an office holder or a member of Parliament he will take an active part in the campaign and even announce his judgment upon the candidates from the pulpit. Of course his judgment is always in favor of the Catholic candidate and after that for the one who seems to him most favorable to the people of his parish. He will be found walking over the little farms advising his people how to use the latest discoveries for the improvement of their crops and urging them to economy and business methods in conserving what they make. He is the friend of sanitation, in so far as he has knowledge, and urges his people to "clean up," though of course it is an uphill fight to get much done in the surroundings in which they are compelled to live. He may not be as up-to-date in any of these matters as a modern American would be, but he is at least somewhere a little ahead and urges to the better if not to the best. He serves humanity locally and is a prominent member of all humanitarian societies that have to do with his neighborhood, but he serves Rome first and if Rome had said "be docile" when the Tories ruled, he was docile and proclaimed them "rulers appointed of God;" if Rome forbade national organization that promised economic freedom he at least refused to forward its cause among his people; if all the world said that education was the panacea for social ills and Rome said educate in parochial schools and thus preserve the creed, he preferred the poor instruction of a poverty-stricken church school to the competent instruction which governmental schools might have given.

Home Rule and Rome Rule

The fear that Home Rule meant "Rome Rule" has kept many a liberty-loving Englishman from supporting Liberal efforts for Ireland's liberation. Pat's devotion to Catholicism and Rome's historic determination to dominate in affairs of state, have made his position seem logical to a multitude that regretted the stain which Ireland's woes put on Britain's fair escutcheon. The economic liberation from the landlord has parted fear of the bishop from the desire to help the peasant and all democratic Englishmen have welcomed the routing of the landlords. The Orangemen of Ireland have been especially bitter in their fight upon Home Rule. They are Irish Protestants and the close conflict between the political ideals of Presbyterianism and Romanism have been the cause of many a riot and have delayed Irish local government for at least a generation.

But the power of the priest is on the wane in affairs political. More than one Catholic journalist told us that the time was gone when the parish priest could control the parish vote and pointed us example after example where the man the priest commended was defeated by the men who would follow him devotedly in religious matters. Once the priest would say on the Sunday before an election, "My dearly beloved brethren, I hope that on next Tuesday you will vote as a man for the Hon. Blank," and that settled the count for that parish. Today the political leader is dividing the honors of leadership with the Father and the political societies are seeking to free themselves from ecclesiastical domination without at the same time inviting the hostility of the priest. The most enlightened of the priests have read enough history to accept the inevitable.

Progress in Home Rule

Today, Ireland has effective local self-government and it has worked very well. The officials in south Ireland are Catholic, but the discrimination against Protestants that was so much dreaded is not found. Protestants do most of the business in a large way and exert a power out of all proportion to that exerted by Catholics in the northern part of the island where Protestants dominate. John Redmond never loses a chance to advocate the election of a Protestant to Parliament as a member of the Nationalist party because he desires to divorce the political from the ecclesiastical and unite all Irishmen for Home Rule.

The Irish church will have to meet tomorrow's issues on the plane of enlightenment instead of with the old superstitious phrase, "It is God's will, sir." No more debilitating theological teaching can be imagined than that one hears everywhere among the older people of Erin, when questioned about their poverty and their national difficulties. The inevitable answer is that "it is God's will, sir," with a confused after-explanation that somehow the Protestants have been to blame. It made the last generation of Irishmen fatalistic. If it was God's will, then there was nothing to do. The church was God's means for all good and to it must he look for direction, even when he was given the ballot. If the church was not infallible and all that she permitted "God's will," then she would be shorn of her power and dominance and she has much to answer for in accounting for the docility of the people under oppression of the lords and their superstitious ignorance in this day of enlightenment.

The Task of Religion

A Study of Peculiar Pacific Coast Problems

BY REV. J. R. PERKINS.

In this nation, aside from one or two of its largest cities, the greatest task of religion is on the Pacific coast. And it is something more than a theory which says that the North-Pacific and the South-Pacific sections are easier to conquer and hold than the Mid-Pacific. The church is strong in that portion of the west with Los Angeles as the centre for the same reason that it is strong in Missouri, Illinois, and Ohio. The Puritan and the Cavalier have made their homes south on the Pacific coast. They are the very highest types of Eastern, Southern, and Mississippi Valley churchmen. This is perhaps just as true in that section with Portland as a centre. But coming to that portion of the west with San Francisco as a centre we note a radical difference. Here is a distinctive type—the child of multitudinous types. Here are men of all nations and they influence all the Mid-Pacific section.

Uniqueness of Pacific Civilization.

Here we have one of the most unique civilizations in the annals of the race—unique in manners, morals, ideals, ambition, art, literature, government, and institutions. Can it be baptized? Can it be Christed? Yes. But between the mere declaration and its realization is a great gulf.

First, the church must set itself to an interpretation of this people. It will not do for one moment to ignore conditions and insist on authority. An interpretation of the peculiar life of this coast is more vital to the success of the church than the interpretation of certain Scriptures we often stress. And at the outset we must understand that the civilization now in making can do but little to remedy outward conditions. The people are subject to a law that has governed society from the beginning—the law of alteration. This Pacific civilization is not destroying laws, manners, customs and institutions—it is simply changing them. This is but the history of all progress. An old society always bequeaths certain ideals and institutions to a new civilization with the solemn admonition to keep them inviolate, but the new society immediately discards what is not vital to its life. It always alters its inheritance, but is accused of destroying.

Change Must Not Destroy.

In things religious alteration must not be called destruction. Here, alteration means simply a change in emphasis. There is a retention of the old, but it is not to the fore. Hence, even this seeming impossible Pacific society can be won and held for the church, and the big, virile Westerner will make as good a Disciple as John Smith, of Podunk, Mo., but you will never get him to place the emphasis where John Smith places it. For what is vital to the one among pumpkins and gourds is hardly vital to the other on Market street. And right here is the danger that we may not take cognizance of this difference—that we may not be frank enough to confess it, and attempt to push the church to power, to success, just as it is done in communities where symbols and dogmas have precedence over working principles. Yes, it is entirely within our power even on this coast to deceive ourselves, whoop and hurrah, and blow our horns. A brass band is always followed—a block at least. True, we can build up a certain sort of institutionalism, substituting such for a vital message. But at heart this is dead, and in the final test is to religion what the dime novel is to literature. Gallery play is always spectacular, but hardly permanent. A church has no strong message until it outgrows its button, badge, and banner stage.

Our Century Parallel to the First.

One of the most interesting, and yet, one of the most lamentable facts is this: This new civilization that the church must either fight or fit into is very much like the one the young church faced in the first century of our era. Paul affirmed that to the new society Jesus would be unchanging. Its need would be Christ. It is simple Christian history that the young church did grow into the life of the new Empire, and exploited, eventually, rather than opposed philosophy and the new learning. And the church followed this course in Europe centuries later in the Renaissance, the Reformation, and the Revolution. These three were the great altering processes, and finally the church came to understand each.

Once more religion has come up to a crisis. Myopic optimism must not be allowed to treat grave matters flippantly. We must not attempt to beg the question by crying, provincially, "Preach the Old Jerusalem Gospel." We all understand this well enough and are agreed. Our problem is perhaps the most serious of all, for this unique civilization from its material, if not from its moral side, is hardly better than that which the young church faced. We are greater than the Romans in everything, including our sins. Careful historians have pointed out that Roman society was neither as magnificient nor as evil as we have supposed. The Romans were not the drunkards that we are. They had few wines—this, too, despite the Latin poet's rhapsodies over Bacchus. Present day narcotics were unknown to them. To tea, coffee, and tobacco they were strangers, while they never used cheap liquors in the guise of patent medicines. Modern life in its hysterical rush is kept up by dope. The Romans were not dopesters.

The Evil of Extravagance.

We face another difficulty, too, which the church of the first century did not have to contend with in so serious form—the evil of extravagance. Think of this! The supposedly rich public banquets were really tame affairs. We spend more today at one banquet to boom missions than was spent at a Roman state banquet when a province changed procurators. Our modern women are far more lavish in expenditure than Roman matrons. It is said that there was a law in Rome forbidding a woman to wear a silk dress made to display the charms of her form. And this in that lewd Rome, too!

In contrast with all this, note our modern sins of intemperance, public dishonesty, low political ideals; our indifference to human life ground out in mills, mines, factories; stifled out in sweatshops, glue, cotton, glass, and shoe factories. Note our cynicism and ultra-materialism; our white slave traffic—one that the Romans did more to control than we are doing; and all these combine to make the task of religion in the twentieth century greater than its task in the first.

Hopeful Signs of the Times.

Yet, there is no reason for pessimism if we discern the signs of the times. Religion is vital, dynamic; Jesus can fit into each age and generation. Our task is to fit Him. But signs are not wanting that we are misinterpreting our own day just as the old Roman moralists did. They were hopelessly pessimistic concerning their times. Their life was neither as hopeless nor as sinful as they believed. They mistook alteration for corruption. Anyhow, if what they termed vice and sin were as evil as they depicted, then the society of this Pacific coast is mired deep in iniquity. We have all they had and more. At least our avarice, corruption, luxury, and ambition are greater and indulged in by a far greater proportion of the people. But it is significant to note that Rome's moral decline began when she grew rich, laying tribute on conquered peoples. When her adventurous citizens went far in search for gold, silver, and precious stones that would bring ease and comfort, then did austere virtues seem as nothing. How exactly are we repeating this in our national life.

But it is most difficult to see just how much of this is real and necessary progress and alteration, and how much is corruption and unrighteousness. The church in a new country is apt to enter upon a tirade against wealth, the mild pleasures of the people, and achievement. Upon the other hand there is danger that the church will place itself in concord with sin just because it is powerful, and condone an unholy society in order to partake of its strength. Western Catholicism has not always been too careful at this point, and some Protestantism.

Church Must Protest Against Society.

There is a point where national progress on this coast has become corruption, and there the church should halt and protest. We should advance with government, law, politics, art, literature, and institutions, but we must not degenerate with them. When politics degenerates into craftiness; when business must be built on the bodies of prostitutes and sustained by pugilism and the saloon; when art lowers its tone and flaunts sensualness in institutes, the home, and the school; and when literature becomes a gutter-snipe and boils the salacious indiscretions of hotel and club loungers, then the church should rise and thunder.

Moreover, the task of religion on this coast as no where else is to protest against the sons of a new civilization absolutely ignoring the principles of morality and justice on which are based the greatness and glory of older states. In a new society the gravest danger is a total disregard for the past on the part of the weaker elements of that new order. The sober thought of centuries is being discarded. The old masters in every realm, including religion, are being sneered at. Authority is as nothing—whether in government, law and order, morals and religion. A new society revels in its liberty leagues and prides itself on being Bohemian, which, moaernly interpreted, is being nasty. The weaker elements under new conditions always relax in discipline. There is social and ethical confusion. The society in making is characterized by two extremes—the very rich and the very poor. Hence, the corners are crowded with agitators, new faiths abound, there is envy and hatred—multitudinous philosophies and creeds.

The Curse of Dogmatic Religion.

And to make the task of the church all the greater, a new society is quite often cursed by dogmatic religion. Hence, very early do the people receive erroneous conceptions of the church and of religion itself. In the formative period of a new order, if the church has been legalistic, dull, soulless, and unhelpful, when that civilization flowers and society becomes settled, the church will have a most difficult time. But if through all those years of labor and suffering the church has been sympathetic and has entered into the struggles of men, they will not be apt to forget it when a fixed condition comes, bringing ease and plenty. Wise indeed has Catholicism been on the Pacific despite the fact that it has not always voiced reforms as Protestantism has believed it should.

It requires the wisdom of the gods to face the West with the message of the cross. Here indeed is the statement of Paul as to the unchanging Christ being put to severe test. And if He is to be really the same yesterday, today, and forever to our complex, yet changing, social order, it will be because the church and the ministry have rightly interpreted both Scripture and life—that which Scripture is but the expression of.

Camp-Fires of the New Testament

An After-Vacation Sermon

BY REV. J. M. DEAN.

Christianity is an open air religion. It was quite two hundred years after the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ that the first church building was erected for a Christian congregation. Prior to this event no small part of the services of the Christians were held in the open—many of them upon the beaches and in the hills.

Christianity is a breezy, unashamed, open-hearted message. It harmonizes with the chant of the breakers, the free sweep of the wind and the informality and simplicity of the camp. Its essence has been undisturbed and sometimes even enhanced by the chemistry of "the watch fires of a hundred circling camps."

Out of Door Saints.

We link the name of Abraham with the star-powdered night sky. We think of Adam amidst fruit and foliage. We follow Moses through a majestic landscape of gray mountain ranges. We go out into a wilderness to focus our minds upon the prophets. John the Baptist has for a sounding board the rolling hills of Judea. Paul fits into the commercial trails of both land and ocean. John the beloved receives his revelation while on the thundering beach of Patmos. Our Saviour, driven from the synagogues, finds his refuge in olive-gardens, mountain-ravines and wheat-fields.

It behooves the Christian church to Christianize the groves, the beaches, the untempled hills of America. The New Testament is easiest read and best understood when a free wind moves its pages and the student can raise his eyes from the text to the context of nature.

To the thousands who camp along the beaches of the Pacific, from Sitka to San Diego, I commend the study of the Camp Fires of the New Testament. There are numerous camp fires in the Old Testament, but let us this evening meditate upon three ot those contained in the New.

Three Camp-fires.

Observe, first the Camp-fire of Denial. It is the fire at which Peter tries to warm himself while awaiting the reappearance of the arrested Jesus. Notice that he tries to warm himself. He does not succeed. There was a cold cowardice about the heart of the apostle that made him shiver in the very blaze of the coals. We have all had the experience of being so cold that coming to a fire gave us a veritable ague. He had ice about his heart. He had spent all his warmth in protestations, and now had no reserve to call out to sustain himself.

And so he shivered with his inner chill, and shortly began a denial of his Master in which his cold lips quivered and his teeth chattered out incoherent sentences.

Let the fire-light play upon that pitiable denial of the Ghostly Hour. It is no isolated thing. Many a Pacific coast camp has witnessed the same scene, and the light from its blazing fir and live-oak has given merciless portraits of cowed Christians, ringed about with worldlings.

In a moment comes the re-appearing face of Christ. He looks upon Peter, and Peter is warm at last, warm with hot shame and burning recollections.

Fishermen by the Fire.

The second of these fires is the Camp-fire of Confession.

It is the scene on the Lake of Galilee, on one of those forty resurrection dawns. Oh, how glorious the opalescent lights of the sunrise as they play about the gleaming red charcoals of the breakfast fire!

Only "camper-Christians" can read with understanding the final chapter of John's Gospel!

Fish for hard workingmen who have toiled all night!

One hundred and fifty-three more fish in a silvery shimmer upon the beach to remind the guests of their vocation—fishers of men!

Best of all, a quiet, matter-of-fact intimate, dignified, holy host, making the morning meal a sacrament.

Then comes the little aside with Peter. A walk along the beach and three blest chances to confess his glowing love. Was he not conscious that each "I love you" erased the bitterness of one of those three miserable denials of the camp-fire in the high priest's palace?

At His Fire.

Ah, how much better to be a guest at the Saviour's fire of love than an interloper at Satan's festive warmth of pleasure. Yea, passion of sin heats the spirit and causes the cheek to burn with hectic color. But a tryst with Christ lights healthier fires deep within the soul. "Thou knowest that I love thee, Lord," is the climacteric sentence of a grace-given expiation.

Beloved, let us go back from our fires and our fishing this summer with a glow of fervor in our hearts, able to say, as October and November and December bring back the memories of August, "It was the Lord!"

A Shipwrecked Crew.

The final fire of which I wish to speak is the Camp-fire of Helpfulness. It is very early in the morning this time. A great crowd of miserable wet people are clustered on a rainy, windy shore. In the offing a big hulk is rapidly breaking to pieces. Now a fire blazes up, and a sturdy little man with a Jewish profile bends over the fire with his quota of sticks. It is Paul at Melita. He is the hero of a terrible voyage. Men whisper that the lives of all are owing to him. But his achievement has not made him complacent. He has just saved hundreds of lives. Now he quietly hunts out a few precious scattered pieces of wreckage and cheerfully aids in drying out the forlorn company.

Has he no dignity? Fancy some of our religious leaders, piloting our denominational affairs through the breakers of financial and doctrinal disaster—fancy them condescending to pick up the little sticks of self-forgetful, modest hospitalities! Let the janitor do it, forsooth! Or the young brother from the Little Church Around the Corner. It is not for the great heroes of the church to pick up sticks!

Willing to Do Anything.

Beloved, let no man dare to call himself a believer in Pauline doctrine who is not willing to do anything at hand that will mitigate even the mere physical hardships of the needy. How many shiver for the little kindnesses! When God hath used us to save their souls, let us not fail to see to their comfort with the modest helpfulness of Paul!

Paul, I would not be afraid of going camping with you. How well we get to know people when we have "beached" with them! There are many sticks to be cut and carried in the pilgrim camps of life. In Christ's name and in Christ's spirit let us not fail to add our share to the common comfort and cheer as we march on into the multiplied lights of that city whose blazing glories shall extinguish the candle, the stars and the sun.

First Baptist Church,
San Jose, Calif.

—President Taft has had some bad luck and made some bad selections for cabinet but he seems to have been exceedingly fortunate in his selection of a private secretary, Mr. Norton. "Personally," says the New York Post, "the secretary is a marvel of popularity. They say that everybody in Washington likes him. He is good to look at, with a clear-cut boyish face, ruddy complexion, six feet of height and the ease of carriage of a man in fine physical shape. Though by no means a dandy, he always seems well groomed. He is the sort of man who steps off a train after days of travel without a spot on his linen or a crease visible in his coat. His clothes, without evidencing special care, hang better than most men's—he is put together so well that they just cannot help it, to use the expression of one observer."

The Book World

THE TEACHING OF JESUS ABOUT THE THE FUTURE, by Henry Burton Sharman. This book is one of the most critical and systematic studies of the subject that has appeared in English. The author conceives the subject broadly as including such themes as: The Destruction of Jerusalem, The Day of Judgment, Life After Death, The Kingdom of God, and The Church and its Institutions. In fact it was "the purpose and endeavor to bring under examination every utterance credited to Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels which contains teaching about the 'Future' which is defined as "the time subsequent to the final severance of relations between Jesus and his Disciples."

The author, first of all, recognizes the dependence of exegesis upon textual and higher criticism, and devotes the first hundred pages to a critical analysis of the documents, which involves the much discussed and perplexing "Synoptic Problem." The author adopts the solution of this problem proposed by Prof, Burton, one of his teachers, in a treatise which appeared in 1904. The text of the Synoptic Gospels is resolved into various original documents designated by capital letters such as M, MK, G, P, etc., with reference to their order of dependence and priority, thus reminding one of the documentary analysis of the Pentateuch. In fact the resemblances in the composition of the first group of Old Testament books, and the first group of the New Testament, are more than superficial.

The book makes rather difficult reading because of the constant use of this critical apparatus and constant reference to its critical pre-suppositions. It is a book for critical specialists, and not for the general reader; yet it is a clearly written and an entirely intelligible treatise if one has the time and interest to study it. (University of Chicago Press. Pp. 372. $2.50.)

THE CONQUEST OF CONSUMPTION, by Dr. Wood Hutchinson, is a volume which is sure of being read, and as it is read it will help in the cause named in its title. The author takes a most hopeful view of the possibilities of the war upon the tubercular germ, which the author thus describes: "To hear the fearsome character given to the Tubercule-bacillus, and to listen to the tale of his atrocities and terrors, one would think that he was a devouring dragon with horns and teeth, at least eighty feet long; instead of which he is meek, inoffensive-looking little vegetable, without a tooth in his head, or a sting in his tail, and so tiny that you have to magnify three hundred times and paint him red before he is even visible to the naked eye. He is about the shape of a caraway seed, and innocent of legs or arms, not to mention wings, fins, or other means of moving himself about. It is doubtful if he can even wriggle-fact, alone and unaided he is unable of moving himself the tiniest fraction of an inch, but can only go where he is carried or blown. Moral—don't be his donkey and carry him." This quotation indicates the popular style of the book, which is at the same time thoroughly accurate from the scientific point of view. There is not a dull page in the book. It's general reading will help immensely to educate the people to take advantage of the things which the science of bacteriology has discovered regarding the cure and prevention of the great white plague. The truths presented are a gospel of hope to those who fear this disease as scarcely any other enemy of our life. (Houghton, Mifflin Co., New York, $1.00, net.)

THE STORY OF PAUL OF TARSUS, by Atkinson, Constructive Bible Studies series. The author, Louise Warren Atkinson, is a teacher in the Sunday-school of the Second Congregational Church, Rockford, Ill., and has worked out this system of lessons for use in teaching a class of boys of the eighth grade. The author possesses a thorough knowledge of the life of Paul and of the world of his day, a clear understanding of the principles of teaching, and what is equally important, a sympathy with the boy. The series of lessons have been tested by four years practical use in this and other Sunday-schools. The course is for ten months' study, and is intended to be used between Gates Life of Jesus and Soares Heroes of Israel, though it may be used after the latter. With the text book for the teacher is the students note book, with a well chosen series of pictures, and provision for written work. The book does not attempt to present the letters of Paul, but to tell the story of his wonderful life, which is well suited to the interests and needs of boys at the beginning of the hero period. It will form a welcome help to teachers of the restless boy. (University of Chicago Press, $1.00, net.)

RESPONSIBILITY FOR CRIME, an investigation of the nature and causes of crime and a means of its prevention, by Philip A. Parsons, Ph. D. This interesting and well written treatise is published in the Columbia University studies in history, economics and public law. There are chapters treating of the criminal classes, punishment, heredity and environment, theoretical in construction, while the author treats critically, chapter by chapter, the death penalty, the prison system, the jury, justice and restitution, and propagation. The present indiscrimination in dealing with criminals, both before and after conviction is condemned. The remedy sought for is to be found in segregation, the criminal paying the state for his keep, as well as providing recompense for the damages resulting from his crime. Education and enlightenment are necessary for any very general improvement in present conditions. The book is admirably written and while quotations from authorities are frequent yet they serve to hold the popular vein in which the subject is presented. Dr. Parsons is a graduate of Christian University, Canton, Mo., and at present is professor of sociology in Syracuse University. (New York: Longmans, Green & Company. 8vo. pp 194, $1.50.)

THE GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL IN PRINCIPLE AN PRACTICE, by Henry H. Meyer, belongs to the series, "Modern Sunday-school Manuals, edited by Charles Foster Kent. The present volume is in three parts, (1) The Graded Sunday-school in principle; (2) The Graded Sunday-school in its Historical Development; (3) The Graded Sunday-school in Practice. Though brief, the work is thoroughly scientific. It is well adapted to use in normal classes of the Sunday-school or at teachers' meetings, representing as it does the modern educational point of view, with the historical development of the Graded School. Such a study is well adapted to give the teacher a just appreciation of the significance of the tendencies in religious education today. The last part is a description of the work of a large number of typical up-to-date schools, including both those that are using various text book systems, and the best of those that are using the international lessons. The work is intended as an outline for the teacher of teachers. (The Pilgrim Press, Chicago, 75 cents, net.)

THE STORY OF JESUS TOLD FOR CHILDREN, by E. F. Jones, is a presentation in short chapters of the story of the life of Jesus. The task has often been attempted before and with some success. The new study of the problems of religious education is giving new impetus to these attempts to get the material of the Bible in a form to be usable in guiding the religious and moral development of the child. The most successful work of this kind seeks mainly to select from the scripture those portions that are suited to the child's interests and capacities at each stage of its development. It is here that the volume under review is to be objected to. The author has brought into the narratives too much material that in itself has no interest for children and has attempted to make it interesting by expressing it in simple language. This mistake it seems to us is fundamental, and thwarts the purpose of the author. The book is well bound and may be read by children if placed in the home.

"WULLIE McWATTIE'S MASTER," by J. J. Bell, the ever increasing popular Scotch novelist. The book is written in the Scotch dialect, but not so much so that the ordinary reader will not be able to understand and fully enjoy its mirthfulness. Wullie is being taught the painting trade by his master, Mr. Redhorn. He is continually getting into scrapes or running away from work to go to a circus, thus leaving his master to the ridicule of the neighbors, because he could not finish his work, but always being forgiven for his "puir mither's sake," because she was a "message given" at the author's services for old people in connection with his evangelistic work. The volume is illustrated. The writing is of that kind that might be designated as religiously attenuated. The effectiveness of meetings is often accomplished more by the sentiment of the hearers than by the sentimentality of the speaker. (The Praise Publishing Company. Philadelphia.)

THE HINDRANCES TO GOOD CITIZENSHIP, by Hon. James Bryce, being the Dodge lectures delivered at Yale University, by the British ambassador to the United States. Mr. Bryce defines the principles of popular government and the duties of citizenship, and gives as the three chief causes of defective discharge of civic duty, indolence, personal self-interest, and party spirit. The book is one of rare thought, and commends itself to careful reading and discussion. No man in America is better prepared to speak to the American people of the great ideals of our civilization and to point out to our citizens the way the realization of these ideals than is Mr. Bryce. The book preaches with grasp of thought and earnestness of purpose the gospel of good citizenship. (Yale University Press, $1.15, net.)

THE SOCIAL GOSPEL, by Shailer Mathews. Professor Mathews treats, as the title of the book implies, the gospel from a social viewpoint. The great general principles of Jesus are emphasized with reference to the many vexing social problems of today. The emphasis, however, is placed considerably on the spiritual and moral side of the social problems. The style is simple, direct and fascinating. No technical questions are raised. It is readable to the man with limited educational advantages. This, it seems, is one of its chief charms. Ministers in particular should read it. (Chicago: The Griffith and Rowland Press. Pp. 168.)

Our Readers' Opinions

That "Membership in the Congregation" Plan

An article in the July 7 "Christian Century" by E. S. Ames has attracted my attention and has tempted me to say a few things by way of comment. I am glad Mr. Ames has told us something of the results of his "Membership in the Congregation" plan. It has been in practice seven years in one of the (I suppose) important churches in Chicago, a very large city. It has over thirty members now. In other words, this plan has made a net gain of a little over four a year. It surely cannot be said to be a success as to members, for any church which cannot show a better gain in the same time, even when they baptize their converts as Jesus commanded, would be considered at least not in a very prosperous condition.

"United families." How? Whose are they after they are united? They are not in the church. Are they saved or lost? I see they hold office in the church, serve in the several societies, etc. I wondered while reading the article what was the real condition of those people, seeing some of them had never been members of any church. But then the section called "Settled Baptism Controversy" relieved the difficulty, for I found there that "no outward form can make any vital difference in a man's relation to God." This to be sure is reforming to baptism. Then those people having the religion which is "of the spirit, of the character and will" are saved, and that too, outside the church!

I wonder what kind of a "character and will" a person has who refuses to obey a direct command of the Lord Jesus, the Christ?

Then again, I have found from this article that God is limited—at least in his "feeling."

"Therefore, no one in the seven years of this practice has ever assumed that the difference between the two kinds of membership was of any significance except to those who had a subjective feeling about it." Now, just before this Mr. Ames says that no outward act makes any vital difference in a man's relation to God; therefore, God cannot or at least does not have a "subjective feeling" but perhaps this is only limited to the Hyde Park Church of Chicago.

"When one goes to the living work of Jesus himself, there are no conditions of membership in his company except the will to do his will." Granted, we know this "will" only as he has revealed it through the New Testament writers and, somewhere, one or two of those writers have quoted Jesus as saying, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Demanding a proof of the "will to do his will" is it not?

Now, if no outward form is essential, and baptism is "irrelevant and a secondary issue" as Mr. Ames says it is, why does he make it a test of fellowship in the Hyde Park Church proper? Why not throw down the bars; remove this awful barrier and let the people in? Why doesn't Mr. Ames practice what he preaches? Perhaps "the brotherhood" hasn't advanced far enough to receive this "advanced" doctrine literally.

Again, is union desirable at any cost? Shall we leave the New Testament order of things in order to have union? We may have then a "Membership in the Congregation" but it would not be "in Christ."

We are not "advocating union on the basis of immersion" but on the basis of the New Testament, and that includes immersion.

Burbank, Calif. E. E. LOWE.

[Our readers will recall our editorial criticism of the "Membership in the Congregation" plan published some weeks since. As a method it solves nothing, makes the problem more complex and does not seem wholly ingenuous. We are not interested in the further discussion of the plan, nor do we believe our readers are. We print Mr. Lowe's article, however, to call attention to the first paragraph especially, as a type of criticism almost always unfair. The modest figures seem to our correspondent to expose a vulnerable point of attack. Only thirty members in the "Congregation"! That sounds like failure. But it indicates anything but failure in this case, for the Hyde Park Church with its less than 200 members is one of the really great churches of Chicago. In its contribution of intelligent and self-denying personalities to the social problem of its community it is proverbial. In its missionary spirit and sacrifices it leads all the churches among the Disciples and ranks absolutely first in Chicago protestantism. It is growing in members, too, and in every element of substantial strength. It is not well to cultivate a habit of mind that looks to numerical results as a test of a Christian principle.—EDITORS.]

A Conversation and a Question

Editors Christian Century:—A recent conversation with an intelligent and devout Christian woman of another denomination than our own was of interest to me and also somewhat puzzling. You may not be bored with it and can possibly bring to the difficulty involved some suggestion better than that which was given. The replies did not satisfy me, probably less my friend. The latter was familiar with the Disciples from long association and intimate acquaintance, was not prejudiced by denominationalism, and I was desirous to know her view therefore of our people. I am coming to believe if we are to be successful promoters of Christian union we must be very sensitive to what other religious people are thinking of us and how they are considering our message and work. In this spirit our conversation was begun.

Almost bluntly I inquired, "What do your people think of the Disciple church?" After demanding assurance that direct and plain speech would not wound she proceeded: "Well, our people believe that the Disciples are almost the least willing of all denominations to practice the plea they preach. You plead for Christian union, yet my church which does not advocate this doctrine goes farther toward practicing it than does yours. We accept Christian people from all evangelical denominations, while you select a few who have been immersed and will receive them but refuse fellowship to the vast majority of Christians because they are unimmersed. You don't impress us with your doctrine partly because you do not connect it up with your practice." "In other words," I volunteered, using the street vernacular, "It would not be difficult to think us 'bluffing,'" to which assent was cautiously given.

From this we went to the suggestion recently made that all Christians unite, not demanding immersion of those already Christian, but practicing immersion only in the case of all coming into the church by primary obedience. I inquired the attitude her church would likely assume toward such a proposal. After considerable deliberation the reply was elicited that they were not desirious of having Christian union but, in case they were, it could never be consummated by an agreement on immersion for baptism. "Such a thing would be abhorrent to my church," said she, "because it would be giving significance to a mere form which is entirely unwarranted. We practice sprinkling, not because it has any significance as a form, but because it is the custom of the church and it is accepted by candidates for membership for that reason. To demand that every candidate shall be immersed would dignify the form to neglect of the spiritual element and could never be assented to by my people." The rejoinder which this argument received was evidently not conclusive to my friend and it did not thoroughly satisfy me. I shall therefore not attempt to reproduce it. What would you have said?

A. T. L.

[We wish our correspondent had put down his reply that we might have had the complete conversation. Our reply, if we were in his place, would be to ask two questions:

1. Why would there be given more significance to a form, as such, if the church practiced immersion only, than if it practiced sprinkling? Nobody can gain admittance to the church to which this lady belongs without the acceptance of a form. We do not see how the the practice of one common form of initiation into the church unduly dignifies form at the expense of the spiritual element any more than does the practice of three forms. Indeed, the practice of a common form of initiation is the only way of escape from the overconsciousness of form which accompanies the necessity of choice between these forms. In the early church the form, as such, was probably not present to the consciousness of the candidate. He did not walk into the water with any feeling that there was virtue in immersion, as such. He did not think of it at all, because there was no alternative proposed to him. Baptism therefore was a spiritual act. The candidate was not just being immersed: he was dedicating his life to Christ and entering into the freemasonry of Christian people. Paul's "one baptism" has no such meaning as Baptist exegesis and much Disciple exegesis has given it. He was not thinking of alternative forms of baptism, but of repeated acts of baptism, and he declared that the one act of baptism in which the soul ceremonially pledged itself to Christ was enough. Not until the ceremony of dedication and initiation into the church becames again a common ceremony will the present overconsciousness of form be overcome.

2. The other question we would ask our correspondent's interlocutor is: How, conceivably, could a united church practice anything for baptism except inmmersion without doing such violence to the consciences of a great section of the church as would disrupt the union? When any other method of initiation into the united church is proposed, upon which the church can stay united, it will be time enough to consider it. No such proposal has ever been made.

In addition to these questions we would say that the solution of the baptism question advocated by our correspondent with what seemed to him indifferent success, depends absolutely for its point and cogency upon an earnest desire for Christian union. With a church which admits, as the lady above is quoted as saying of her church, that it is not desirous of Christian union, it is a waste of words to either make our correspondent's argument or to ask the above questions. The only present motive prompting to such a settlement of the baptism controversy is the conviction that it is Christ's supreme yearning that his church shall be one.—EDITORS.]

A SERIAL STORY

"Oh don't fret about that Mr. Sinclair. We can easily keep James upstairs for a few days longer. We'll give him change of air by putting him in a different room on the same landing. You're getting on splendidly. Mr. Donald here is a capital nurse. How do you do, Mr. Graeme!"

"Mr. Sinclair is doing well, I hear you say, doctor?"

"Couldn't be doing better. We'll have him about again before very long."

"That's good news, doctor. But I wish you would scold him into common sense. He will persist in saying that he ought to have been taken straight to the manse. What are friends for, doctor, if they are to give no help in time of need?"

"Perfectly true, Mrs. Greme. It's just the life of him to be in a cheery house like this, instead of shut up in a lonely manse. Indeed if he had a wife to cheer him up, it would be different."

"You are very good Mrs. Graeme, but I do not wish to be a burden to you all a moment longer than possible. I wanted Doctor Forbes to allow me to be driven home tomorrow."

"Donald, don't let your father know that the minister has said this—he would be sore offended." Mrs. Graeme laid a cool hand on the minister's brow as she spoke.

"The fever's gone doctor" she said.

"Quite. He's doing splendidly. All the same Mr. Sinclair, there's to be no talk of going to the manse till I give you leave. Bye, bye."

He laughed when the doctor left and told Mrs. Graeme that she was giving him a taste of home life, which would only make the manse seem all the lonelier when he did go back to it.

From that time friends were allowed to call to see the minister and the days passed more quickly. Mr. Graeme spent every spare minute with either Mr. Sinclair or James. But he never spoke to either of his own trouble. He went about like a man in a dream. His old cheerfulness seemed to have deserted him, and many a time Mr. Sinclair put on a gaiety which he was far from feeling, just to lift his old friend's thoughts from the trouble which he knew was eating his very life away.

James Douglas had been allowed to move about the rooms upstairs at will, for more than a week. How often during each day Donald had run up the stairs just for a few words with him, it would be hard to tell. James was not gaining strength so quickly as they had all expected. He seemed to be constantly brooding over something. Donald thought bitterly to himself that the old distrust was in James' mind still, concerning himself. His father treated him now with calm forbearance and seemed thankful to him for his strict attention to business. If only James could be won over as his father was, life might once more become bearable. Donald was thinking thus as he climbed the stair one afternoon to see James. The invalid was alone. He looked thin and anxious. When he had first been allowed out of bed, he had talked much of being soon allowed down-stairs. Now he appeared listless, not seeming to care much what happened. As Donald came into the room his heart melted with pity at sight of his friend's hollow cheeks.

"Look here James, we must get you down to the drawingroom, out of these poky rooms up here. You ought to be gaining strength far more rapidly than you are."

"True Donald, but I think if I had two or three months o' air frae among the hills at Oban, I would gain strength soon enough."

"Why James we are in the jaws of Christmas—you could never travel in such weather."

"Could I not? Weel maybe in a week I might get off. I hae gi'en a heap of bother here a'ready. It's cuttin' me tae the hert tae think o't."

"For shame James—you couldn't help being sick—indeed I know I was the cause of it myself. Fretting about me James, brought it on."

"I don't know aboot that, Donald. It seems I ought tae hae been fretting aboot mysel'. I hae nae doat but the blame's a' laid on me noo."

"James, you are mad to talk so. No one ever thought of blaming you. What has put such a thing into your heaa?"

"What for does Mr. Sinclair no come tae see me?" Do I no ken fine that the story abbot his being sick is a' a lee?"

"You are wrong James, quite wrong. It is perfectly true that Mr. Sinclair has been very ill indeed. His recovery will be slow too. You must hurry and get strong—then you will be able to see him for yourself."

"You hae lifted a muckle weight frae my hert Donald. But tell me what has been the maitter wi' him?" Donald paused a moment. Would it not be wiser to tell James the truth. He was strong enough to bear it now. And would it not be easier after all to know the truth?

"He met with an accident James—he got one arm badly crushed."

"The meenister's deid Donald. Ye needna try tae hide it."

"Nonsense James, he's no more dead than you are. The doctor says he is getting on splendidly."

"Tell me all about it. How did it happen?"

"Will you promise me to keep cool? If you get excited you know Nurse Greene will blame me and I'll never hear the end of it."

"I'll be as cool as the erown o' Ben Nevis at New Year's Day." Donald laughed. James was looking better already, as if a load had been lifted from his shoulders.

"Archie Monteith took him for a run in the motor car. They came back in about an hour. The accident happened at our very door. Nobody knows how." James started to his feet with flashing eyes. He stamped about the room in fierce wrath. "Oh the traitor, the villain, the murderer. Yes, he wanted to kill the meenister. I ken a' aboot it."

"James you promised to be calm. I was a fool to tell you. Sit down man." He threw himself into a chair. With clinched fists he beat against the small table at his side. Donald was distressed.

"James, you'll make yourself ill. I'll never forgive myself."

"Hoots mon, what are you fashing aboot? I'm no sic a reckless body as ye think. Would it no be strange if I could keep cool and quiet like, an' hear of sic goings on? But it's no onexpected, Donald—no tae me, onyway. The very de'il was in Erchie Monteith's twa e'en every time he saw the meenister looking Miss Jeanie's way."

"I think you wrong Archie. He is deeply sorry for the accident. And he assures us it was through no fault of his. Indeed he does not know how it happened."

"Who would expect him tae know what would condemn himsel'? Man, Donald but ye're a gommeril. An' did he escape we'out a bit dunt himsel' just tae mine him o' the murder he had in his hert?"

"He was more hurt than we thought at first. We thought there was only shock to the system. He had to stay here all night. He went home to Glasgow next day. He is still under medical care."

"How long is't ago?"

"Nearly a month."

"An' has he no been here since?"

"No. But he says he hopes to be able to come soon."

"He writes tae Miss Jeanie daily it's like?"

"Yes. He's very anxious about Mr. Sinclair. Whether you believe it or not, James, he is glad that the accident had not worse results."

"Michty glad that his ain wicked brains were na dashed out, I hae nae doot. Glad too, that the meenister wasna picked up deid—its like it micht hae been brought oot murder against one Erchie Monteith."

"Let us try to think better of him, James, or better still, don't think of him at all, but try and get strong and well soon. We want you badly in your old place."

"I know Donald. There's naething tae keep me back noo, but the thocht o' poor Mr. Sinclair's crushed airm, and the worst o' that's past ye say."

"The worst is past James. And we'll all be able to show him bye and bye that we think more of him than ever."

"I couldna think mair o' him Donald. But there's something else on my mind Donald. An' I may na be able tae see him noo till I come back frae Oban—for I'm going there next week. Can ye tell me Donald, whar they hae pittan my every day claes? The yins I had on when my heid gaed a' wrong."

"Very likely I'll find them in the wardrobe on the lobby. I'll see." In a moment Donald came back with the garments in question. James eagerly laid hands on the coat he had worn on the day he was taken ill. From an inside pocket he drew a large pocket-book. With nervous fingers he removed the band. Quickly glancing over the contents, his face lit up with a happy smile. He replaced the elastic on the book again and shoved it deep into the breast pocket of the coat he was wearing.

"Yes" he said "it's all richt, Donald. I'll hae something worth tae show the meenister

And, true to his determination, before another week had passed, James was off to Oban.

CHAPTER XIX.

Elsie and Elsie's Mother.

"Weel, Elsie, what's amiss that I'm no tae hear Jeanie's letter the day?"

"You know perfectly well that you are going to hear it mother o' mine—what's more, Jeanie knows quite well that her letters are just as much to you as to me."

"Yer terrible, Elsie, for flattering a helpless auld body like yer mither—as if I dinna know that in Jeanie's letters and in ither folks, too, there's mony a bit postscript and wee loose scrap beside, that the mither's no to be bothered aboot. Weel, what does she say aboot the poor meenister wi' his bit stump, where a strong airm used to be—waes me—waes me."

"Oh, I'll read the letter for you, mother, from beginning to end. But Jeanie's only a goose—nothing more."

"Weel, lassie it's the new year—a goose is no sae bad at this season."

"She doesn't see that the Manse of Brigend would need one now more than ever—now, if I had been in her place the Clyde would have been on fire long ago—but listen:

New Year's Night.

Dear Elsie: Our house is growing less like a hospital every day. But James Douglas, growing strong and well was harder to manage than James Douglas weak and helpless as an infant. For a long while, even after he was out of danger, we did not tell him about the accident. Even yet, he knows only that there was the crushed arm. Donald told him as little as possible, because he became excited about it, and like the rest of us, he was ready enough to lay all the blame on Archie. James' recovery was slower after all than we at first expected. Somehow he seemed to be worrying about something and at last the truth came out. We had told him, you know, that Mr. Sinclair was ill, and could not come to see him. That satisfied him for a time, but when weeks slipped away and there was no sign of the minister coming to see him, he began to think there was more amiss than had been told him. He told Donald of his fears, and it was then that Donald saw it would be wiser to let him know, at least part of the truth. We did not tell him that Mr. Sinclair was being nursed in our best bed-room. We knew that James would have felt it hard not to be allowed to rush downstairs just for a sight of his beloved "meenister." But from the day on which he was told of the accident he seemed to gain strength and spirits rapidly. He was down in the drawing room for two hours on Christmas day. His whole anxiety was, when he would be allowed to see Mr. Sinclair. The doctor told him, and we all told him, that excitement of any kind might retard the progress towards recovery of the wounded arm Then James grew restless again and declared that since he was not allowed to see Mr. Sinclair, he would start for Oban and spend the New Year with his friends there. At first, the doctor would not hear of it, but when he saw how much James' heart was set on it, and that he was growing rapidly stronger too, he gave permission.

So we saw him off yesterday. He looked like a great Russian bear in a splendid new overcoat father made him a present of. He went off in great spirits. Donald and I went to the station with him and saw him snugly stowed away in a first-class carriage—every modern contrivance for comfort all around him. His last words before the train moved out of the station were to Donald, though I fancied he kept looking at me, with a new triumphant light in his eyes

"Donald, ye hae passed through a sair trial, but ye hae borne it like a man. When I cam' back—" But the train moved off and the rest of the sentence was lost. As soon as we got away from the station, Donald turned to me, wild with excitement—

"What did James mean, Jeanie? He's not a man to speak lightly, or raise false hopes. He has found out some clue to the forgery. Oh, I'll go after him to Oban by next train." With much difficulty I got him to see that it would be better to keep patient and wait till James comes back. I pointed out to him that it would only set people talking. If he had gone along with James, that would have been all right. But to let him go alone, and then follow at his heels—it would never do. Besides, after all, perhaps James' high spirits were owing to the buoyancy which accompanies returning health. Who that has been almost through the dark valley, yet is spared and returns to life, and health again, but will look on everything with eyes of hope and gladness? Then I reminded him, too, that Mr. Sinclair needs him every evening now at the Manse. Yes, he insisted on being allowed to return home before James came down stairs. There was no use attempting to resist his will. Father and mother used every argument they could think of to induce him to stay longer with us, but it was useless—he would go home. The doctor pronounced him quite fit, so off he went. I do not know whether I was glad or sorry to see him go. The house seems empty, oh, so empty, since he went. Yet while he was here, I never felt at ease. His big, wistful eyes seemed to be always reproaching me. Do you know, Elsie, that only for me he would not have gone in the motor that day with Archie. I told him to go indeed. He thinks of that, I am sure, many a time, and of course, it is natural for him to blame me in a way. I know well enough that is the cause of his distant look. And that has made me so shy of him, that I could not tell him how sore my heart has been for his loss. Oh, if he but knew that if I had had it in my power I would willingly have given my own right arm to save his. But he will never think of me again as he did before. Perhaps he blames me for Cousin Archie's frequent visits here. Well, I can't help it. But I'm sorry now that I made a fool of myself the time of the accident. I saw it from a window, you know. I could not write details at the time, but now they are all gone, it does me good to tell you. Well, I flew down the stairs like lightning, and without thinking I was beside the minister before anyone else had time, and had my arms around him. Donald says I wanted to carry the poor crushed arm myself. But he led me away. Likely there would be some heartless mortal looking on ready to pass remarks. When I came to myself, and thought of it, I have felt ashamed ever since. So you can easily guess that my visits to the sufferer's room were few, and that I could not feel natural in his presence since, try as I might. To tell the truth I would not have minded much what outsiders might say, had he looked glad to see me himself. But he didn't. So I have not gone to see him since he went home. Father and mother and Donald are always coming and going—and all the rest of the congregation, too, I believe. So I suppose I shall not be much missed.

Archie has never been here since that terrible day. I know well enough that he is waiting to hear when Mr. Sinclair has returned to the Manse. But though I am writing my New Year's letter to Aunt Eleanor, I am not mentioning the minister's name. I don't want to see Archie. I believe I shall never see him again without thinking of that day. Oh, dear, what a dull New Year's letter, and how selfish I am to be dwelling on all our sorrows, with scarcely a thought of you and your dear mother in it. Tell her that I would give anything for the calm, sweet resignation of her spirit. And you shame me, too, Elsie, with your bright, hopeful spirit that can keep glad under deep affliction. And above all, dear Elsie, you will never know in this world, how your faith in one of us who lies under a cloud, has helped and cheered us all. God bless you, and may the New Year be bright for you and the dear mother. Love from Hopefield to Cathcart.

Jeanie.

P. S.—Donald had hoped to treat himself to an hour or two with you today. But the Manse begged him to go there. The good man's loss has been great gain to Donald. The old love between them has had its resurrection. J. G.

Elsie read the letter through—all but the postscript.

"Now mother, what do you think of her."

"That she's just like every ither lass since civilization has made heepocrites o' us, Elsie."

"Jeanie a hypocrite? Mother what ails you?"

"Weel, what else? Is she no' ain that keeps her real feelings out o' sight?"

"Oh, a girl can't always pin her heart on her sleeve, mother."

"I'm no gaun tae contradict ye in what ye say, seeing that whiles ye hae things tae hide yersel'." Elsie laughed merrily as she looked fondly into her mother's dancing blue eyes. Lying back among the snowy pillows, no one seeing her for the first time, could imagine that Mrs. Wallace had been a confirmed invalid for at least eighteen years. Rheumatic fever when Elsie was not yet two years old, had laid its terrible grip on the young wife. Every joint in her body seemed to be paralyzed. For long years intense pain had been her lot. But as the joints literally ossified, the pain ceased. Mr. Wallace, who had been a strong man, when his young wife became an invalid for life, had nursed her with all the tenderness that a truly noble nature was capable of bestowing. Elsie had reached her sixteenth year when her father was suddenly taken from them. Nobly the young girl took her father's place, and became her mother's constant companion. Mr. Wallace had had his life heavily insured, so they were left in easy circumstances. All the same, Elsie, who might have employed a nurse specially for her mother, chose to be her attendant and companion herself, a task not so difficult as may appear at first sight, since Mrs. Wallace was one of the sweetest, and sunniest faced invalids who ever gladdened the hearts of all who waited on her, or ministered to her wants. Thus mother and daughter were great friends and had no secrets from each other.

When Elsie had indulged in merry laughter to her heart's content, she assumed a grave look, and raising one hand slowly with a deprecating motion she said solemnly:

"Your words imply a most serious charge against me, mother mine—may I crave to know its import?"

"What for did ye no' read me the postscript o' Jeanie's letter—tell me that?" Elsie blushed to the tips of her ears.

"You're a Scotch witch, mother, that's what you are, and ought to be burned alive. How did you know there was a postscript? And really its nothing after all."

"Of course, I know fine its naething. Ye needna tell me that. When a lassie's face is like sunrise in July, though its cauld New Year's Day. What can her auld mither think, but that it's naething which makes the roses bloom as if summer had come in wi' a hop, skip and jump." Elsie grew quite sober without make-believe. The soft light which pure happiness still throws over a young face made hers radiant as she answered softly:

"But really mother, it is a very brief postscript. This is all." And she read the few words in faltering tones.

"So Donald's coming at last. Well I'll no say but I'll be glad tae see the laddie. It's no' often yer mither has been mistaken in a face, Elsie. Gin Donald turns oot tae be what ye think he is, he'll find a guid friend in Elsie's mither." Elsie stooped and kissed her mother before she ran off to consult with Guphie, their old servant about dinner.

"Guphie, I don't think we'll use the cold turkey today. I've just taken it into my head to give it to that poor body, the washerwoman. Think of all her little ones. It will be quite a dainty for them. And I think I'd rather have a hot dinner today. It's so cold you know. What do you think of a nice little roast of lamb?"

"Ma word, Miss Elsie, but ye're growin' extravagant. Roast lamb an' the pantry stuffed wi' cauld turkey—Gie it tae the washerwoman an' her weans—skirlin' beggars—what gars ye think o' siccan waste, Miss Elsie?"

—During the first six months of 1910 nearly $80,000,000 worth of South African gold was exported by way of Cape Town.

A Warning

By Grace Wood Castle.

The Clothes-pin family dwelt in a bag
That hung by the laundry door;
They'd never been known to fret or to nag
Though chances there were galore,
For a bag is as crowded for clothes-pin folks
As a flat for the human kind;
And people and pins must consider as jokes
Many things that are not to their mind.

But a change has come over the Clothes-pin clan;
Discontented and restless are they
And happy no more. The trouble began
When a message came down one day
From the nursery, saying its ruler and king
Had tired of every toy,
And required that his subjects the clothes-pins bring.
To restore him to peace and joy.

A score of them traveled away upstairs;
On a beautiful rug were placed;
Posed as people and horses and birds and bears
And found it all much to their taste.
But when they went home to their friends, ah, me!
And the bag by the laundry door,
They found it lonesome and dark as could be;
They'll never be happy there more.

So observe, dear young people travel inclined,
The moral of this tale a part:
Though travel may store and broaden the mind
It also may narrow the heart;
And though you may learn what the world has to teach,
Gain polish, assurance, aplomb,
You're poorer—not richer—if out of your reach
Is content with your "own folks" and home.

Florence's Seventh Birthday

BY SARAH E. GANNETT.

Florence would be seven years old tomorrow. Everybody knew it. The red cows had heard it, and wondered, as they chewed their cuds, what it meant to be seven years old. The white lambs whisked their short tails as they galloped around their mammas and hoped Florence would celebrate the day with a feast of salt so that they could have some. The ducks and chickens gathered in fence corners and wondered if the sky would fall on that day.

But, dear me! Florence wasn't concerning herself about any such matters. Mamma had promised that, if she would learn by heart Jean Ingelow's poem, "I am seven times one today," and the sevens in multiplication, she should have seven surprises on her birthday, and it is dreadfully hard to learn the multiplication table, you know. But she had persevered, and when she went to bed on her last six-year-old night she was very sure that she had earned her seven surprises.

But here it was seven o'clock on the morning of her seventh birthday and Florence was not yet awake. The sun had peeped in at six to see her still in bed, and he was so disgusted that he dodged behind his cloud curtains, pulled them all about him and sulked. Then the clouds had it all their own way, and they sent out the rain to see why Florence didn't wake. Patter, patter,

"My birthday," she thought, "and it rains. Oh dear! No, I'm not going to cry. I'm too big, and besides, there is water enough out of doors," and she laughed merrily at her own little joke as she brushed the drops from her eyes and began to dress.

Something hard in her stockings stopped her. Seven pennies in each, and seven more in each shoe. Seven in the washbowl when she went to it to wash her face, seven on the dressing case around her comb and brush, and seven in the toothbrush mug. She gathered them all in her handkerchief and ran down to breakfast.

"Ah," cried papa, "here is our lazy daughter. Come here, my dear, and give me seven kisses."

A big hug for papa and another for mamma and they all sat down to breakfast, which was hardly over when in ran Florence's cousin May in mackintosh and overshoes, with raindrops on the end of her funny little nose.

"I've come to stay seven hours," she announced, "and, Florence, I've brought seven new paper dollies for you and seven for me, and each dollie has seven dresses and seven hats. Come, let's play with them," and off ran both little girls to the playroom.

After a while came a great thumping and scratching at the playroom door, and when it was opened in walked Ponto, papa's big dog, harnessed to a drag in which sat seven small china dollies, each fully dressed in frock, coat and hat, and each having a name pinned on its coast. The drag was labeled "Florence's family carriage."

With a shout of delight the little girls seized the dolls and read their names; "Alice Birthday," "Mary Birthday," "Josephine Birthday," "Lucy Birthday," "Helen Birthday," "Dorothy Birthday," and "Susanette Birthday," and then divided them into two families, Florence lending four to May because she was company, and keeping three for herself.

So they played busily and happily while the rain poured down out of doors until at twelve o'clock Ponto came again scratching at the door, this time with seven small packages hanging from each side of his collar. Those on one side were marked "For Florence," and those on the other "For May."

In great excitement the girls opened them and found in each a set of small china dishes, seven tiny biscuits, seven oyster crackers, seven cookies cut out with a thimble, seven blackberries, an apple and a big purple plum. In a few minutes Ponto reappeared, this time carrying in his mouth by its handles a tin pail which he set down on the floor. In this the girls found a small pitcher of hot water for tea, another of milk, and a cup of sugar.

Such a good time as they had in setting their tables, feeding all their children and eating their own lunch. And they could hardly believe it was so late when mamma came in and said it was two o'clock and she had come to read to them out of a new book which had come for a birthday surprise for Florence. The stories and pictures were so delightful that time passed quickly and both girls were surprised when mamma said it was time for May to go home, and that she and Florence would walk over with her.

"But I will get wet, mamma," said Florence, "see how it pours."

"Oh, no," laughed mamma, "not if you put these on," and she produced from the closet a new gossamer and umbrella just like May's.

Florence danced with delight, ran for her overshoes, and in a few minutes all three set out in the rain, thinking it great fun.

"Oh, mamma," said Florence that night, as her mother tucked her into bed, "such a day of surprises as it has been, and such beautiful ones! I think you are the dearest mamma that ever was, and I'm going to try to surprise you by being the goodest kind of a girl," and Florence tucked her hand under her cheek and went off to sleep with all the birthday gifts spread on a table by the side of her bed.

If You Want to Rise

If you want to rise in the world you must raise something else. If you want to rise in business raise the business you are in. Don't imagine that when you have given your life to the lifting up of a business the house will try to keep you down. A house cannot rise and keep down the man who raised it any more than a man can rise out of the water and keep down the life-preserver that raised him.

No man can do a dollar's worth of work for a dollar. When you are working for nothing but a dollar your work will not pan out at more than 50 cents. To do a dollar's worth of work you must work for a dollar and something more. You must work for the love of the business, or for the love of something—for something more than the dollar. A mere hireling never does more than 50 cents' worth of work for a dollar, because he has nothing to work for but the dollar. He may meet the requirements as to quantity, but never as to quality. So long as a man thinks of himself as a hireling he will never hitch his wagon to anything but a pay envelope.

A large employer said the other day that he never distributes his pay envelopes without putting in them an inspirational leaflet—just a bit of printed matter to encourage his men, to spur their ambition, to incite them to higher endeavor. Men need something more than money. They need an encouraging word. They need antidotes for the blues. They need stout backbone bracers. They need a friendly handshake—a handshake with a grip in it that helps a man get a new grip on himself.—The Young Man in Business.

According to a report by Gov. Frear there is a strong tendency toward race suicide in Hawaii. While deaths are increasing considerably in proportion to population the birth rate is falling off fast. Last year deaths were sixty-one over the number in the previous year, while births decreased 600. Marriages, however, increased by 311, and the governor expresses hope that this fact may cause a readjustment of conditions as to population.

duties in the routine of daily life. He seks to "do all to the glory of God." He realizes that it is just as much a violation of his Christian obligation to use a poor piece of material in the manufacture of a piece of goods, as it would be to forget to pray, and probably more so. He knows that the high school student who neglects his studies for the sake of social functions in which he delights, fails in the discharge of his Christian duty as when he willfully and unnecessarily absents himself from the weekly endeavor prayer-meeting. The teacher who fails to use her office in the public schools to exhalt lofty ideals and form good character fails quite as much as the Sunday-school teacher who squanders the opportunity which that office brings. The point is not the comparative importance of the activities in the different fields, but that our Christian discipleship obligates us to both. This is to be Cnrist-centered.

The significance of this conception of the Christian life can hardly be fully appreciated. This fidelity to daily task will ramify to the farthest bounds of business and commmercial activity. The salesman will not misrepresent the quality of his goods. The machine which he is selling will do nothing less than what he claims for it. Every note which is given will be redeemed. The merchant will always give full measure. Stocks will be offered at their actual value. A living profit is all that is sought. The manufacturer will pay living wages. He will provide a proper environment for the workers. There would be no men who are active in Christian work going from a Christian convention back to a grand jury room to confess to the taking of a bribe. It is probably not too much to say that if all church-going Christians were Christ-centered rather than self-centered that our present commercial and business methods would be revolutionized.

Veteran Pastor Honored at Annual Convention

The thirty-third annual convention of the Christian Missionary Society of Maryland, Delaware and the District of Columbia was held September 5-8, at the Jerusalem Church, Mountain, Maryland. Francis H. Scott, pastor of the Calhoun Street Church, Baltimore, preached the convention sermon September 5, upon "The Message of the Cross."

Tuesday, September 6, was Preachers Day. Peter Ainslie presided. Howard W. King, of Vienna, Va., conducted the devotional service. William G. Oram of Washington read a paper entitled "The right to be a Preacher," and Clarence H. Page of Baltimore presented a paper upon "Sources of Power in Preaching." These papers were discussed by Francis H. Scott, W. S. Hoye, Peter Ainslie, Mrs. George T. Prewitt, L. B. Haskins, Miss Anna C. Hahn and J. A. Scott. At the afternoon session C. C. Waite of Mt. Rainier read a paper on "Great Preachers, their Topics and Texts." W. S. Hoye, of Beaver Creek, discussed "Finding Texts." The question "Should the Church expect the minister to be both preacher and pastor?" was discussed at length by both ministers and laymen. In the evening Peter Ainslie delivered a powerful address relat- to the problems of American civilization.

Dr. Frederick D. Power's absence by reason of illness was universally regretted. He was the prime mover in the organization of the society and has been deeply interested in it ever since. The convention sent the following message to him:

F. D. Power, Queenstown, Md., Assembled in convention, delegates from all the churches, expressed a very beautiful and tender remembrance of you, and instructed the undersigned to communicate it to you. The Christian Missionary Society of Maryland, Delaware and the District of Columbia, which, aided by a few sainted spirits, you organized thirty-three years ago at Rockville, Md., has grown into a large and influential body, representing many churches. The good accomplished is untold, and the beneficient results will ever abide for the glory of God and the good of humanity. Therefore, you are regarded as our spiritual father, to whom we have looked with implicit confidence for advice and guidance. So, through your infirmity, the first absence in all these years is most deeply regretted, and it is the purpose of this communication to remind you not only of the high esteem in which your are held, but also of our very great love. Your life has been as a sacrifice, given to us without reserve, and this is appreciated by every heart. Christian sympathy, full and complete, is extended to you, and prayers are offered that you may be spared for service for many years to come and that God may give you grace for every hour of need. Most affectionately yours,

L. B. Haskins,
W. S. Hoye.

At the morning session Wednesday, September 6, the reports of the churches were read. There are now forty-two organizations affiliated with the society—four of these are colored, three at Baltimore and one at Hagerstown. The largest amount contributed by or through any church for the year ending August 31, was reported by Beaver Creek, Maryland, $22,225.59. This sum includes by William Newcomer, $10,000 to the Christian Temple, Baltimore, $5,000 to the Hagerstown Hospital and $6,000 to the American Christian Society. The Christian Temple reported including the gift of $10,000 as contributed $20,249.44. Vermont Avevnue and Ninth Street of Washington, each reNinth Street has the largest membership—1027.

April 12, 1910, a new church was organized at Maryland Park, a suburb of Washington. There was no church in the neighborhood and after discussing the matter it was decided by the residents to organize a Christian church. George A. Miller told them the position of the Disciples and what the necessary steps would be. While they only report eight members they have already erected a chapel and owe but $100 on it. The church is self-supporting. This is the third church which has come to us at Washington without the solicitation of the Disciples.

The board of managers was directed to publish a monthly paper in the interest of the Disciples in the missionary district. A permanent fund was started, the income from which is to be used in evangelistic work in the district. W. S. Hoye, Joel Grayson and Peter Ainslie pledged $100 each and a number of persons pledged $5 annually. Mr. Hoye presented the plan for such a fund. He has been managing the educational fund of the society for many years and by it has aided many young men in obtaining an education for the ministry. Mrs. Eva Seeley, the blind singer of Washington, was the soloist of the convention. Mrs. George T. Prewitt presided over the C. W. B. M. session. Papers were read by Mrs. Josiah H. Shinn and Mrs. R. E. Kinsell, both from Washington, upon "The Outlook for the new Century," and "Our Children in the Missionary School." Miss Anna Hahn of Baltimore delivered a short address. At the evening session Mrs. Shinn told the history of the electric light upon the Central Union Mission of Washington which proclaims to all persons passing eastward on Pennsylvania avenue that "Jesus is the Light of the World."

J. A. Scott of Washington, superintendent of Bible-schools, presided over the Bible-school session. One of the most interesting and helpful features was the open parliament conducted by T. A. Hostetler of Washington.

The Maryland Baptist Association has a standing committee on "Fraternal Relations with the Disciples of Christ." Dr. C. Hastings Dodd of Baltimore attended as a fraternal delegate and delivered a felicitous address. It was decided that hereafter the society would appoint a committee at each convention on "Fraternal Relations with the Baptists." L. B. Haskins and F. H. Scott of Baltimore were elected fraternal delegates to the Baptist Association. Peter Ainslie and L. B. Haskins were elected representatives to the Maryland Anti-Saloon League. President George A. Miller was elected to the board of trustees of the Anti-Saloon League of the District of Columbia for the year 1911.

F. H. Scott presided over the Christian Endeavor session. The prize banner was awarded to the society of Calhoun Street, Baltimore, by a narrow margin over the society of Vermont Avenue, Washington. Stephen J. Corey, of the Foreign Society, Grant K. Lewis, of the American Society, and George W. Muckley, of the Church Extension Board, in splendid addresses urged the necessity of the enlargement of the work in their respective fields.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Pres., George B. Townsend, Hagerstown; First Vice-Pres., T. A. Hostetler, Washington; Second Vice-Pres., L. B. Haskins, Baltimore; Cor. Secretary, C. S. Ehlers, Washington; Recording Secretary, Andrew Wilson, Washington; Treasurer, D. C. W. Ward, Baltimore; Additional members of the Board of Managers are: Superintendent of Bible-schools, J. A. Scott, Washington; Superintendent of Christian Endeavor Societies, F. H. Scott, Baltimore; State Organizer, C. W. B. M., Mrs. Emma Lattimore, Washington and J. Irvin Bitner of Hagerstown.

For many years Mr. Bitner has been faithful and efficient treasurer of the Society. Ill health has made it impossible for him to attend to the duties of the office for the past year and he requested that he be not re-elected.

F. D. Power, R. E. Kinsell, W. S. Hoye, Peter Ainslie and W. G. Oram were elected trustees.

Evangelist H. F. Lutz was present a part of the convention and revival will follow in the Jerusalem Church.

ANDREW WILSON,
Recording Secretary.

The Illinois Convention

BY H. D. WILLIAMS.

The state missionary convention of Illinois Disciples was held in Springfield last week with an attendance of close to 800 persons. It was a great convention,—a credit to the Disciples of Illinois and a sure prophecy of a great future. The unusually fine spirit of this convention could not but impress all thoughtful persons with the fact that the Disciples have come to the day when they pay little attention to the theories that divide, but give heed chiefly to the works that unite. The writer of these notes attended the Illinois convention in 1895 and again fifteen years later in 1910. Both times he was a stranger to the state, and he has been much interested in contrasting the two occasions. Then men of fifty-five or seventy years of age were the leading factors; now young and middle-aged men are foremost. Then nearly every minister wore a Prince Albert coat and a white "tie"; now not more than one out of forty give any heed to distinctively clerical dress. Then the devotional openings of the various sessions were the occasions for many touching talks and earnest prayers interspersed with devotional hymns; now the devotions consist of one or two short prayers and a lot of light, catchy, superficial songs. Then there was perfect freedom of personal approach and every person came to know every other person without the formality of an introduction by a third party; now many occupy a reserved attitude towards all strangers, declining to throw off the restraints of formalities. Then many interesting discussions and even warm debates were permitted to occur over various matters arising in the course of the program; now there is little disposition to discuss the papers and addresses presented. Then there was a dictinct theological atmosphere permeating the entire convention; now the atmosphere is that of loyalty and liberty and service to the cause of Jesus Christ. Then there were many logical and forceful apologies for missions and missionary societies; now they are taken for granted.

The above by no means exhausts the contrast, but the doings of this last convention must receive attention.

The C. W. B. M. ocupied Monday evening and Tuesday with its usually good addresses and inspiring reports.

Mrs. Atwater's address on Monday evening was one of the fine and inspiring addresses of the convention.

Tuesday evening the West Side church where all the sessions of the convention were held was crowded to the doors to hear two interesting addresses,—one by Prof. Arthur Holmes on "The Church and Men" and the other by J. W. Kilborn as the president of the I. C. M. S. Professor Holmes spoke with his usual clearness and force while Mr. Kilborn, in clear-cut, well-balanced sentences, outlined in a general way the tasks of the convention.

Wednesday opened with a Sunday-school conference led by the state Sunday-school secretary, Clarence L. DePew. Mr. DePew is one of the most aggressive Sunday-school men to be found anywhere and he gave the Sunday-school cause a prominent place in this convention. At this session addresses were given by Marion Stevenson, G. W. Morton and W. F. Kohl. Thursday morning and afternoon two other Sunday-school conferences occurred when R. P. Shepherd, I. N. McCash, R. F. Thrapp, Herbert Moninger, E. W. Thornton and Clyde Darsie spoke and aroused enthusiasm. The day of saner agitation on Sunday-school improvement and enlargement is at hand.

Wednesday afternoon—the first part of it—was given to the busines of the I. C. M. S. The reports were presented in good form and seemed so far as this scribe could see, to present satisfactory results.

The latter part of the afternoon was devoted to the educational interests of the state, which, of course, is at this time Eureka College. The chief addresses of this period were made by David H. Shields, W. H. Cannon, Mr. Smith and C. C. Morrison. F. W. Burnham led the conference.

The Wednesday night session was devoted to two very thoughtful addresses,—one by B. S. Denny, corresponding secretary of the Iowa Christian Missionary Society and the other by W. R. Warren, manager of the Christian Publishing Company of St. Louis.

Mr. Denny's address was a business-like estimate of the work of a state missionary society.

Mr. Warren's address was a plea for the extension of the field of the church paper and especially for the church board to put a church paper in every home. He argued that as the church uses the co-operation method in paying its minister, so it should use the same method in paying for the church paper.

At the opening of the Wednesday evening session, F. W. Burnham made a brief statement of the action of the state board in providing for a worker among the students of the state university. This course is surely a very wise one and results will soon justify it. There are about 300 students at Champaign belonging to Disciple churches. The secular atmosphere of such an institution paralyzes the religious convictions of many of them. To hold them in touch with the church and keep them religiously alive, the student worker is needed. The writer was pastor at Ames, Iowa, the seat of the Iowa College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts with 1,800 students, when the student assistant was used and he knows it to be a good plan. The proper person under the direction of S. E. Fisher, pastor of the Champaign church, can do a mighty work in saving many young men and women who are in danger of leaving the state university minus any religious convictions.

The last evening of the convention found the church again crowded to hear two significant addresses—I. N. McCash on "A Square Deal for American Missions" and R. P. Shepherd on "The Ideal Teacher." Mr. McCash pleaded for home missions as the basis of all missions. He impressed his hearers as pleading his cause on the broadest and most substantial basis.

The lateness of the hour and the weariness of the audience prevented Mr. Shepherd from giving the address he had planned; but in the few minutes he occupied, he said some very helpful things for teachers and impressed all as being a master of the art of teaching.

That evening and the next morning, as the delegates were returning home, they seemed to go reluctantly. The convention,—its programs, its associations, and its entertainment, had been so agreeable that the people seemed averse to quiting the place.

The west side church, its people and its pastor, J. R. Golden, did themselves great credit by the way in which they looked after the comfort of the delegates. The members of the First church and their pastor, F. W. Burnham, and also H. H. Jenner, pastor of the Stuart street church with his people, were equally active for the good of the convention.

About People

—Booker T. Washington has been visiting in London where he was lionized, according to the daily press, to such an extent that he had to refuse dozens of invitations to make addresses. He spent a good deal of his time in investigating the condition of the poorer classes. He visited John Burns and Andrew Carnegie, and will return in October after a visit on the continent.

—Frederick W. Plaisted, mayor of Augusta, is the Democratic candidate for governor of Maine at the second of the fall elections to be held September 12. He is very popular and his father was the last Democratic governor of the state.

—Ex-Senator Wilkinson Call of Florida, who recently passed away, had served in the upper branch of congress from 1879 to 1897. He was a native of Russellville, Ky., and was 76 years of age. In boyhood he went to Florida. At the outbreak of the Civil War Mr. Call enlisted as a volunteer in the Confederacy and before the close of hostilities became adjutant general of Florida troops. After the war the Florida Legislature elected him United States senator, but he was not then seated. Thereafter he began the practice of law in Jacksonville, Fla. He was presidential elector-at-large in 1872 and 1876; a member of the democratic national executive committee in 1876 and delegate to the democratic national convention in 1876. After leaving public life Senator Call continued the practice of his profession in Jacksonville.

—The five physicians who have been in attendance on Mayor Gaynor since he was shot by James J. Gallagher visited him on August 31 at his home in St. James, L. I., for what, it was said afterward, would be the last consultation. The physicians found the mayor's throat in excellent condition. No operation is necessary at present and probably none will ever be necessary. The bullet is imbedded in flesh and touches no organ and can do no harm. The mayor's physical condition has greatly improved since he came to St. James. His voice is better, also. What he needs is a complete rest. He will now regain his full powers, was the statement given out to the public.

—Since the arrival of Joseph Chamberlain at Birmingham from London his physical condition has improved. During the recent days of sunshine he has been able to spend a great deal of time in the grounds of his residence at Birmingham, and he is still able to follow public affairs with all his old keenness. He is still a constant reader of his daily paper, and there are few events of importance that pass in the political world which do not excite his comment.

Church Life

Leon V. Stiles has resigned at Hot Springs, Ark.

John H. Booth has closed his work at Centerville, Ia.

E. L. Frazier faces an encouraging outlook in his new work at St. Petersburg, Fla.

Charles Reign Scoville continues his meeting at Litchfield, Ill. Forty-six were added on a recent Sunday.

Wm. D. Ryan, recently pastor at Ashland, Ky., has accepted the pastorate of Central Church, Youngstown, Ohio.

H. B. Robison, in charge of our work at Mobile, has resigned to take a professorship in Christian University, Canton, Mo.

W. J. Battenfield has resigned at San Jacinto, Cal., and will accept a call recently extended him by the church at Huntington Beach, Cal.

Adam K. Adcock, for some time pastor at Fairview, Ill., has taken charge of the field at Carbondale, Ill., the pastorate having been vacant for some time.

In July Henry F. Lutz, our evangelist for the Atlantic seaboard, spent July in a meeting at Oak Grove, Matthews County, Va., which greatly strengthened the church.

Ralph V. Callaway, formerly of Atlanta, Ill., is now pastor at Havana, Ill. He reports a flourishing Sunday-school there, and recent additions to the church membership.

Plans are under way for the completion of the Temple Church, Kansas City, Kan. The cost will be about $8,000 and the pastor. J. N. Crutcher, announces that the money has been raised.

A reception was tendered N. H. Robertson by his congregation at Fairbury, prior to his leaving for his new charge at Stanford. Ill.

Services have been resumed at the First Church, Galesburg. The pastor, J. A. Barnett, spent part of his vacation at Winona Lake, Ind., attending the Bible Conference.

The congregation of First Church, Marion, Ind., gave a reception at the church last week. It was in the nature of a farewell to J. Boyd Jones and a welcome to J. P. Myers, who succeeds him.

The Kerr Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., Roy E. Deadman, pastor, is doing splendid work and making splendid progress. Secretary McCash will dedicate their new church in October.

Francis A. Ware, American Christian Missionary Society evangelist in Washington, recently held a meeting at Chemeloh, adding seventy members and greatly strengthening the work.

The board of managers of the Foreign Missionary Society, consisting of the life directors and executive committee, will meet in the First M. E. Church, Topeka, Kans., Oct. 11, 3:30 p. m.

A. Martin is now established in his work at Morgantown, W. Va., the seat of the State University. In July, in spite of vacation season, their Sunday-school became the first front rank school in the state.

Thos. Lennox reports a good work last month at Pensacola, Fla. A missionary rally produced $50 for American missions and $800 was raised on building fund. Increased attendance in all departments was observed.

C. E. Bacon, formerly pastor of the Broadway M. E. Church, Indianapolis, is the newly elected secretary of the Federation Council of the Disciples in America. Mr. Bacon's headquarters will be in Chicago.

G. A. Richards has accepted the pulpit at Manhattan, Kan., resigning his position as superintendent of the state reformatory at Hutchinson, Kan. He will succeed W. T. McLain.

Herbert Yeuell, who has been on a tour of two months in Europe, is conducting a meeting at Marshall, Ill. He is assisted by the pastor, R. Russell, and Arthur Wake as singer. There have been forty-two additions.

Frank L. Van Voorhis, American Christian Missionary Society evangelist for Wisconsin, is getting his new work splendidly in hand. The American board is confident and hopeful of rapid progress in this great state in the near future.

E. E. Francis, for some time assistant pastor of the First Church, Tacoma, has resigned and will accept a position with the Western Washington Bible School Association. W. A. Moore is pastor of the First Church.

P. C. Macfarlane, the Brotherhood Secretary, recently visited Stockton, Cal., and held a fine rally among the men. A good strong committee was appointed and it is expected a Brotherhood will be organized soon.

J. H. McWhirter closed a good meeting at Orth, Tex., August 28th. There were 15 additions. He dedicated the church at this place when he held a meeting there a year ago. He and Mrs. McWhirter are now regularly in the evangelistic field.

Norman H. Roberts has taken the pastorate at Stanford, Ill., after a successful service at Colfax, Ill., of nearly five years. During that time a handsome church was built and 200 added to the membership. G. R. Southgate takes the work at Colfax.

Sunday, Sept. 10th, was the sixteenth anniversary of the pastorate of S. S. Jones in Danville, Ill., and the eighth anniversary of his service at Third Church. The work of Mr. Jones is appreciated to a high degree by his congregation.

The new season of the Chicago ministers' meeting opened with its first service on Monday, September 12. C. C. Morrison was elected president for the year with W. D. Endres, vice president and I. R. Lines, secretary.

John Ray Ewers of East End Church, the newly elected president of the Pittsburgh Ministerial Association, presided over the first meeting of the season, held Sept. 12. The reports given at the meeting were encouraging.

The fourth annual convention of Oklahoma Disciples, recently held at Tulsa, reports a large attendance of delegates and many distinguished visitors. The sessions were held in the handsome new church there, of which D. A. Wickizer is pastor.

J. D. Hull has resigned the pastorate of First Church, Mishawaka, Ind., to the great regret of his congregation. The work has prospered greatly during his stay, a graded Sunday-school having been organized and about two hundred added to the membership of the church.

John Kovach, our new missionary to the Hungarians in Cleveland and Toledo, is getting his work well under way. He is supported jointly by the American Christian Missionary Society and Ohio State Society, co-operating with the churches in these cities.

The Disciples of Maryland and the District of Columbia have been in session at Belair, Md., the reports showing a healthy financial state in regard to money raised during the past year. The closing address of the meeting was by Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, on "The Disciples Obligation to Evangelize America."

The church at Owasso, Mich., is having a revival lead by Evangelist Roy L. Brown, of Ohio, and Charles E. McVay, song evangelist of Hardy, Nebr. Large audiences were present at the initial services. C. M. Keene is the local minister. The brethren at Owosso have a nice new building.

The work at Fitzgerald, Georgia, under the two years of the pastorate of Everett Hollingwarth, has shown a distinct advance. Outdoor services were held during the summer, and on the Sunday preceding Labor Day, addresses were made by three representatives of labor unions.

Floyd A. Beck, pastor at Dorchester, Neb., conducted an aggressive campaign in both church and Sunday-school during the heated term to avert the too frequent "summer slump." As a result the work starts this fall with good prospects, with an evangelistic meeting to begin this month.

Simon Tordoreika is American Christian Missionary Society missionary working among the foreign peoples in the tri-cities of Youngstown, Newcastle and Sharon, on the boundary of Pennsylvania and Ohio. In June and July he traveled 900 miles, preached sixteen sermons, held sixty-one prayer meetings and visited 436 families. This record shows commendable industry. Figures can not tell, and only God knows, the good such a messenger of the gospel does.

A new church has been erected at Junction City, Kan., and will be dedicated Sept. 25.

The conference recently held at Newton, by Iowa disciples, closed with a big Brotherhood banquet, the principal address being made by C. S. Medbury of Des Moines.

Nelson H. Trimble, now in charge of the work at Gary, Ind., is preaching a special series of Sunday evening sermons during September and October on subjects pertinent to Disciples. Mr. Trimble is making an especial effort to enlist the school teachers of Gary in the different departments of the church and Sunday-school.

The new Central Church at Marshalltown, Ia., a property worth, including its site, $50,000, was dedicated Sept. 18. I. N. McCash, of Cincinnati, O., delivered the dedicatory sermon. The new pipe organ was dedicated at a previous service, a recital being given by members of the faculty of Drake University Conservatory of Music.

John R. Ewers returned Sept. 10th from his vacation in Europe. He traveled through Germany, France and England, attending the Passion Play, which went far beyond his highest anticipations. The East End church, Pittsburgh, was elegantly frescoed during his absence and all the church property put in perfect condition. Prosperity reigns with this congregation.

In his initial sermon, after returning from his vacation, George B. Van Arsdall, Central Church, Denver, struck the key note of the spirit in which this year's work is to be rendered in the words, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Mr. Van Arsdall gave forceful utterance to the danger of the spirit dominating many lives—that of getting rather than giving. "Ceasing to give, we cease to have,—such is the law of love."

On Sunday, July 3rd, our new building at Anderson, S. C., was dedicated, with Albert Gulledge in charge of services. He reported it to be the most beautiful house of worship among the disciples in the state, and the most handsome building in the city. They raised at the dedication enough money to pay all local debts and a considerable sum to apply on the extension loan. The church has forty members.

The church at Modesto, Cal., established a beautiful precedent week before last when the members assembled at the mid-week prayer meeting to ask the Lord's special blessing upon the new pastor, J. J. White, and his family and the church. This is the way for a church to call a minister, and if this spirit continues success is inevitable. No sort of a reception could do for Mr. White what this special prayer meeting will.

Charles C. Wilson, of Bellefontaine, Ohio, who arranged a service Sunday, Sept. 4, in particular for laboring men, and representatives of labor unions, is following it with a series of Sunday evening sermons in September on the relationship of the Church and the industrial world. The subjects are as follows: "Socialism; What Is It? Will It Solve the Laboring Man's Problems?" "The Jungle Ethics of the Modern Business man," "Some of Bellefontaine's Needs."

The twenty-fourth annual meeting of the Moody Bible Institute was held Sept. 13, at the Moody Church, in connection with the opening of the eighth year of the evening department. The reports show the highest enrollment, numerically, in the history of the Institute. The students represented forty-two different denominations, came from thirty-nine states and twenty-two foreign countries, speaking seventeen languages. Considerable new equipment has been added, among which is a men's dormitory, with a dormitory for women in course of erection.

Plans have been consummated for the removal of the old ladies from the home at Eugene, Ore., to the new home at Walla Walla, Wash. Auntie Todd, who is over a hundred years old, will be provided for in Eugene. This is done because of her desire to close her life among the friends of many years. She has become so attached to the old home that it might jeopardize her life to undertake to transplant it now.

F. M. Rogers concluded his second year's work with the church at Long Beach, Cal., August 28. The day was made especially delightful by securing sufficient funds for the erection of an east side church. Mr. Rogers says, "This will be one of the churches erected in a day; and we have cnosen Labor Day, September 5, as the time to do it. There were 451 in the Bible-school of the above date and one added to the church.

Dr. and Mrs. Paul Wakefield left Springfield, Ill., last week for their station in the foreign field. They go to China. One of the thrilling moments in the Illinois convention was when Dr. and Mrs. Wakefield were presented to the convention and came to the platform with their two little children. The First Church, of Springfield, had passed on the Sunday before a set of beautiful resolutions setting forth their love for the missionaries and bidding them godspeed.

H. H. Peters of Eureka resigned the state superintendency of Illinois Christian Endeavor. In a trenchant valedictory at the state convention last week he criticised the policy of "everlastingly bombarding Christian Endeavor societies for special missionary offerings." Mr. Peters believes this is all wrong and thatChristian Endeavor should be primarily a training school for spiritual life, leaving each member to make his contribution to missions through the regular church channels.

Following the custom of many churches, on the Sunday preceding Labor Day, the congregation of Central Church, Pueblo, Colo., was addressed by a member of one of the local labor unions, setting forth the aims and needs of the organization. The pastor, Jay Elwood Lynn, followed with a talk along the same lines. It is a heartening sign that the church, both as a whole, and as individual congregations, is beginning to recognize its duty and responsibility in such matters, and in all civic affairs that go to make up the problem of humanity.

Thomas Edwards, for many years connected with the ministry in Northern California, is making an extended tour of the East, visiting Chicago, Niagara Falls, Montreal, Toronto, Boston, Baltimore, Washington and Philadelphia. He worshipped with the Englewood Church, Chicago, the morning of August 28th, and with the Jackson Boulevard Church in the evening. On his return he expects to visit the state convention at Springfield, Ill. His daughter, Miss Mary Edwards, has charge of the Chinese Mission in San Francisco.

At a meeting of the Disciples of Henry County, Indiana, held in New Castle, plans were formulated for more thorough and efficient work. Plans are arranged for an all day rally on Sept. 25, W. E. Thornton, of Cincinnati, to be the principal speaker. The churches of New Castle held union open air services during the summer, the ministers of the various churches preaching in turn. The audiences averaged two thousand and much interest was manifested. The present church was established as the outgrowth of a meeting held during the Civil War. The trustees have offered the ground as a site for a new government building, valuing it at $35,000, and if it is accepted a new, modern church building will be erected. L. C. Howe, the present pastor, is completing his sixth year of service here.

H. H. Peters, field secretary of Eureka College, served as platform manager and delivered a course of sermon-lectures on "The Sermon on the Mount" at the Fountain Park Assembly, near Remington, Ind., one week this year. It was his only vacation and was a radical change from the two years' difficult work in the field raising endowment for Eureka College. He seems to have made a success of the work, for Mr. W. I. McCullough, president of the Assembly, speaks in the following strong terms of Mr. Peters and his work: "Allow me to speak of the work of Mr. H. H. Peters, of Eureka, Ill., at the 1910 Assembly of Fountain Park. His platform management was admirable and added much to the success of the program in many ways. His morning Bible lectures were an inspiration to all who heard them. The lecture he delivered on one of the evenings during the week called out most favorable comment, especially as it was given in place of an entertainment which failed to appear. The Sunday morning sermon of Mr. Peters was a fitting climax of the week's series."

Stereopticon Exhibit at Topeka

At the Topeka Convention the General Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ will have in operation almost continuously day and night a series of stereopticon exhibits, taking all of our various societies, educational institutions, etc. For this purpose a number of our organizations have already arranged to furnish lantern slides of good clear photographs of their buildings, faculty, etc., with the understanding that they may be called upon to defray a portion of the expense of operating the exhibit, but a number of our educational institutions have sent neither lantern slides nor pictures nor has our request for them any record of reply. The time is now at hand for active preparation for the exhibits and we would therefore suggest that those who have not made these arrangements do so at once. The lantern slides cost in Kansas City in quantities 25 cents each. To this should be added 5 cents per slide for lettering so as to be read on the screen. We can also run along with your lantern slides some information slides manufactured on the ground at Topeka at an expense of about five or six cents each. If you will see that undersigned is furnished with information regarding your organization either now or at Topeka, arrangements can be made for this bulletin service. All photographs sent us should be plainly labeled on the back, or if you desire to have the lettering done, please use India ink and white paper, pasting the label where you want it to appear in the picture. This would save some delay in our office and would insure an exact reproduction of what you send.

E. E. Elliott, Assistant Secretary.

Winona Bible Conference

On August 23rd, at our Church rally at Winona, Chas. Reign Scoville presiding, there were 205 present, about 40 of whom were preachers. We felt sure that if all knew what a feast we were having, many others would then have been there, and so we appointed a committee of six, with the writer as chairman, to speak a word through the press, calling attention of our people to the advantages of Winona.

Winona Lake is in North Central Indiana. The Pennsylvania and Big Four railroads pass it, and an interurban line, just completed, connects with seven trunk lines to Chicago, making it accessible to all parts of the land. "Beautiful Winona," as it is justly called, is one of the most charming places I ever saw. The lake is a natural amphitheater whose surrounding hills are covered with forest trees and grass, and from whose bosom numerous springs gush forth. The best of boating, bathing and fishing are open to all. There are 2,300 acres of land, 800 of which are in the highest state of improvement. Beautiful walks, drives, flower beds, all under the direction of a skillful landscape engineer, add greatly to the natural charms of the place. Of course there are innumerable cottages, boarding houses, hotels, auditoriums, and many handsome homes, so that great throngs can be acomodated; and I lived there cheaper than I could live at home.

The program is rich and varied. It embraces the best things that money can buy, and is suited to the taste of all, from those who want clean fun and foolishness, to such as wish for the profoundest and most practical things in religion. But I am to speak especially of the Bible Conference of eight days, from August 21st to 28th. G. Campbell Morgan, the famous London preacher and author, was chief speaker, with many others almost as famous, to assist him. Every phase of church life was treated by specialists. Preacher problems were dealt with by master minds; and to show how the preachers appreciated it, there were more than a thousand of them present. Sunday school work also was greatly emphasized by the leading lights in the Sunday School world.

We have within a day's run of the place not less than 800,000 brethren. Is it not strange, therefore, that we had only 200 people there? There should have been ten times that number. The institution is not sectarian. Though chartered and mainly built by Presbyterians, any man of any church able to do the work demanded, is welcome to the platform. And I know from Dr. Dickey, the Suprintendent, that they are anxious for us to erect a building as our headquarters, and have us come there regularly. The site for such a building would be donated.

They hope to make next year better than this. It is the purpose to give two hours a day, instead of one to preacher problems, and to organize a Students Training department. Additional emphasis will be given Y. M. C. A. and Endeavor work.

One more item I must-mention: Special rail road rates are established to Winona from all parts of the country, thus saving us both money and annoyance.

The Topeka Convention Call

The churches of Christ will hold their annual International Missionary convention at Topeka, Kans., Oct. 11-17, 1910. As president of the American Christian Missionary Society and in obedience to the constitution adopted at the convention in Norfolk, Va., I call upon all the ministers and churches to see that delegates be elected and provided with proper credentials.

According to the constitution, all life directors, those who paid $500 each to the society; life members, those who paid $100 each; annual members, those who paid $10 each, and presidents and corresponding secretaries of all state and provincial missionary societies are qualified delegates.

Each church is entitled to one delegate and one additional delegate for each 100 members beyond the first 100 up to 500. No church is entitled to more than five delegates. So reads the constitution.

It behooves us to do as the constitution has provided and in the event that there is a desire to revise the constitution, ample opportunity will be given in the convention for taking steps to that end, but so long as we have a constitution, we have no right to do otherwise than call the convention to order under the adopted constitution. Seats will be reserved in the auditorium for delegates.

It is of pre-eminent importance than we lay all difficult problems before the Lord for his guidance. PETER AINSLIE.

Baltimore, Md., Sept. 14, 1910.

Soda Crackers Safe From Contamination

UNEEDA Biscuit, in their dust tight, moisture proof package, are protected against all those harmful elements to which bulk soda crackers are open—dust, germs, dampness, odors, handling, and even insects.

Maybe you've seldom thought about the matter. Maybe you've never realized as you've tried to eat a tasteless, tough, ordinary cracker, what uncleanliness and deterioration it has gone through.

Good interest is shown already in the annual offering as indicated by the receipts after the first Sunday. The churches, as churches, are over $4,000 behind last year's receipts on Sept. 1. This falling off is nearly all accounted for by a $3,500 offering from Independence Boulevard Church received last year, no offering having yet come in from that church this year.

At the board meeting on Sept. 6, many applications on hand for sixty days were carried over. Only two loans were granted. One of $5,000 was promised to the Temple Christian Church at Kansas City, Kansas, from the annuity fund at 6 per cent. The loan at Sikestown, Mo., was increased to $3,000. All other applications were laid over until the October meeting. It is hoped the September offering will be large enough to justify some grants at that meeting. The board can only do what these offerings make possible.

A magnificent work has been done with the fund this year. To September 1, 106 churches have been put into up-to-date and adequate buildings with loans aggregating $185,420. This is eleven months months' work. A most gratifying report will be made at Topeka. In no full year has the board ever helped 100 congregations to build. That has been done for the first time this year.

A gift of $300 was received on the 6th from a good friend to church extension. This is the 286th gift on the annuity plan. The annuity fund has built over 150 churches and now amounts to over $282,000. Annuity money given to church extension is all loaned at 6 per cent to house homeless congregations. Most of our large loans are made from this fund. Churches that cannot borrow logically are glad to get 6 per cent money when we have no 4 per cent money. Thus the annuitant has the satisfaction of knowing that his money is housing homeless churches while earning him an income of 6 per cent.

From September 1 to September 22 the corresponding secretary has visited the conventions of Eastern Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia, New England, West Virginia, Tennessee and Kentucky, and has assisted Philipsburg, Pa., Ninth St. Church, Washington, D. C., Vermont Ave. Church, Washington, D. C., and Whitney Ave. Church, Washington, D. C., to raise their annual offerings.

Churches should send their offerings promptly after the last Sunday of September as the books close on the 30th for the annual report. Let there be a glorious round up of offerings on Sunday, September 5, that the churches may show a great increase in their offerings on Sunday, September 25, that the general fund on September 1. The general fund is made up of the offerings from the churches and is loaned at 4 per cent to help the churches that are weakest and that are struggling the hardest.

Ohio Sunday-schools, Attention!

It is now less than one month till the great Topeka convention. Our national captain's call was for 1,000 front rank schools before that date. Will Ohio Bible schools do their part? Several schools have promised to do their best to reach this standard. My earnest request is that you do it now. Send to this office for blank applications, we will do all we can to aid you.

L. I. MERCER,
Sunday-School Evangelist.

Cotner Rally at Topeka

Sometime during the National Convention at Topeko in October the friends, alumni and students of Cotner University will meet in a Cotner rally. Last year at Pittsburgh we held a banquet after one of the evening sessions. This year we will hold a rally service at the close of one of the afternoon sessions. The time and place for holding the rally will be fully announced at Topeka. At this meeting we will have short and spicy speeches made by members of the alumni association, students and friends of the school. All Nebraska people are especially urged to attend this rally. Cotner University is now twenty-one years old. We want to celebrate this event at this rally. We are expecting such men as A. D. Harmon, R. W. Abberly, C. A. Finch, Geo. E. Ritchey, H. E. Wilhite, F. W. Emerson and many others who have gone out from Cotner to be present and make speeches. A special invitation is extended to the peopel of Kansas to attend this Cotner rally. To all that read these lines we say, go to Topeka in October, and when there do not fail to attend the great Cotner rally.

WILLIAM OESCHGER, Chancellor.

Notes From the Foreign Society

Two friends of the work who live in Akron, Ohio, have promised $5,000 to furnish and equip a new mission press for Vigan, Philippine Islands.

The writer recently attended the 80th anniversary of the Little Flat Rock, Indiana, church. It was a great service. This is one one of the greatest country churches in the brotherhood. It has contributed to the work of the Foreign Society since 1882, and in that time has sent over $2,600 to the work. M. G. Long is the pastor.

The Foreign and Home Societies are issuing together a fine booklet on Mission Study. Every preacher and Christian Endeavor leader ought to have it. It is free. The Foreign Society has two study books written by its own missionaries this year. Bolenge, by Mrs. Eva N. Dye, of Africa, and Breaking Down Chinese Walls by Dr. Elliott I. Osgood of China. These are fine books. Every church should have a class studying them.

The writer has just been visiting the conventions at Scranton, Pa., Joppa, Md. and Brockton, Mass. These were enthusiastic conventions in every respect. Your secretary accompanied Grant K. Lewis of the American Society on this trip. We traveled, spoke, ate, slept and missed sleep together. Lewis is a great fellow. Never have I heard finer speeches on Home Missions than he made. Everywhere he captured the people.

The Foreign Society will have a fine exhibit at the Topeka Convention. This exhibit will be in the rotunda of the State Capitol building.

The Foreign Society occupies all day Thursday, October 13, at Topeka. The Board of Managers meets on Tuesday at 3:30 P. M., October 11. This Board consists of the Life Directors and the Executive Committee.

Dr. L. F. Jaggard of Longa, Africa, reports the baptism of seven young men and five women. There is much rejoicing over this accession to its strength. Dr. Jaggard writes that they are planning to send a young man and his wife up beyond Lotumbe to spy out the land before they go up in the steamer which they hope to do soon after Christmas.

R. S. Wilson reports that the mission steamer "Oregon" is afloat on the Congo. She was launched on the 29th day of July. The launching was a great success in every

USE THE ELECTRICITY
Of Your Own Body
To Cure Indigestion

Andrew McConnell, the discoverer of this Science of Human Electricity, has proved that digestion is purely an electrical process.

The Peristaltic Action (churning movement) of the stomach necessary to keep the food from fermentation is due to the presence of electricity in that organ. Again, the attraction from the blood of the elements which form the gastric fluids is an electrical process and does not exist when this power is not present.

When one is weakened for any reason, the normal amount of electricity is not flowing to the stomach. Also when one overworks he uses in the brain or muscles the electricity which is needed in the stomach for the thorough digestion of his food. A lack of this power in the stomach means an inactive condition of that organ, and this inactivity results in indigestion—or fermentation of the food. There is thus a great decrease in the supply of building material for the body, a large falling off of the production of electric energy, and the circulation of the blood and life processes of the whole organism are interfered with. Indigestion is the primary cause of almost every form of disease.

Andrew McConnell has discovered the electrical laws whereby a greater percentage of the electricity in the body can be drawn to the digestive organs, giving the invalid the digestive power of a well man. These are physical treatments, which every one can give himself and which cure indigestion even when the best specialists fail to give help.

Dieting cannot cure, because the best food combinations require SOME power for their digestion, and when, as is the case in a weakened condition, insufficient energy is supplied, no method of dieting or drugs can effect a cure. If drawn to the stomach, there is enough electricity in the body, even when one is in the most weakened state, to digest ordinary food. This new system of self cure removes the necessity for dieting, and everyone can, through utilizing the electricity in his body, cure indigestion, and consequently the diseases which follow in its train—Constipation, Insomnia, Rheumatism, Nervous Exhaustion, Catarrh, etc.

Send for literature explaining this scientific system for self cure of all forms of disease.

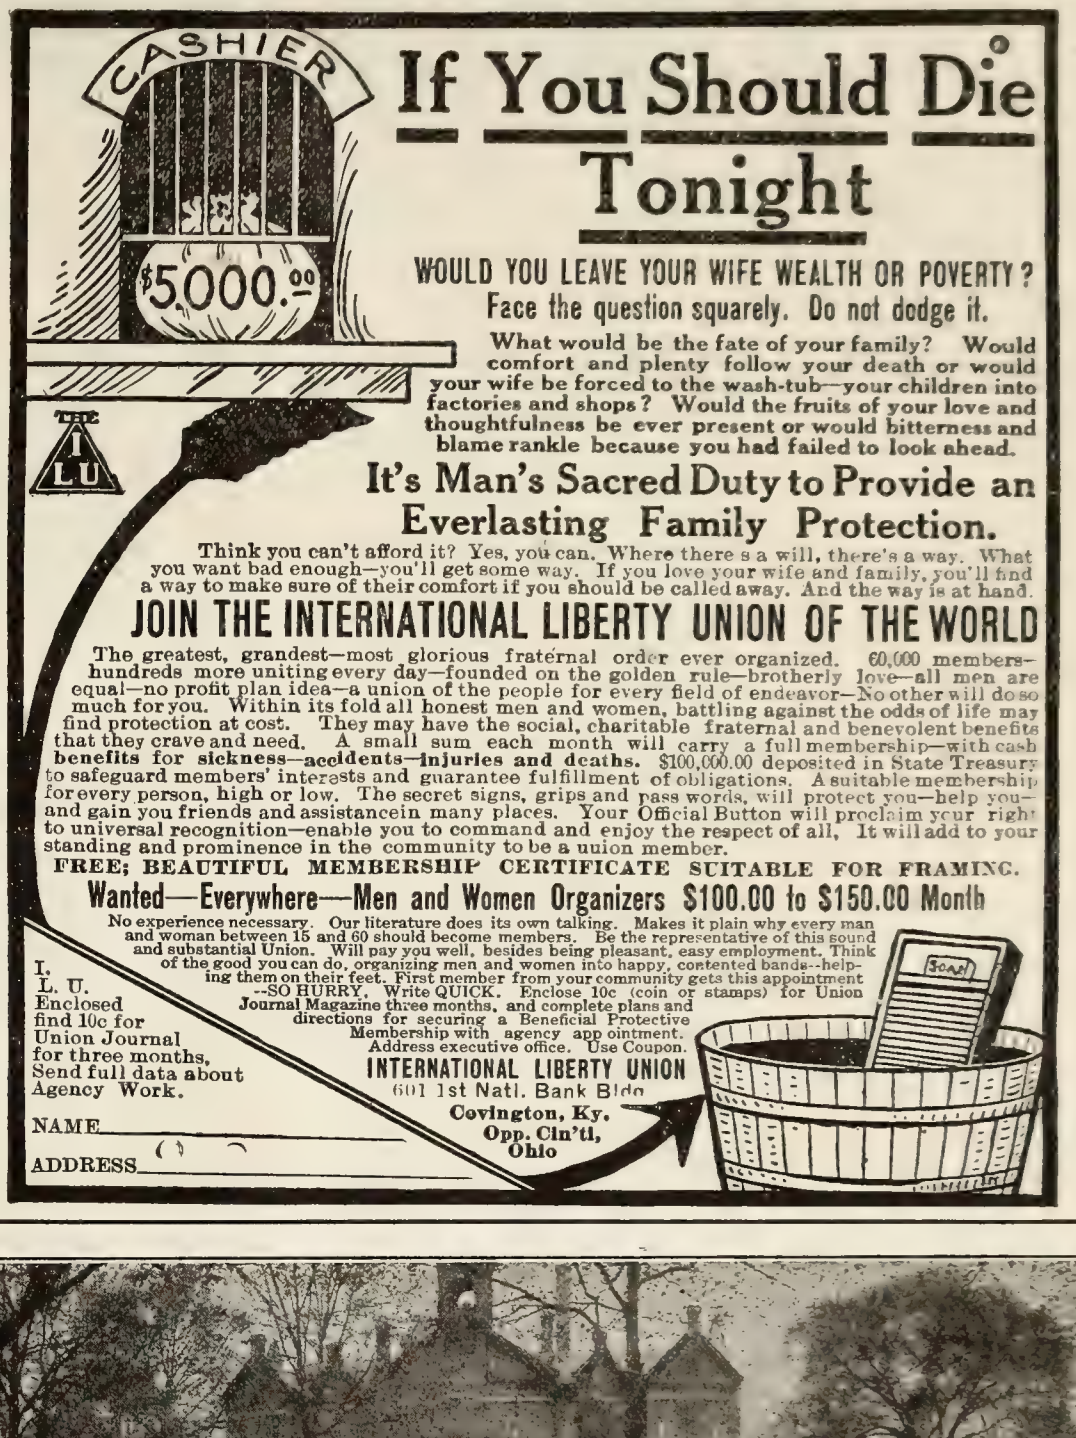
respect. The religious services preceding the launching were participated in by representatives of three societies, the English Baptist Missionary Society, the Congo Balolo Mission and the Foreign Society. After the launching all stood on deck and sang the Doxology. Mr. Howell of the Baptist Society has seen most of the boats launched on the Congo. He said that this was the best launching he has ever seen. It will take some time to put in the machinery and to complete the reconstruction.

James Ware, Shanghai, China, reports the baptism of ten men, all of whom have been in constant attendance at the inquirers Bible classes since they confessed Christ. Two young girls from Miss Lyon's school were also baptized. They are the children of two members in Shanghai. One of the men baptized used to be a bitter opponent of the gospel. He is now a candidate for the Bible College. Being a man of consecration and ability it is hoped that he will make a valuable worker.

James Ware writes that he has been with Frank Garrett to some of his outstations near Nankin. He was very much pleased at what he saw. Some of the Chinese helpers are fine men and the work is full of promise. He was also very much pleased with Dr. Osgood's medical work. The railroad has recently opened up an immense territory which is tributary to that hospital.



Chas. P. Hodges reports forty baptisms at Bolenge and ten more at Lotumbe.

H. C. Saun reports that there was quite a little cholera at Bilaspur, India. There is some there yet, but he is very thankful to say that there has been none among the Christians. The church work and the school in Bilaspur are doing well. The Evangelistic work has been hindered somewhat by the rains but the people listen with good interest. He reports that Ganesha, a young teacher, has just been located in Bilaspur. He has come from the Domoh Orphanage, and is a promising young man.

Dr. Shelten of Tibet, writes that they are now on the point of securing land for the mission. The American Legation at Peking has interceded on our behalf, and has requested the Board of Foreign Affairs to remove the obstructions in the way of our buying property at Batang. The Chinese officials cannot much longer hinder the work as they have been hindering it for some months.

The Missionary year closes the last day of September. The books close at that time and cannot be kept open longer. All who have moneys intended for the Society's work this year will please forward same so that it may reach Cincinnati by noon September 30.

If You Should Die Tonight

WOULD YOU LEAVE YOUR WIFE WEALTH OR POVERTY?
Face the question squarely. Do not dodge it.

What would be the fate of your family? Would comfort and plenty follow your death or would your wife be forced to the wash-tub—your children into factories and shops? Would the fruits of your love and thoughtfulness be ever present or would bitterness and blame rankle because you had failed to look ahead.

It's Man's Sacred Duty to Provide an Everlasting Family Protection.

Think you can't afford it? Yes, you can. Where there s a will, there's a way. What you want bad enough—you'll get some way. If you love your wife and family, you'll find a way to make sure of their comfort if you should be called away. And the way is at hand.

THE BETHANY GRADED SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

INTERNATIONAL COURSE

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR

Purpose—The purpose of the Graded Lessons is: To meet the spiritual needs of the pupil in each stage of his development. The spiritual needs broadly stated are these:
1. To know God as he has revealed himself to us in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ..... 2. To exercise toward God, the Father, and his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, trust, obedience, and worship..... 3. To know and to do our duty to others..... 4. To know and do our duty to ourselves.

COURSES	Age of Pupils	AIM	PUBLICATIONS
BEGINNERS		To lead the little child to the Father by helping him: 1. To know God, the heavenly Father, who loves him, provides for, and protects him. 2. To know Jesus the Son of God, who became a little Child, who went about doing good, and who is the Friend and Saviour of little children. 3. To know about the heavenly home. 4. To distinguish between right and wrong. 5. To know his love for God by working with him and for others.	Lessons prepared by FRANCES W. DANIELSON
First Year .	4		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Large Pictures (9x12 inches) Beginners' Stories—(Illustrated folder for Pupils)—Part I, II, III, IV	Ready
Second Year	5		Teachers' Text Book—Part I, II, III, IV Large Pictures (9x12 inches) Beginners' Stories—(Illustrated folder for pupils) Part I, II, III, IV	Ready
PRIMARY		To lead the child to know the heavenly Father, and to inspire within him a desire to live as God's child: 1. To show forth God's power, love, and care, and to awaken within the child responsive love, trust, and obedience. 2. To build upon the teachings of the first year (1) by showing ways in which children may express their love, trust, and obedience; (2) by showing Jesus the Saviour, in his love and work for men; and (3) by showing how helpers of Jesus and others learn to do God's will. 3. To build upon the work of the first and second year by telling (1) about the people who chose to do God's will; (2) how Jesus, by his life and words, death and resurrection, revealed the Father's love and will for us; (3 such stories as will make a strong appeal to the child and arouse within him a desire to choose and to do that which God requires of him. The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.

The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year. While these courses may be begun at any time, there is especial advantage in beginning at the beginning, October 1.

SPECIAL TRAIN OVER THE SANTA FE
TO TOPEKA, KANSAS
for the National Convention Disciples of Christ
OCTOBER 11 TO 17, 1910

This train, equipped with Standard Pullman Sleepers, Santa Fe Tourist sleepers and reclining chair cars (seats free), will leave Dearborn Station, Chicago, at 10 p. m., Monday, October 10, arriving in Topeka at one o'clock the next afternoon.

This special train will be operated under the auspices of the Christian Century, for the use of delegates and others attending the National Convention.

The equipment is all new and modern. The engine powerful and fast. The Santa Fe track is heavily ballasted,—double track most of the way—safeguarded by block signals and kept in perfect condition.

Fred Harvey will serve breakfast in a dining car that will be attached before the train reaches Kansas City and lunch at the dining room at Topeka after the train arrives.

You should not fail to attend the National Convention. It is of great importance that you be there.

You should make up your mind early and secure space on the Christian Century Special.

Illinois and Her Big City

Part of Address at Illinois State Convention.

BY PRESIDENT J. W. KILBORN

I propose to try to bring you a view, or at least a perspective, of the field in which we are planted—the imperial State of Illinois. There spreads before us a wonderful composite picture of "sweet fields of waving green; of dense forests; of great, gaping holes in the earth, out of which the grimy sons of toil are digging black diamonds to satisfy the insatiate demands of thousands of smoking furnaces; we salute your olfactories with the odors from more than twelve thousand producing oil and gas wells; we invite your attention to a vast acreage of undulating prairies, to hundreds of thriving villages towns and cities; to note that this wide expanse called the "Prairie State" is traversed by mighty rivers whose broad bosoms throb with the pulsations of diversified commercial interests; while the whole fabric is interlaced and bound together with glittering bands of steel, over which thunders the iron horse, or which might have sprung out of dreamland to meet the impact of the omnipresent trolley car.

Rev. J. W. Kilborn, Pastor,
Mt. Carmel, Ill.

And this great picture is 385 miles long at its extremest points, while its greatest width is 218 miles. Its soil is a rich, warm loam, remarkably fertile, requiring little or no artificial stimulation, readily adapted to agriculture, and yielding a maximum of profit in return for a minimum expenditure of toil. The known coal fields cover approximately an area of 40,000 acres—an inexhaustible supply—to say nothing of immense deposits of lead, zinc, limestone and commercial clays of various kinds.

In agriculture, our state is surpassed by only one—Iowa—but our products would feed the world and we might most fittingly be called the storehouse of the universe. A significant feature of recent years is the retirement of thousands of rich farmers to the villages, towns and cities, leaving the operation of the farms to tenants—a fact to be reckoned with in plans for the evangelization of the rural districts. Illinois is the most important manufacturing state west of the Allegheny mountains, and is even surpassed by but two in the East, these being New York and Pennsylvania

In the undesirable list, Peoria comes to the front as the largest producer of high wines in the whole of the United States. We have a reputation to sustain for being first, and so we cannot lag, even in this soul destroying commodity. Our population exceeds 5,000,000, making us the largest state between New York and the Pacific coast. The German born are more than twice as numerous as any other foreign element among our citizens, the Scandinavians are largely in evidence, being about equalled by the Irish, of whom there are not so many proportionally as are to be found in the East. The foreign population totals more than a million—and it is said to be actually true that there is not a language—and scarcely a dialect—spoken on the face of the globe but may be found in some of the population of the Prairie State

The urban population is more than half the total, some seventy places showing more than 4,000 inhabitants each, while some ten number more than 25,000 each. It is estimated that the Methodists and Catholics are about equal in number, while the Baptists, Disciples of Christ, Presbyterians, German Evangelicals, Lutherans, and Protestant Episcopalians rank in about the order named. At general educational, charitable and penal institutions it is not necessary that we shall more than glance at this time, pausing merely to say that in these particulars we think we are fully abreast of the times and that there is no need for us to apologize to any of our sister States. I do set apart a short section, however, to the great city by the lake, the future metropolis of the world, for she presents to us one of the mightiest, if not the supreme one, of all the problems with which our state missionary service is face to face. "It is a condition and not a theory which confronts us," and it is time for us to take hold of it manfully and righteously.

In population, this magnificent city numbers more than two millions. Some of the very best people living in the world make their homes here, and some of the vilest, most degraded and abandoned of all criminals, both male and female, that have ever drawn breath upon the face of the earth, infest its dives, saloons, dance halls and every place in which a human being can eke out an existence. There is not a single crime known to the calendar that is not daily committed in some section of the city, the homes of the rich being visited with deeds of violence and shame, as well as the abiding places of those in the so-called lower walks of life. Crime does not by any means hide its head and skulk in the shadow of the dive and hovel, but stalks like a grinning death's head through the halls of the rich as well. The vile saloon and den of infamy furnish hiding places for the criminal and outcast of every nation under heaven.

Every nation on the globe is represented in the population and almost every known language is spoken. Chicago is the largest German city in the world with the exception of Berlin, the capital of the German Empire. The Italian quarter swarms and teems with thousands, from the creeping infant to the toddling old grandfather. The Irish are numerous, sometimes industrious, but often insolent, dominate the police force and are more obedient to the orders of a Catholic priest than to those of the inspectors in charge of the various districts. Every religious faith catalogued in the latest encyclopedia and many cults not listed there, will be found to have taken root and to be more or less flourishing. Rites and ceremonies known and unknown to the ancients of all periods of the world's history are practiced, and every fad that the fertile imagination of the opposers of Jesus Christ can conjure up will be found to have its devotees.

To meet these appalling conditions we have just a few—and pitifully few they are—struggling churches. Not one of our congregations in Chicago but has to struggle for its very existence, and its minister must be a man of heroic spirit, willing to give up all hope of ease and plunge into a struggle hard, bruising and prolonged, if he shall even produce a faint ripple of opposition against the great waves that swell around him.

Now need we expect that these churches battling for their very lives shall be able to do much—or even anything—in the way of the evangelization of those mighty, careless, godless throngs? A man remarked not a great while ago that you might as well think of evangelizing hell as Chicago. I do not know how much he knew about hell, but I fancy he did have some acquaintance with Chicago. But coming back to the question, does it not seem that we are in duty bound to do something for the salvation f this great city? We have every reason in the world to believe that God desires the saving of all the people there, and in the face of the great commission we shall not be held guiltless if we leave untried any effort that will result in reaching the unsaved there

I beg to suggest that in our planning for the future there shall be some definite thing, large enough to be worthy of our numbers and strength, and that shall so appeal to our self respect, that we shall respond to the rallying cry of our state leaders and come up to their help because we believe that God would have us save this great city for Him.

Social Survey

BY ALVA W. TAYLOR

Social Work of Church vs. That of State

The social redemption of Ireland has not been the work of the church but of the state. The Irish church has not functioned socially. Its chief concern has been ecclesiastical. The battle with the landlords and the poverty they entailed on the land has been political rather than religious, in the accepted sense. Rome failed even to give the people a sense of their woes or a spirit of freedom. Suppose the pulpits of the dominant church in Ireland had preached personal liberty as those of the Reformation did—could Ireland have suffered the woes of serfdom for two centuries after all the rest of the western world had thrown them off? But Rome preached subjection instead and sought to do whatever she did paternalistically. She never inspirited her people. The love of saints was preferred to love of independence, and devotion to the rosary was greater than devotion to liberty. If one was sick, Rome would try to help, but to so recreate a nation that the causes of sickness and poverty might be removed, through the power of the people to help themselves, has not been the part of Rome in any history. With all the priest has done in a personal way, the church as a whole has been a burden upon the back of the people and has hindered instead of aided self-help. The fault is in the system. It has been more concerned with monks and nuns than with social welfare, and religion has never ceased to spell superstition to the Irish peasant; his mind is yet the wonder world of fairies and hobgoblins.

A Socially Inspired Undertaking

Over against the social failures of the church in Ireland is an example of what a socially inspired civic undertaking can accomplish. The Congested Districts Board has been referred to before. The story of the redemption of the Irish peasant could not be told without some account of their work. It was chartered in 1891 and commissioned to almost every conceivable economic and social function that the needs of poverty-stricken people could demand. After its work had shown the kingdom how five hundred thousand Irish families were living, the effective Land Purchase legislation was enacted and its activities were merged into the larger powers of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction—the Department of "Creameries and Dreameries," as the disgusted let-things-go-as-they-please crowd dubbed it. Horace Plunkett, a former Wyoming rancher, has been its inspiring genius and has made it one of the most gigantic and effective pieces of social enginery this old world has ever seen at work. If given support unto the end, he will lift the whole nation out of sodden inertness and passive resistance to a virile economic self-dependence. Technical schools are being founded all over the country and native industries, such as weaving and lace making, given life through them. The peasant girls come to these schools in their bare feet and with no skill. In six months they will be making the most exquisite lace patterns, wearing shoes and better clothes and fixing up the cabin at home. They are allowed the sale price of their product after cost of material is deducted, and many of them soon come to earn from four to five dollars per week. And the lace schools are but forerunners of what all sorts of technical instruction is beginning to accomplish.

Social Work for National Welfare

The work of the Congested Districts Board in Ireland is one of the most conspicuous and exemplary instances of social work for national welfare that has come across our vision. This board was given the income on a million and a quarter dollars of the Irish Church Surplus Fund and empowered to receive gifts for its work in addition. It has administered to the extent of $200,000 per annum and in addition has stimulated appropriations from county and district boards through offers to take the initiative in local enterprises or by making their help conditional upon local grants in aid. A mere cataloging of its activities will indicate the benefits it has brought and the fact that the poor tenantry that have received its benefits regard it more highly than either priest or political leaders, is ample testimony to its effectiveness. It has performed the function of a civic or social pastor.

Its first work was to set apart as Congested Districts, those sections of the land where the Poor Law valuation did not exceed an average of thirty shillings per annum. The Poor Law rating was just about equal to the annual rental. Therefore the territory they were to operate in was sections where the average rental per capita was about seven and one-half dollars. The average family income in these districts was found to be from seventy to one-hundred and fifty dollars per year. The chief field of their activities has been in the west, from Donegal on the north to Cork in the south. A million people were found in distress and the task was herculean, but the success of their undertaking has been one of the modern marvels. They help to self-help and do not pauperize with the customary charity, as the historic methods of the Catholic church have tended to do in Catholic countries.

An Instance in Point

Here was a multitude of people living in a stony and boggy country and in the recesses of the rocky west coast. Their condition has been described in former paragraphs of this series and could scarcely be overdrawn. The board furnished good seed for the fields and taught the tiller of them how to better prepare and care for his poor soil. Instructors were sent among the people, experiment stations were established, and a superior class of stock was introduced, all at cost or less than cost, or if necessary as an outright free gift, to get things started. The boggy lands were drained, waste lands reclaimed, wooded lands "conserved" and the size of the holding increased by adding to them or by doubling up and moving many families on to new holdings elsewhere. The rent that was in arrears was paid up, roads and hedges were built with local labor, better cabins were constructed under skilled oversight but through loans and gifts from the board. Best of all, estates were purchased and sold to the tenants and thus the successful issue of land purchase given impetus. Nothing was given that could be paid for, but gifts were made where there was no credit and as a means of lifting people out of soggy despair, and public works were inaugurated that a wage might be furnished to local workers.

Disease lurks in every nook and cranny of these wretched hovels and the board destroyed whole groups of them and rebuilt them anew that the plague spots might be removed. Physicians were engaged to visit the people upon demand where before they had had none through distance and inability to pay. It may be said here, by way of parenthesis, that no more heroic example of human service can be found than that of the physicians and priests of these wild regions. It is no small sacrifice for an educated man to live out on the rocks, amid a poor and ignorant people, with no companionship and only the call for help about him, and especially if he be a priest, deprived of home solaces and companionships and sympathies. We were not surprised to find a solemnness on their faces and a trace of heartache when you talked of your world of rushing life and when the far-away romance of America came into the conversation.

Social Work for National Welfare

A concrete example of the work of this board is found in their establishment of the fishing industry on the west coast. Here were rich fields in the sea but the people could not well use them because of the smallness of the inlets and the ruggedness of the headlands, and because too, of the remoteness of the markets for small catches. Their little boats were endangered by attempts to round the dangerous cliffs that part the glens one from another and without the journey to open sea there was no market. The board leased and sold them proper fishing boats and tackle and sent them skilled fishermen as instructors. They built piers and curing stations and taught the women to clean and cure fish as the women of Newfoundland and Brittany do. Then they established shipping communications with each inlet and marketed the product. It was so profitable that crews were soon formed who paid for the boats and tackle, and private capital was in the markets to take the products, and a profitable industry was set up among a people that had been almost without income and hopeless.

By Their Fruits Ye Shall Know Them

There are a quarter of a million agricultural laborers in Ireland. They receive an average of $2.75 per week in wages. They live in the poorest of the cabins and existence is from hand to mouth. The wage ten years ago was but from $1.50 to $2.50 per week. Out of these wages they paid two shillings per week for the hovel. Through Agricultural Laborers' Act 50,000 decent three-room cottages have been built for them and around each is an acre of garden. The government loans the [illegible]nd a rental is charged that will repay the loan and keep up the property. The cottage costs the tenant from 25 to 35 cents per week, and to it must be added the "rates," or taxes, which will run about one-half more. The cost of buildings was from $400 to $500 and the acre on which they stand would average about $150 more. Concrete or stone is used in the structure and at the end of sixty years the debt will be discharged. The rent is no higher than for the old hovel, yet there is cleanliness, comfort and civilization in the new home and the man who has thought the toil of common labor his everlasting portion and that of his children after him, begins to aspire to a little farm of his own while his children will be able to escape the listless lack of interest in life that he inherited because they have a home while he had a hovel.

"Irish, If It's a Crime"

There were 10,000 cabins in Ireland with but one little window apiece. Soon there will be none. There were 200,000 country families living on from $70 to $300 per year when the Congested Districts Board began its work less than twenty years ago. Soon there will be few receiving less than the higher sum unless it be those who crowd into the cities. One-half of all the population has left the island in former years. The emigration will soon begin to decrease unless all signs fail, for the youth are to be given means to help themselves at home and Ireland is dearly beloved by her sons and daughters. The name Irish has become a byword because of the misfortune of the people, and those who wear it proudly among their fellow-countrymen confess it apologetically among others and say, as a witty Irish woman did recently at Hull House when asked her nationality, "Irish, if it's a crime." There was defiance in her voice because she was not ashamed of it but supposed, as a matter of course, that she would be expected to be. Once the government wiped out 217,000 small holdings in favor of the landlords; today she is wiping out the landlords in favor of the small holders and trying to help the people to buy out the estates she once took from them to bestow on the favorites of kings and governments. She has so far restored 300,000 holdings to the hands that cultivate them. There are yet 200,000 to be taken over but the work has been done with marvelous rapidity when one considers the immensity of the task and the strength of aristocracy in property rights in Great Britain. Once the island was ruled through the penal laws and it was almost a crime to be a Catholic; today Ireland rules herself in all local matters and will ere long have a provincial legislature. The price she must pay is that of priestcraft and it will be to her own enrichment to pay it. Her past has been that of turbulence, riot, poverty and emigration; her future is to be that of peace, plenty in a growing measure, and a renaissance of Irish national life. Already the business houses of the cities carry the Irish language on all their signboards and the pupils in the schools are taught it. The old folk songs and legends are taught as a literary accomplishment and Cork University will make an examination in the old Gaelic, an entrance requirement after two years more. When a people gladly surrender their racial differences for the sake of a larger life it is wholesome and good, but when they are robbed of it and a nation dies in the surrender, it is tragic. Domestic industries are replacing the old barren life of the cabins, and hands that once were destined to be gnarled with toil for the landlord, are learning the skill of an industrial art, and the standard of living is in the ascending scale. To have raised the standard of living for a people is civilization's greatest triumph.

Churches in Midst of Squalor

When Horace Plunkett suggested that the money spent in building splendid churches in Ireland could be better used in helping the people to an income and a better way of living, he was denounced as an enemy of religion. In that incident was seen the jostling of the medieval against the modern. All over the island one sees splendid churches. Out in the country where property is most pathetic, the parish church is splendid enough for a congregation of well-to-do people. In Cork we went from the Catholic cathedral to the rows of hovels from which the worshippers at its shrines come, and later to the new St. Finbarr's Protestant cathedral, one of the finest churches of late construction we have been permitted to look upon in any land. But there was no evidence in either case that the "establishments" which conducted their religious exercises were using their magnificent sanctuaries for aught but mass and prayers.

On the other hand the Congested Districts Board was lifting a multitude out of despair into hope by going to them and doing the one thing needful. It is said that the Irish Catholic, like the ancient Jew, tithes all that comes into his hand. We could not verify this, but good Catholics told us that he must always take his offering to mass and that it costs him a fee to be born, to marry and to be buried, while his shriving in the confessional and the pardoning of his overt sin laid tribute, and after he is dead his mourning loved ones must further contribute out of their poor funds to hurry his soul heavenward. What if the church of his choice were a mighty social force and adjusted all her mighty machinery to the vital problems of living instead of keeping her ancient connections with rites and ceremonies that veil the open truth and conceal the carrion of ancient superstitions? What if she freed her devoted priesthood from masses and confessionals and took them from scholastic studies into the world of reality and made of them an army of the Lord for the redemption of his people from poverty and ignorance and economic oppression? Had the Catholic church been unburdened of her ancient traditions and invested with the humanitarian zeal of a Horace Plunkett and his co-workers, she would have been the power for human welfare that he and his governmental agencies have been. She might not have managed farms and established fisheries, but she would have inspirited a nation with love of fellow-man, and the heel of the landlord would have long ago been lifted from the neck of the cotter. When the church ceases to fight the battles of the poor and preaches that misfortunes and oppression are the will of God she loses her God-given task. She but goes to Bethel to sin and to Gilgal to multiply her sins, for her forms and ceremonies become hollow mockeries to the Christ who went about doing good and through whose teachings of human worth have been brought all the boons of modern civilization to our time.

Separation Unto Service

The Christian service is more than ceremony. The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is a God of order and righteousness. His laws are written in the constitution of the universe where men may diccover them and learn to honor them. They are written in the hearts of men and in the social order. What God is doing for us men is revealed to us in the person of Christ. Christ delivered men from calamity and sin. We serve Christ if we help one another to subdue forces to human uses and to bring wilful impulses into harmony with the spiritual order. The worship of the Lord's house is designed to impress upon our hearts the character of God and to give a sense of the reality of the spiritual kingdom. Worship is a genuine service when it encourages faith and represses cynicism and strengthens the purpose to put men above things.

There is danger in the idea of separation. The Pharisee was a separatist. The self-righteous of the present are proud of the fact that they are unlike other men. The employment of one day as a day of worship is considered a sufficient reason for relying upon the special favor of God notwithstanding the lack of consistency between the professions of the Lord's day and the practices of the other days of the week. The way of escape from the danger of separation is to emphasize the service to which the disciples are called. We cannot too often remind ourselves of the distinction Jesus drew between the greatness of his kingdom and the sort of greatness desired by the world. The man of the world feels great in proportion to the number of benefits he receives and the number of persons whom he brings under his authority. The greatness of the disciple appears in the good he does. If he commands men, it is never for his own glory but for the glory of God and that peace and good will may prevail throughout the earth. The benefits that come to him awaken a sense of obligation and not of proud superiority.

In this age of specialists it is rare to find a man big enough to appreciate all the interests that occupy the thoughts of men. In the university teachers in one department would have you believe that it is a waste of time and energy to study in other departments. The fault is not with science or philosophy or theology but with the men. They are only partially human. Now if the church rises to the greatness of its mission, it will teach men to appreciate the value of every department of knowledge and of work. There is need of men who are bigger than their specialty in science, in literature, or art, than their corporation, their union, or their political party. The great service of the church is to bring men together in the worship of a common Father who delights in all useful activities of his children. In so far as the church does this its existence needs no apology. Its separation from the world is justified.

Chapters From a Travel Journal

V. The Anglo--American Conference

It may seem a bit presumptuous to publish the chapter of this travel journal treating of the Anglo-American Conference on Christian union several weeks after the graphic report of the same conference, written by Rev. Leslie W. Morgan, appeared in the columns of The Christian Century. I am persuaded to do so, however, by the belief that the Conference was significant enough to call for interpretation by more than one mind, and by the fact that the Conference was so much the product of Mr. Morgan's thought and toil that naturally he would be modest in assessing it.

The Conference, interesting enough, was opened on the Fourth of July, the anniversary of the day the American republic was born, the anniversray of the day England lost her most prized colonies, yet it was called "Anglo-American," symbolizing the reunion which, in these latter days, is being cemented by the manifold interests and aspirations of the two nations. Much as we would have enjoyed the reception given by Ambassador Reid that afternoon we preferred Caxton Hall to the Embassy, and we were not disappointed.

In looking forward to the Conference I confess I had conceived it as a humble and obscure affair. Knowing that the Disciples of Christ are numerically a feeble folk in Britain I half-cynically imagined that the biggest thing about the Conference would be its eloquent name! I began to be undeceived on Sunday morning while hastening through the underground "tube" station to catch a train. There in brilliant red letters on the bill boards was my own name shouting at me. With inescapable self-concern I read the context and found that the bill was a splendid advertisement of the Anglo-American Conference with the names of all the speakers and their subjects. I was on my way to Mr. Morgan's church to preach for him that morning and on inquiry found that the business center of London had been supplied with 1,700 such posters at not a little expense.

Next day I was further undeceived on discovering the commodious and comfortable place of meeting. Caxton Hall is situated but a few steps from the Parliament House and Westminster Abbey. It afforded an adequate and dignified place of meeting. And when the first session opened Monday afternoon there was an audience of 250 or 300 persons present. Larger attendances were present at subsequent sessions until on the last evening there was an audience of 350 or 400 people. We noticed a goodly number of London ministers there, not so many, however, as might have been expected from the fact that a circular announcement had been sent to most of the Protestant preachers of the metropolis.

The Americans present had, most of them, been at the Edinburgh Missionary Conference and were thrilling yet with the electric utterances of the missionary leaders on the theme of Christian union. They were ready in heart, therefore, for the thoroughgoing, unequivocal putting of the case by the first speaker on the program, Rev. T. E. Ruth, pastor of the Princes Gate Baptist Chapel, Liverpool. Mr. Ruth captured every hearer, and especially his Disciple hearers. He was evidently facing the whole fact of division, without sectarian bias or reserve. He is a winsome orator, speaking with glowing fervency and magnetism. No sooner had he gotten into his address than everybody present knew the conference was to be a great occasion. I shall not here reproduce any part of this address nor of the others.

Mr. Ruth was followed by President A. McLean, of the United States, on "The Scriptural Basis of Union." The address was a marvelous induction of the Scripture teaching bearing on this theme. I venture to say that nine-tenths of its words, if they were actually counted, would be the words of the Bible. And these quotations were so organized upon a logical structure of the speaker's own, and interpreted with such fine mysticism, as to grip and hold his auditors until the end.

That evening the two speakers presented an interesting contrast. The first was one of the most influential evangelical leaders of the Anglican church, the Rev. Prebendary Webb-Peploe, of St. Paul's Cathedral. Mr. Webb-Peploe is one of the makers of the Keswick convention and a leader of the movement which draws its inspiration from that summer assembly. He speaks in the well-known vocabulary of that school of pietists which has greatly influenced evangelism in America through the Northfield school and the Moody Institute in Chicago. A superb type of manhood, his venerable, but not aged, personality was most impressive.

Following him came Dr. Errett Gates, of the University of Chicago. Youthful, critical, scholarly, he was the opposite of his predecessor. He spoke in a different vocabulary. He was thinking of a different set of problems. The unction and dogmatism of the first speaker was not present to the second. Dr. Gates approached the subject as you would expect a university professor to do. He traced the history of Christian union movements before Campbell's day. He analyzed the Campbellian movement in its earliest stages, as a true scholar must do, to find the essential principle of it. But the tolerance exhibited in his paper gave some the utterly erroneous impression that Dr. Gates was not himself soundly evangelical in his views. The evening was most instructive, and helpful in forwarding the purposes of the Conference.

Next morning the first speaker was Dr. W. L. Watkinson, representing the Wesleyan denomination. He spoke with a tenderness and delicacy of insight that fully explained why I had taken such delight in reading his books. I did not expect to see so aged a man before they introduced me to him, but as his address proceeded it was clear that the mind in this frail body is still a growing mind. Dr. Watkinson is alive to all the currents of present day thinking. He is tolerant and inquiring in a marked degree. I can say this for him, that I listened with such eagerness to his words that I quite forgot I was to make the next address.

That afternoon a company of us were taken through a portion of the British Museum, guided by Rev. Wm. Durban, confessedly the most erudite man in the Disciple fellowship in Great Britain. The bewildering maze of things in this most marvelous collection in the world seemed quite familiar to our leader who made our too-short exploration most interesting while it lasted.

The evening sermon was to close the Conference proper. Rev. C. Silvester Horne was the first speaker. He came over from the House of Commons, of which he is a member, and after addressing the meeting was compelled to return at once. Mr. Horne is the most popular preacher in England. I mean popular. The mantle of Dr. John Clifford, England's long-time militant preacher-leader, has fallen upon Silvester Horne. His great work at Whitefield's Chapel in Tottenham Court Road was recently written up in a fine article by Mr. Morgan in The Christian Century. Mr. Horne possesses a winsome voice and a frankness and informality of address that is irresistible. I do not imagine he has thought his way very far into the problem of Christian union, however. His address breathed a fine irenic spirit, and was in many ways singularly helpful, but he did not seem familiar with the problem faced by the Conference.

Dr. J. H. Garrison, editor of the Christian-Evangelist, of St. Louis, was the next speaker, and the last of the Conference. Here stood a man, we all felt, whose life has been dedicated to this holy enterprise of helping God to answer the prayer of His Son that his followers might be one. Dr. Garrison was received with great enthusiasm. There was tenderness and grace in his words. In the midst of his argument his soul broke through his logic and cried, "O, that my life might be spared to behold God's children in one fold with one Shepherd! Then might I depart to rest in peace!" The argument of Dr. Garrison's address was that the seven unities in Paul's letter to the Ephesians constitute the divine foundation for the united church. It is my belief that this argument is a truism, and that it does not meet the real problem squarely and at close quarters; but this did not hinder me from responding with the deepest emotion of my heart to the leader of Disciple progress through the last third of a century. I could not help breathing a prayer that our own generation might produce leaders who would meet the new problems of the new day in the same spirit as that in which this leader has met the problems of his day.

And so the Conference closed. In a hundred years of existence for the purpose of doing just such a thing as this it was not until now that the Disciples of Christ had ever planned and promoted a Conference on Christian Union. Have the Disciples been so absorbed in doing those duties common to all Christians that they have forgotten that single duty with which they were particularly commissioned? Our English brethren have lighted a torch for us. Only twenty-five churches in Great Britain, most of these struggling for their life, yet they coöperated in work and wit and money, and brought to pass this notable and significant gathering. If such a Conference were called and rightly organized here in the United States it would command immeasurable respect and exert wide influence upon the religious world.

Editorial Table Talk

There is Just Time Enough

Has your church sent in its missionary offering yet. All the books close Sept. 30. Many readers of The Christian Century will receive this copy of the paper in time to send off the collection if they bestir themselves. Ask your treasurer or pastor or whoever is the proper officer whether the collection taken for Church Extension, Foreign or American Missions or any other general cause some weeks since has been lying in the bank all this time. Do not allow it to remain there an hour longer. Send it to headquarters at once so that the full strength of the year's work may appear in the reports at Topeka.

This Time the Women Follow the Men

The extraordinary success attending the Laymen's Missionary Movement has roused the church women of the country to undertake a similar enterprise for their sex. The year 1910-11 marks the fiftieth anniversary of the beginning of women's organized work for foreign missions in this country. The occasion will be utilized to hold a series of meetings beginning in October, covering thirty of the largest cities, east and west, and culminating in a great gathering in New York in the spring of 1911. Mrs. W. A. Montgomery, author of a number of missionary text-books, will make the tour of the cities, beginning at Seattle, Oct. 10-11, and reaching Detroit Nov. 19-20. The remainder of the journey has not yet been announced. The Chicago gathering is scheduled for Nov. 10-11. The plans for each city are in the hands of an interdenominational local committee. Chicago Disciple women have already appointed their representatives: Mesdames E. M. Bowman, E. D. Linney, S. Russell, O. F. Jordan and Austin Hunter. The program calls for meetings of various sorts—public mass meetings, smaller conferences, denominational rallies, a drawing-room meeting for specially invited guests and a noon luncheon for women at which social relations may be established to augment the missionary motive.

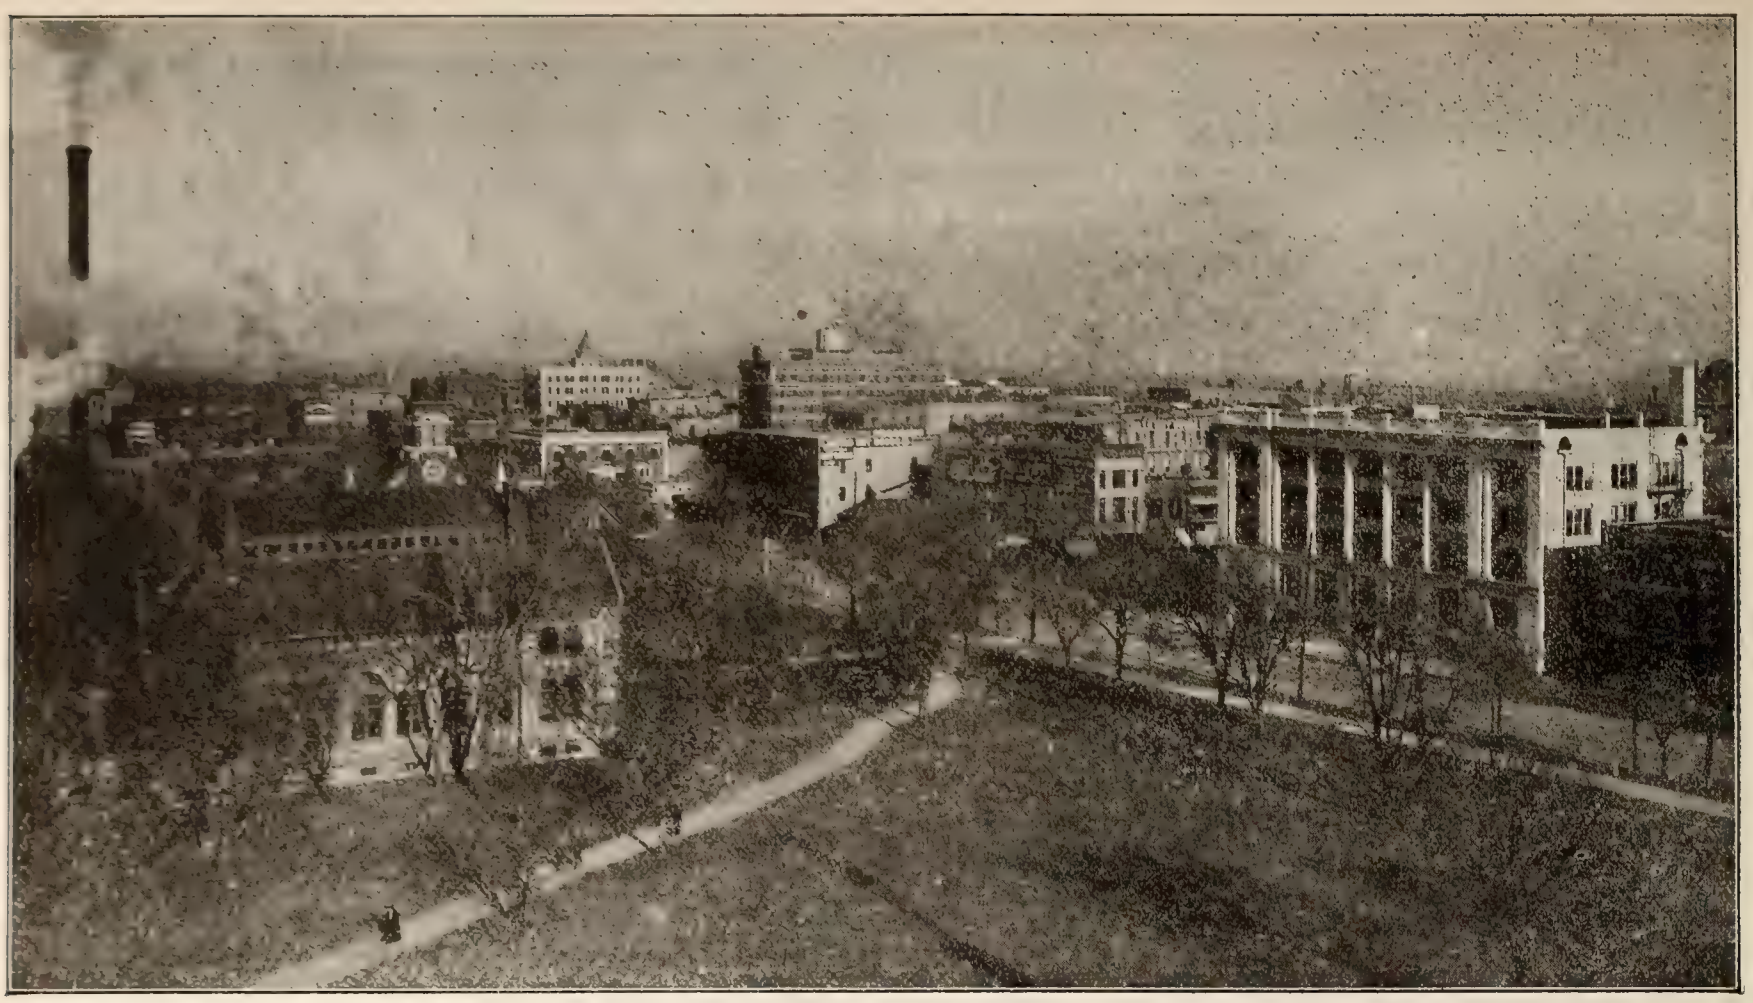
Unity a Solvent of Much Controversy

The tendency of the baptism question to settle itself when the church gets devoutly in earnest about Christian union is graphically described in an article by Dr. Paul Wakefield in the Christian Standard. He is reporting a conference on the Chinese Mission field called to consider the possibilities of further coöperation among the various evangelical denominations with a view to the ultimate unification of all Christian enterprise in that country. The baptism question did not seem to be an acute hindrance at all. This Dr. Wakefield explains by two considerations: First, that to a Chinaman a form is very important, and secondly, that to the Christian missionaries of all sects immersion is perfectly valid. "The Oriental delights in symbolism. For that reason the form of immersion is very rich to him. It should not be taken from him. But, more than this, a difference in form brings a discussion and so is a stumbling-block. The missionaries in the East are not looking for stumbling-blocks! We have no time to spend on theology, so we try to remove all appearance of division. All can immerse in perfect good conscience, and the symbolism is made as rich as possible. There is a decided tendency of this matter to settle itself. It can not all be done in a day, but it would be unwise to tell too freely the growth of this tendency to the churches at home, for they would not understand, and would think their people were 'giving in to the Baptists and Disciples.' I might tell you of a C. I. M. missionary who always immersed in China, though he himself had only been sprinkled. He got to thinking it might be embarrassing if some of his converts should ask him of the matter, so he came to one of our missionaries and asked that he immerse him. They went to the stream before daylight and our friend went away happy. I might tell you of denominational bodies that never immerse in this country, yet always do so in China. There are many individual mission stations where such is the practice. There is every reason that it should be so. The natural demand makes it the natural thing to do." In America and England the baptism question will be settled in much the same way, if at all. Immersionists may argue till doomsday, but they will never succeed in uniting the Church of Christ on the immersion dogma. But the moment the divided people of God awake to realize, as they do already realize it in China, that their divisions are sinful, then the baptism question will settle itself.

Magnifying the State Work

The committee on Recommendations of the Illinois Convention, held last week in Springfield, had the interesting session of painfully formulating a set of a dozen suggestions for the good of the work and of seeing them shot to pieces in good-natured hostility. One after another the recommendations were stricken out until none was left except that expressing the convention's appreciation of Springfield's hospitality. Some good recommendations went down in the general slaughter. That one calling for the state convention program to be devoted more to a study of the state problem was an inspired suggestion. The state convention programs deal too much with small things. The tendency of state conventions is to regard the state from the point of view of denominational interest. Too much time is taken up with the mere machinery of state missions and the mere machinery of local church life. This might be expected of a Methodist or Baptist or Presbyterian state meeting. But Disciples' interests are the interests of the Kingdom of God, not of a sect. Yet Illinois is never adequately treated. If the suggestive material in President Kilborn's address were taken as the basis, and six or a dozen men who rarely appear on the convention program were assigned subjects on which to write addresses for the next convention, the whole enterprise would be given a dignity and significance never yet attained by the annual convention of any denomination in any state. There was much sagacity in the committee's recommendation to curtail the professional pleader's place on the program in the interest of a fresh study of Illinois by Illinois men. And we believe if the convention had thought about it a little farther it would not have been rejected.

Wisdom of Children of Light



The Anti-saloon League is following the wisdom of the children of this world in building up a thorough organization to take in the last man in the city of Chicago. The unfinished battle of last spring has taught the children of light many things. They see that they cannot cope with the liquor forces in this great city without machinery equal in strength and reach to that so well perfected by their opponents. In each of the thirty-five wards, therefore, the anti-saloon voters are getting together. Churches are coöperating —in many instances through their Brotherhoods—to secure leaders and lieutenants and rank and file responsive to every call of the League. One ward has already been organized with about five hundred workers, each worker having definitely accepted specific territory—a block or two blocks or half a block—in which he will become personally acquainted with every voter, see to it that friends of the cause register and go to the polls, and use man to man persuasion to win over doubtful and hostile voters. If the good example of this thirteenth ward is followed throughout the city there will be a fight to the death when the issue comes up to the people again.

Deepening Responsibility for Chicago

A deeper sense of responsibilty for Christian work in Chicago was manifested at this year's Illinois state convention than ever before. The Woman's society recommended the annual appropriation of two thousand dollars, an increase from fifteen hundred last year. The president of the Convention, Rev. J. W. Kilborn, devoted large space in his address to setting forth the extent and depth and seriousness of the Chicago problem. A strong resolution was unanimously carried acknowledging the claims of this city upon the Disciples down state. The churches and ministers now working in this city are grateful for these signs of coöperation. The strategic character of Chicago for the Disciples of Christ will some day appeal to the entire brotherhood. This city is peculiarly hospitable to the message of the Disciples. But the possibilities of the field cannot be proved by the few men and their most meager present equipment.

Popular Story of Missionary Conference

The sagacity of the organizers of the Edinburgh Missionary Conference evinced in a multitude of ways, is further attested by the arrangement to provide a popular story of this epoch-making gathering. With the title, "Echoes of Edinburgh, 1910," Rev. W. H. T. Gairdner will interpret the meaning of the conference so that the busy man or woman, unable or unwilling to study the nine-volume report, may get the milk of this rich cocoanut without great effort The volume is promised about October 1, and will cost $1.

BIRD'S EYE VIEW OF PORTION OF BUSINESS DISTRICT, TOPEKA.

The Convention City

For the first time in the history of the Disciples of Christ its annual international convention will assemble in the Chapital of a great State where the liquor traffic is an outlaw and whose first city is without a single saloon.

For twenty-ore years the State has fought the combined power of the National Brewer's Association and has emerged from the conflict with the eagles of victory upon her banners. During all this time popular sentiment in favor of the enforcement of the prohibitory law has steadily increased and no party within the state would invite political suicide by adopting a re-submission plank in its platform. As a result there are thousands of young men in Kansas who have never seen a saloon, and the fifty thousand Disciples of the State welcome with pardonable pride the convocation of their brethren in October, not only for the inspiration that shall be given to New Testament Christianity, but also in the full assurance that the civic cleanliness and high standard of morals of the sunflower State will allure other thousands to share the advantages of this great home building commonwealth.

The City Itself.

There are seventy-eight churches; twenty-six public schools; sixty miles of paved streets; thirty-eight miles of electric railway; six great hospitals; four great trunk lines; a commercial club of nine hundred members; twenty-nine wholesale houses; one hundred and four miles of gas mains supplied with natural gas from ten to twenty-five cents per one thousand feet; twenty-eight hotels; ten banks with over nine million in deposits; the largest creamery in the world, and the state capitol costing three million dollars.

The Auditorium and the Great Pipe Organ.

One of the attractions of the middle West is the monstrous organ which was placed in the Auditorium of Topeka a number of years ago. No expense was spared in securing the best in modern organ construction that was available. The result is one of the four largest concert organs in the United States. It has five manuals including the pedal keyboard, about sixty speaking stops and forty-five hundred pipes. Many tourists and travelers are attracted to Topeka to see and hear this wonderful instrument, and a conservative estimate shows that over 100,000 people have listened to the great organ within the last five years. The Auditorium will seat 5000 persons and as the main place of meeting this magnificent instrument will delight and inspire all the sessions of the Convention.

The Santa Fe Shops.

The general offices and main shops (the largest in the world) of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway are located here. The room occupied by the shops, offices and tracks amount to one hundred and sixty-four acres. Delegates will be afforded the courtesies of the great locomotive works and coach building departments; passes and guides being furnished by the Company.

The Old Santa Fe Trail.

Delegates to the Convention in October will travel over historic ground. Since the day of Francisco Vas Quez de Coronado who, over four centuries ago, followed the general trend of the old Trail in search of the seven cities of Cibola and the kingdom of old Quivera, it has been the nation's highway across the plains.

In early fall when the soft amber haze of Indian summer weaves its spell of magic and mystery over the infinite prairies, one seems transported back again to the day—and the great oxen and mule trains crawled painfully across the arid plains to the inviting shadows of the giant Rockies. General Kearney commanding the army of the west followed the Trail in 1847 in his march upon Santa Fe during the Mexican war. In 1849 the overland mail was started and the discovery of gold made the Trail the highway of an enormous pilgrimage.

When schooner sail
Dipped along the Frisco trail

Those were the days of the American bison when, as far as the eye could see the illimitable grazing grounds revealed black masses of Buffalo moving north and south across the Trail. And not infrequently Cheyennes, Comanches, Kiowas and Pawnees stampeded the great herds upon the luckless emigrants who suddenly aroused from sleep by the thunder of charging masses were too confused to divide the black avalanche of terror-stricken animals and were ground to powder by this million-hoofed horror, a fate as relentless, if less cruel, than would have overtaken them at the hands of the savages.

Space forbids more than the mention of the famous Scouts associated with the Trail, but the names of Kit Carson, Jim Bridger, Jim Baker, Buffalo Bill and the notable Brent's Brothers speak of an age heroic—before the highway of the Trail became the highway of the rail—and of a type of men whose memory the nation would not willingly let die.

The Historical Society of Kansas, by means of granite blocks appropriately marked along the Trail, is preserving the historic route from the inevitable oblivion which time brings to all things, but to the dreamer they serve another purpose and appear as solemn tombstones marking the unknown and solitary graves of innumerable thousands who were sacrificed to change the American desert to a garden, and pioneer the wilderness path over the snow crowned Rockies to the swelling waters of the blue Pacific.

The Military Forts.

Delegates can arrange side trips to Forts Riley and Leavenworth and witness the maneuvers of thousands of marching men and enjoy the music of the superb military bands in their daily concerts. In the fall of every year the Government and State troops meet in mimic war presenting a scenic display of military evolution upon a scale of magnitude above that witnessed elsewhere in the United States.

On the banks of the Kansas river below Fort Riley stand the walls of a building in which the first territorial legislature convened. They were ordered to disperse by Jefferson Davis, who was then secretary of war. Upon their refusal he commanded the Colonel of the Fort to enforce order. From the heights above he trained upon them a piece of ordnance and the spot where the cannonball passed through the building is still shown,—it is needless to say that the intrepid free soilers immediately adjourned.

The hotels of the city offer rates from $1.00 to $3.50 per day. The Throop hotel has been selected as the headquarters of the Convention. Most of our delegates will find entertainment in the homes of the citizens where a uniform rate of fifty cents per bed for each delegate will be charged. Meals can be had at restaurants and eating houses for twenty-five cents.

Outlook and Appeal

A Centennial Convention Address as Peculiarly Pertinent to the First Convention of a New Century as to the Last Convention of the Old

BY MRS. LOUISE KELLY

It is a great thing to be caught up into the world-sweep of movements which are making the destiny of a race. A wise man of the age has said: "Nothing but deep insight into the Spirit of the Bible can enable us to form the faintest idea as to what historical events belong most to the divine plan, or have most relation to the Kingdom of the Eternities. To him whose soul is rightly keyed to receive God's wireless signals, great events in history are birth-hours, marking the progress toward that far-off goal—humanity crowned with divinity."

We who have assembled here today to celebrate the origin of the restoration of the church to its apostolic purity, are convinced that this movement marks the most important crisis in the evolution of the church, and that our God-given leaders whose names are honored among us, have been our sages guided by the star in the east to lead the world anew to the cradle of its desire—the Christ of God. It is he—the captain of our salvation—who hath won our victories. It is he who hath slain the giants of evil in our ranks, who hath stopped the lion's mouths, who hath inspired us to go forward without fear. It is he, not the historic Christ of Galilee who slept in a borrowed tomb, but the larger Christ of the centuries who stands in our midst with the radiant light upon his brow, pointing to the glorious future which beckons us on. If the century now beginning is to write new and grander chapters in our history than those already recorded, we must apprehend more fully the passion of the Christ and the place of the Church in its fulfillment. Our God expects—"That the hundred years ahead shall be as much more abundant in effort, intelligent in zeal and glorious in achievement"—as the century which began with the Declaration and address surpassed that which went before it. The past is swallowed up in eternity. We have waited for the vision. Behold, He goeth before us.

What of the Outlook?

The outlook is full of promise. Never have we so proved our right to exist as the chosen people of God, as in these last days when we have given the King's business our urgent attention and bent ourselves to our God-given tasks. This great assembly, and the record of the offerings poured into our missionary treasuries are eloquent tributes to our interest in the world-wide evangelization.

What a noble array of leaders have risen up at the call of the king to lead the church to further conquest, "Of devout men a great number, and of honorable women, not a few." Greybiel, Boyd, Ewing, the Whartons, Meigs, Garsts, Dyes, Sheltons, our princely young martyr, Dr. Loftis, the latest to fall, and scores of other illustrious names which are written in the book of God's remembrance and in redeemed hearts forever. How the ringing echo of these heroic lives thrill us like the calling of a mighty wind. No weak-kneed Christians, these, who have poured out their life-blood in labor and travail that the kingdom of God may come. It calls for the sternest stuff of which mortals are made to make a life decision involving toil, hardship, constant sacrifice. These are our stalwarts, our spiritual Calebs and Joshuas who have gone forth to capture the strongholds, the outposts, equipped only with faith in God and less than a handful of men. Let us thank God for a "type of gianthood to which all believers may both aspire and attain." Let us pause to voice our gratitude for the inspiration of the lives of our glorified ones, whose names are written in the "Westminster Abbey" of our memories; whose example of holiness, heroism, humility have saved us from our lesser selves to a holy fellowship of service; whose hands shall still beckon us up the steeps of duty, till love shall crown our efforts "on the shining tablelands of God."

Appeal.

While the outlook is full of hope, our eyes must not be blinded to the conditions which threaten our strength and peace.

There is danger that zeal for numbers shall out-rank our wisdom in the patient instruction that leads to transformed lives. Have the best results been attained by the heralding forth of the marvelous numbers gathered in at our great revivals?. Have not our Christ and his sacred plea been cheapened in the eyes of the world by these spectacular methods? Can we imagine the apostle Peter wiring the results of the great Pentacostal revival to Capernaum, and then calmly accepting a cheque of $10,000 for making it such a stupendous success?

That a great quickening is needed throughout the Church is sadly evident. It is not the sensational alarmist who is declaing that the church is facing her most serious modern crisis. Our most able, conservative leaders of religious thought affirm that the heart of faith is dying out of the church. Dr. Len Broughton of Atlanta answers the question, "What ails the church in America?" with these words: "The main deficiency as I see it, is in its faith. The church lacks fixedness of faith, which is the result of ignorance of the bible. The Church also lacks in application. It will never command the respect of the world until it is keyed to respond to every human need. At present it consents for temporal needs to be supplied by outside agencies which could not live but for the influence of Christianity. The Church cannot preach sympathy and friendship and then fold its arms and stand back waiting for some other organization to bring the supply."

Dare any of us affirm this is not a true picture? Indeed, we must all confess with shame and confusion of face that the spiritual life flutters feebly in many of our churches.

When the altar-fires burn dim in God's temple, what star shall guide the groping soul to its God?

I plead for a new type of evangelism which is the sane evangelism of Pentacost charged with the mighty power of God; whose herald shall be, not a Jehu, son of Nimshi, lashing into line with the raw-hide of fierce denunciation and scathing ridicule, pastor, choir, helpers, hearers; but rather a Moses, tarrying all night alone with his God, until he returns to his people panoplied with the power of his request, "Except thou go before me, I go not up hence."

Fathers Preachers, Mothers Pray-ers.

If the fathers of the Church were great preachers and debaters, the mothers of the Church were great pray-ers, and the fragrance of the morning and evening incense was kept in their lives by unseen censers while the life of the Church was kept in vital touch with its unseen head. Shall we be true to the larger plea of the advancing Christ who waits to convert His Church into a dynamo of life-saving power? Shall we be true to the larger position God is forcing us to take by virtue of the vantage ground gained through our proclaimed principles in the past? Shall we go forward achieving the larger victories which our present strength prophesies shall be ours?

Then, to your knees, O Israel! Let the fathers and mothers be true to their priestly function in every family. Let the altar fires be re-kindled in every home. Let the word of our God be restored to its primitive place and power in our hearts and lives. There are many paths "which wind and wind," but only one which "shineth more and more unto the perfect day." Many are running to and fro and knowledge is increased, but wisdom ever waits to hear the voice of God. False Christs are crying "Lo, here!" "Lo. there!" but there remaineth but one who has dispelled earth's midnight with heaven's glory, and caused life to spring from the bosom of death.

Can it be truly said of us that we are God's experiment before the world in Christian union? Then let us hasten to fill in and cover over every unsightly rent in our household of faith with the wonderful love of God, and learn to sing again with fresh vigor and meaning this old favorite of our fathers:

"How sweet, how heavenly is the sight
When those that love the Lord;
In one another's peace delight
And so fulfill the word.
When love in one delightful stream
Through every bosom flows;
When union sweet and dear esteem
In every action glows."

What Shall the Church of the Future Be?

It shall be the Church of today shorn of its weakness, divested of its angularities, stripped of its ease and sinful display of wealth—all schism, all bitterness swallowed up in the one consuming passion of spreading the redeeming, uplifting gospel of the Son of God.

It shall be a church filled with a positive, resistless purity of life, which not only escapes pollution itself, but wrestles with "whatever defileth, or worketh abomination or maketh a lie. A purity so assertive and contagious that impurity and corruption cannot co-exist along with it."

Do you charge me with painting too idealistic a picture to be realized in our present day conditions? I would bring before you the Church in Africa, which is so nearly the pattern of its great prototype founded on Pentacost we stand in amazement before its triumphs. We marvel that such grace of character can be carved from the flinty rock of heathenism in ten brief years. With every member a total abstainer from tobacco and liquor; tithing the minimum standard of all giving; with every tenth man in Bolenge and every fifth man in Manyeka a missionary, these noble Christians stand as an open rebuke to the type of Christianity filling our Laodicean Churches in America. They are "black, but comely," O ye sons and daughters of Jerusalem, and except we repent quickly they will sweep in to the kingdom of heaven before us. Behold God hath chosen the weak things of the world, and things that were despised to prove the might of His transforming power in lives wholly surrendered to His will, "that no flesh shall glory in His presence."

Be still and know that He is God!
"God is exalted among the heathen!
God is exalted in the earth!"

These triumphs of grace from all our mission fields are the seal of God's approval upon us as we enter in earnest upon our heaven-sent mission of world-wide conquest.

Shall we fulfill our destiny as the crowning effort of God for the unification of the Church and for the proclamation of His mighty gospel throughout the earth? Then let this centennial celebration mark the birth-hour of a new spiritual era in the life of the Church! May the Lord Christ lay his cooling hands upon our fevered pulses that they may grow quiet; that the scales of pride, narrowness, bigotry may fall from our eyes and we may see him—our incomparable leader, and our place in the fair design of his glorious plan, as He calls out His Church from among the Churches, and from all peoples, and kindreds and tribes and tongues, that He may present unto Himself a glorious bride, having no spot, nor wrinkle, nor any such thing.

Let the bride hasten to array herself in her robes of fine linen, pure and bright—for the Bridegroom waits!

"We and today! A church sublime,
And the great pregnant hour of time,
With God himself to bind the twain!
Go forth, I say, Attain, Attain!"

The Christus of Anton Lang

A Study of the Passion Play

BY EDGAR DEWITT JONES

To act the part of Jesus of Nazareth in the sublime tragedy of the Passion Play and in the presence of hundreds of thousands of people from all over the world is surely a unique, as well as a high honor. Anton Lang, potter of Ober-ammergau, for the second time has had that distinction and as these lines are written multitudes are discussing him and his role.

To an American boy the presidency of the United States is supposed to be the acme of his ambition. In a much more real sense, as well as devouter one, the lad who plays on the streets of the little village by the Ammer dreams of playing some day the part of Christus in the Passion Play. Anton Lang so dreamt and today he wears becomingly the crown of an Ober-ammergauer's ambition. Much has been written of Herr Lang, of his gentle manner, his humility, piety and kindly ways and the man is worthy of all such tributes. However, this paper is concerned especially with his art. How does he impress one as an actor? Does he meet the requirements for such an exalted role? In what scenes is he at his best and in which ones, if any, does he disappoint? To answer these questions, not from a dramatic critic's angle of view, but solely from that of the average attendant on the Passion Play is the purpose of this writer.

Most Stupendous Role.

At the outset, let it be stated strongly, that of all the roles of time or place, this one of Jesus of Nazareth is the most stupendous ever attempted by man. To satisfy everybody, would be, of course, an utter impossibility. Just as no two artists paint Christ alike, so there are as many different conceptions of the Nazarene almost as there are people who have knowledge of him. Nevertheless, there are certain aspects of his physical appearance that perhaps all are pretty well agreed upon. For example, no one can conceive of Christ as being gross, or coarse of person, nor can any of us quite drive himself to think of Jesus speaking in a rasping or nasal tone. However diverse the opinions of Jesus' teaching in their theological interpretation, we almost all feel, I should think, that personally he was gracious, even winsomely attractive and that his voice was low and musical in ordinary conversation. Now, even to dream of portraying Jesus Christ upon the stage impresses most of us as scarcely less than overwhelming. Therefore, let him who would criticise Anton Lang go softly and think twice before he writes his sentences. Having warned myself, and with some appreciation of the delicate and difficult task that is mine, I am ready to go on though cautiously and hesitatingly.

Lang's Physical Fitness.

First of all, how does Lang fit the part physically? As well, I should think, as any man who ever played the part. I never saw Joseph Mayer, Lang's predecessor, but judging from his pictures, I should say he was not as satisfactory physically as his successor. Certainly if his photograph is to be trusted, his head and facial expression were not nearly so strong as Lang's. Indeed, I should regard the fine head and beautiful brown hair and beard of Anton Lang as his biggest physical asset for his difficult role. They are really strikingly fine and becoming. But when this has been said, and this is a great deal, there remains little else to say for Lang's physical endowment for the part of Christus. In several ways I should feel he falls short of the popular ideal of the Christ physically. For one thing he inclines too much to corpulency. His chest is big, broad and deep—the chest of an athlete or a pugilist. His neck is thick and his general build has a decided tendency to stoutness. Then again, his voice is not always pleasing to hear. At times it grates on the ear and seems harsh or gutteral in some scenes. Yet when all this has been said and taken account of, there remains a masterful personality which in certain scenes is exceedingly powerful and, as a whole, is extraordinarily satisfying.

To me Lang never seemed so effective in any other place as in the Palm Sunday and Temple scenes. The brilliant spectacle of the triumphant entry into Jerusalem, the array of color, the beautiful children waving branches and crying "Hosanna," will live in my memory forever. Finally Jesus appears riding on an ass, so small that Lang's feet almost touch the ground but his posture is one of dignity—even kingly. The over-turning of the money changers' tables was finely done. Throughout that entire act Lang moves about with a calm and majestic mien. His very tread is certain, denoting reserve power and great strength of character.

The Anointing.

The anointing scene in Bethany would naturally seem to accord much room for strong acting, yet to me it seems weak, even insipid. Perhaps, if Mary had had some real fluid in her flask and poured it out upon Lang's feet actually drying them with her hair, it might have been more convincing, but I doubt it. The Ober-ammergauers are fine stage critics and doubtless they experimented a good deal with this scene before they left it as it now is.

The Upper Chamber scenes are in the main strong and impressive throughout. The foot-washing on Lang's part seems too hastily done and if my eyes deceived me not, it is make-believe water that was used, and by that phrase, I mean that like the perfume in Mary's anointing, this detail is done in pantomine. But the Last Supper is a superb piece of work. Lang is Christ-like in that scene and when he gave thanks for the bread and wine, I felt as if we should all stand and receive his benediction. The grouping about the table is surely modeled after DaVinci's famous picture and is strongly satisfying.

The Trial Scene.

In the Trial Scenes, I cannot imagine a mortal man so convincingly adequate as is Lang. Calm, sedate, perfectly poised, kingly, these are some of the adjectives that can be correctly applied to Anton Lang as Christ on trial before the Sanhedrin, Pilate and Herod.

The Crucifixion scene leaves nothing to be desired in the way of realism and fidelity to the New Testament text. Here one loses sight entirely of the fact that Lang is a little too stout or that his voice is sometimes harsh. Here he fills all requirements. People about me both men and women, wept through that terrible act. With what infinite tenderness Anton Lang as the crucified one, committed Miss Ottilie Zwink, as the mother Mary to the loving care of Alfred Bierling as John, the beloved! And who will ever quite forget his great cry, "Eloi! Eloi! Lama Sabachthani!" or the last word from the cross, with the falling forward of that noble head, the fine beard just sweeping his chest? Not I! Not I!

Resurrection Scene Disappointing.

The Resurrection and Ascension scenes did not appeal much to me. They seem anti-climax and artificial. But this is as it should be. Imagine a satisfactorw presentation on the stage of the Resurrection of Jesus from the grave—even the Ober-ammergau stage! Any attempt to simulate the supernatural on the stage will fail to convince as it should. The elimination of the angel's appearance to Jesus in the Garden together with the presentation of both the Resurrection and Ascension scenes in tableaux only, rather than as now by acts, would, in the judgment of many, strengthen the play and make the closing scenes truly climacteric.

But all this has little to do with Anton Lang, it is not his fault, if to many the last two scenes seem, after the crucifixion, inadequate and anti-climax. Perhaps this too is as it should be. For is not the passion of our Lord most clearly seen on the cross and is it not the hardest lesson the world has to learn—this one of the cross? And since ... is in the crucifixion scene that Anton Lang's art defies description and disarms criticism, may it not be truthfully said that his Christus while not the best acted part o. the Passion Play is as great as any man may ever hope to make that lofty role? I think it may.

The Moral Equivalent of War

Some years ago in discussing the question of abolishing war Professor William James, the psychologist, who died recently, pointed out that many of our most admired virtues are developed and conserved by a military social order. There is danger that these virtues will decay if a universal reign of peace is established. If war goes, Professor James said, society must provide "a moral equivalent of war." In what was probably the last article to come from this distinguished scholar's pen he reverts to this idea and further elaborates his meaning. The article is full of suggestion. It is found in the August McClure's. The following is an extract from it:

I do not believe that peace either ought to be or will be permanent on this globe, unless the states pacifically organized preserve some of the old elements of army discipline. A permanently successful peace-economy cannot be a simple pleasure-economy. In the more or less socialistic future toward which mankind seems to be drifting, we must still subject ourselves collectively to those severities that answer to our real position upon this only partly hospitable globe. We must make new energies and hardihoods continue the manliness to which the military mind so faithfully clings. Martial virtues must be the enduring cement; intrepidity, contempt of softness, surrender of private interest, obedience to command, must still remain the rock upon which states are built—unless, indeed, we wish for dangerous reactions against commonwealths fit only for contempt, and liable to invite attack whenever a center of crystallization for military-minded enterprise is formed anywhere in their neighborhood.

Let me illustrate my idea more concretely. There is nothing to make one indignant in the mere fact that life is hard, that men should toil and suffer pain. The planetary conditions once for all are such, and we can stand it. But that so many men, by mere accidents of birth and opportunity, should have a life of nothing else but toil and pain and hardness and inferiority imposed upon them, should have no vacation, while others natively no more deserving get no taste of this campaigning life at all—this is capable of arousing indignation in reflective minds.

If now—and this is my idea—there were, instead of military conscription, a conscription of the whole youthful population to form for a certain number of years a part of the army enlisted against nature, the injustice would tend to be evened out, and numerous other benefits to the commonwealth would follow. The military ideals of hardihood and discipline would be wrought into the growing fiber of the people; no one would remain blind, as the luxurious classes now are blind, to man's real relations to the globe he lives on, and to the permanently solid and hard foundations of his higher life. To coal and iron mines, to freight trains, to fishing fleets in December, to dish-washing, clothes-washing and window-washing, to road-building and tunnnel-making, to foundries and stoke-holes, and to the frames of sky-scrapers, would our gilded youths be drafted off, according to their choice, to get the childishness knocked out of them, and to come back into society with healthier sympathies and soberer ideas. They would have paid their blood-tax, done their part in the immemorial human warfare against nature; they would tread the earth more proudly; the women would value them more highly; they would be better fathers and teachers of the following generation.

Such a conscription, with the state of public opinion that would have required it, and the moral fruits it would bear, would preserve in the midst of a pacific civilization the manly virtues which the military party is so afraid of seeing disappear in peace. We should get toughness without callousness, authority with as little criminal cruelty as possible, and painful work done cheerily because the duty is temporary, and threatens not, as now, to degrade the whole remainder of one's life. I spoke of the "moral equivalent" of war. So far, war has been the only force that can discipline a whole community, and, until an equivalent discipline is organized, I believe that war must have its way. But I have no serious doubt that the ordinary prides and shames of social life, once developed to a certain intensity, are capable of organizing such a moral equivalent as I have sketched, or some other type just as effective for preserving manliness of type. Though an infinitely remote Utopia just now, in the end it is but a question of time, of skillful propagandism and of opinion-making men seizing historic opportunities.

A New Rule of Syntax

In the Christian Evangelist of Sept. 15, under "Unequally Yoked" is an editorial comment on the following lines from The Christian Century:

It is the Disciples' mission to plead for the practice of union despite our creedal differences on baptism or predestination, or any other question of Scriptural interpretation."

Forsaking the excellent opportunity to approve the much-needed truth in this sentence the Evangelist editor sets himself the task of criticising the syntax of two words and says:

"Is it quite fair and candid to couple predestination along with Christian baptism as subjects concerning which differences of opinion are equally unimportant? Where did Jesus say "He that believeth and accepts the doctrine of predestination shall be saved? Where is the commission saying "Go teach all nations, baptizing those who accept the doctrine of predestination? Where is it recorded in the New Testament that those who believed were baptized and added to the church on their acceptance of the doctrine of presdination? Nowhere, of course. Why, therefore should the Christian Century associate a divine ordinance which, in its symbolism of fundamental facts and truths, was made a condition of entrance into church fellowship in the Apostolic church, along with the doctrine of predestination, the acceptance of which, in any of its creedal forms, was never made a command, much less a term of membership in the body of Christ."

I have had some experience as a teacher and as a humble instructor in the Sunday-school. From this experience I can speak confidently when I say there is no rule of syntax nor warrant of the New Testament for such a method of interpretation as used by the Evangelist editor in reading the Century. The editor of The Christian Century does not say baptism and predestination are equally unimportant, nor is it even suggested in the above quotation. I have read and reread it and cannot find even a hint as to the editor's view of relative importance of these two subjects, nor could the shrewdest method of higher criticism ascertain it from these lines. The only justification for the Evangelist's interpretation and editorial would be a rule of a syntax such as the following: "Two or more nouns used as objects of one preposition are of equal Scriptural importance." I should like to suggest what seems clearly to me to be the meaning of the Century's lines, but shall not presume to do so as I am certain a second reading of the lines themselves will reveal their import.

"It will just be the joy of your kind heart Guphie, to take it to them, and some of your own good scones along with it. We mustn't keep all the good things to ourselves, you know, Guphie. You wouldn't be a Highland w man if you thought so."

"Ye could will the birds frae the bushes, Miss Elsie, wi' the gleek o' yer bright 'een. An' it's no' Guphie that'll try tae hand ye back in yer guid work. Mony's the sad face yer bounty has made bricht afore now."

The house was bright with lamps everywhere when Elsie, having first waited on her mother, turned into the lovely dining room. She poked the fire into a bright blaze. How cheery everything looked. Yet she could not help feeling restless and depressed. How daintily Guphie had set the table, and how appetizing the dishes looked. But after all, what difference, seeing she was alone. What a pity someone had not come. She broke off and laughed softly to herself, as she cut a slice of lamb.

"No wonder mother says we're all hypocrites," she thought. "I'd have been quite content to dine off cold turkey today if—no use saying why Elsie."

A ring came to the door. The milkman, she said to herself though her heart was beating fast. Guphie opened the door.

"A gentleman tae see ye, Miss Elsie."

"Show him in here, Guphie."

"Donald!"

"Elsie!"

"What a surprise, Donald, and how delightful. I was just grumbling to myself a minute ago at having to eat my dinner alone. Hang your great coat in the hall. Come away now—this is cozy."

"Cozy? It is delightful. It is paradise regained just to see you again."

"Why didn't you bring Jeanie with you?" (Hypocrite again) she thought.

"I never thought of her. It was not Jeanie I wanted to see, but you, Elsie."

"That's right, oh, I mean to say—of course, I'd have been very glad to see her."

"I think you said the right thing first—nothing could improve on it." They were merry as children. Neither of them ever had enjoyed such a feast, though they could not have told when it was over whether the lamb had been tender or tough, scorched or overdone. When souls feast there is always a total eclipse of sense.

"And now, Donald, we must go to mother."

"Does she know I'm here?"

"Certainly. Guphie keeps her in touch with everything when I'm not to hand."

"Mother, you know who this is," Elsie said shyly as she preceded Donald into the room. At a glance she noted that her mother's best lace cap was on, and the dear face was shining with pleasure.

"Ye see, I have no hand to gie ye, Donald. But my hert's as sound as ever it was. I'm real glad to see ye, laddie."

"You are good, very good to me, Mrs. Wallace. I scarcely know how to thank you."

"Maybe a kiss would do as well, seeing I have no hand to gie ye." Donald stooped and touched a pink cheek with his lips. Then he seated himself where she could look full into his face. Elsie noted with a thankful heart, that the old pained look had left his eyes. At that moment they were soft and moist with tender feeling. Mrs. Wallace looked steadily at his frank, boyish face, then she broke into a low laugh.

"Your wondering to see me so cheery, lad, lying here like a log, not able to move hand nor foot. But think of the mercy in't. My hert's in right and my mind and my tongue—especially the last." Again she laughed, and her face was lit up wonderful to see.

"I must say I am astonished, Mrs. Wallace. I expected to see a weary looking invalid—tired of everything. But you—you have a light on your face as if your heart was full of joy."

"Aye, that's it, laddie. When there's an illumination within, it must shine out. The same light that led some o' our forefathers through the moss bogs o' Galloway, has guided me through weary ways into peace at last."

"You shame the rest of us," he said quietly.

"Not a bit of it, laddie. When I was your age if I had been told that life would become as it did to me, I would have said I could never bear it. It's best to carry our burdens by the day. When long years of pain fell to my lot, many a time I would have been glad to leave it all. But now look at the joy that's come to me. Neither pain nor ache. And Elsie to gladden my life, and other friends, too. I'd be worse than an infidel no' to be full of joy and thankfulness."

"I don't wonder now that Elsie is—what she is."

"Elsie's mither has reason tae think she's no' a bad lass." Mrs. Wallace slipped again into broad Scotch, which she dearly loved.

"I quite agree with you, Mrs. Wallace." Donald felt quite at home with her already, yet his heart beat fast and his voice was tremulous as he spoke.

"There now, if you two people begin to flatter me, I'm off," and Elsie tripped out of the room.

"She takes her gift o' reading faces frae me."

"You think she was right, then, to trust me—to believe me innocent of the crime I am suspected of?" He looked eagerly into her face, not ashamed of the tears that glistened in his eyes.

"Yours is not a face to deceive one, Donald. I believe you innocent. Your mither believes you innocent, too lad. Elsie has told me all. Put yer trust in the God o' the Galloway men. Yer righteousness will yet be established, clear as the noon-day. And the dark days ye hae passed through will but make the future a' the brighter."

"God bless you for your hopeful words. I have passed through days of despair that well nigh crushed all hope out of my life. I need not tell you, for I think you know, that life has become more to me since I have known Elsie. Yet I have made a vow and I will abide by it. I will never offer her my name till it is without a stain. If the truth about this forgery be not found out, I will leave my native land forever."

"Be patient laddie. Ye'll na' be needing tae leave yer ain bonnie Scotland."

"It never seemed so dear to me as now."

"I can well believe it." Donald fidgetted in his chair. He opened his mouth to speak, but shut it again. She kept her eyes on his face, waiting. Taking his courage by storm, he asked abruptly—"Did Elsie tell you about John M'Ketridge?"

"Oh, aye Donald, my bairn has nae secrets frae her mither." He hung his head.

"I was a fool at that time."

"Yer a fool yet, Donald." He looked pained, but she only smiled and continued gravely, "What for did ye no' tell yer ain mither and yer guid faither a' about it?'

"You think I ought to tell them? Would it not be terrible pain to them to know of my folly?"

"There's joy that's bitter, laddie, and there's pain that's sweet. The sweetness o' knowing that ye trust them fully, will bring enough joy tae yer parents herts, tae wipe clean out the memory o' the bit o' youthful folly ye has been guilty o'."

"I'll tell them everything," he said, and his face shone with the light of high resolution.

CHAPTER XX.

An Unexpected Visitor.

It was not often that Mr. Graeme knocked timidly at any door. Naturally straightforward and courageous, his knock usually was an index to his character. But on this particular morning it was weak and seemed to cut itself off short, as if it was not quite sure it had a right to rat-at-atting at the Manse door at such an early hour in the morning. Mrs. Johnson, the housekeeper, seemed a bit puzzled, too, as she opened the door, and saw Mr. Graeme there, gravity plainly written on his face.

"A guid morn tae ye, Mrs. Johnson, an' guid New Year as weel. Is the meenister up yet?"

"A braw New Year tae yersel,' Mr. Graeme, an' mony o' thim. Will ye step into the study? The maister's there afore ye."

"My word. An' I was hardly touching the knocker for fear tae wauken him frae sleep." Mr. Sinclair had heard his voice, and met him at the study door.

"You don't think that I'm going to spend the remainder of life in bed, I hope, Mr. Graeme. I'll need to read up a bit now. Think of the time lost—to say nothing of this."

"It does my hert guid tae see ye growing sa like yersel', Mr. Sinclair."

"Yes, I have a right to be thankful it has been no worse. I look forward to being able to take up at least part of my work soon. Work is a sovereign remedy, for many of the ills of life. All well at Hopefield, Mr. Graeme?"

"A', bravely, thank ye. But there's anither member o' the congregation in sair trouble this day. I hae cam' tae speak tae ye aboot him. I want ye tae tell me what I oucht tae dae."

"Who is it, Mr. Graeme, and what?"

"John M'Ketridge. His wife drapt deid aff her feet this morn, not an hour syne."

"Her heart has been affected for years. I knew about it, and she was ready to go. A saintly soul. But poor John, reckless John—what will become of him? His love for her was the only thing that restrained him from even lower depths than he has fallen into. I must go at once to see him. Better for me drive, perhaps."

"You go tae see him, indeed? I wonder at ye, Mr. Sinclair, wi' yer poor bit airm no half healed up yet. Ye'll dae naething o' the kind. But I hae come tae tell ye that I'm gaun tae see him mysel'. I'm senior elder. It's my duty. I hae naething tae dae wi' his reception o' me. I'll tell him I hae been wi' ye, an' o' yer wish tae comfort an' admonish him. But bad as he is, an' ye'll find nae waur, he wouldna expect his meenister to come oot i' the cauld, considerin' yer ain affliction."

"I think I ought to go. Besides, who knows but my loss may touch his heart. None can minister comfort to the afflicted more tenderly than those who are passing under the rod themselves."

"Then who sae fitting tae go tae the hoose o' mourning as David Graeme? If the divine Faither has indeed received me as a son, He hasna forgotten the scourging pairt o't."

"The comforting and the healing will come afterwards, never fear. But about poor John M'Ketridge. I still think that it would be wiser of me to venture going to him. You know—"

"I ken fine what ye're going tae say, that he has been my bitter enemy for lang, lang years. True, but that disna change my duty this day. Sae I hae just cam ower tae request a word o'prayer wi' ye, afore I gang into the lion's den."

Before Mr. Sinclair had time to reply, the old man was on his knees. How the minister prayed for those in trouble; for those who were passing through deep waters; for those in the terrible loneliness of bereavement. Especially for him to whom the voice of earthly love would be silent, forever. That he might be led in his utter loneliness to hear the voice of Divine Love, calling him to a purer life, to the unfailing consolation. He prayed with intense fervor, that the messenger of comfort, might himself fully realize the inwardness of the sublime command: "Love your enemies." When they rose from their knees, tears were running down David Graeme's face. He grasped the minister's hand with a strong clasp, and hurried from the Manse without another word.

Donald came down from Glasgow by an early train. He had firmly made up his mind to tell his father everything about his dealings with John M'Ketridge. The sooner it was over the better. Jeanie was waiting for him.

"Have you heard about poor Mrs. M'Ketridge, Donald?"

"No, what is it?"

"She fell off her feet, dead, about an hour ago. Surely she was glad to get away." Donald breathed freely.

"I should think so. They were an ill-matched pair. She was a good woman, while he—the wretch. I don't want to think of him. Where's father?"

"Gone to the Manse."

"What took him there so early?"

"Perhaps to tell him about the death. He wanted to break it softly to him, no doubt."

"Mother will be sorry for Mrs. M'Ketridge. She thought so much of her."

"Yes, but mother thinks as I do. Mrs. M'Ketridge never seemed in her right place. She's there now, I am sure."

Donald went off to the shop. He was standing at the door as his father with bent head came along the road from the Manse. He would have passed on not heeding, if Donald had not stepped outside to meet him.

"Father."

"Oh, is it you, Donald?"

"Will you come upstairs with me for a short time. I have something to tell you." Donald could not steady his voice. He trembled under the rapid glance his father bestowed on him.

"I have waited long, Donald," he said slowly.

"Now your story must bide a wee. My enemy is hungry. I must try tae feed him." Donald grew white as a sheet.

"Father, you're not going to—"

"Yes, I'm going tae John M'Ketridge.

"It was about him I was going to tell you. Could you not wait?"

"The King's business requireth haste. But there, lad, I dinna want tae be onkind. Ilka one o' us has come short betimes. I'll hear ye when I come frae the hoose o' mourning."

David Graeme entered the house of his avowed enemy with downcast eyes.

"Can I see John M'Ketridge?" he said to the aged woman who admitted him.

"He's alone wi' his deid. He's no wanting tae see onybody."

"Tell him it's a message frae Mr. Sinclair. Ye needna mention my name. I'll bide here till he comes. I'm no gaun tae leave the hoose wi'out seeing him." David Graeme walked into the back parlor where his only son had been well nigh led into irretrievable ruin. He pushed the door to without fastening it. Then he turned to the only window of the room and stood looking out. He did not know how long he stood thus when the door opened and he turned round to stand face to face with the man who had once sworn a fearful oath that he would take vengeance on David Graeme.

Rhymes to Remember

The Wind.

I saw you toss the kites on high
And blow the birds about the sky;
And all around I heard you pass,
Like ladies' skirts across the grass.
O wind a-blowing all day long,
O wind that sings so loud a song,
I saw the different things you did,
But always you yourself you hid.
I felt you push, I heard you call,
I could not see yourself at all—
O wind a-blowing all day long,
O wind that sings so loud a song,
O you that are so strong and cold,
O blower, are you young or old?
Are you a beast of field or tree,
Or just a stronger child than me?—
O wind a-blowing all day long,
O wind that sings so loud a song!

The House That Jack Built

"Mr. Conducter," said little Louise Rhodes, pulling at a gilt-buttoned sleeve, "please tell me a story."

"Bless my life!" exclaimed Captain Sam, of Express No. 55. The train had just pulled out from Newcastle, and as there was a long run without a stop, the tired conductor had dropped into a back seat to rest a bit, when Louis came up and asked for a story.

"Bless my life!" said Captain Sam, "I don't know a story to my name, except 'Here is the house that Jack built.'"

"Don't tell me that," answered the little boy. "I know that myself," and he began to rattle off:

"'This is the house that Jack built;
This is the rat that lived in the house that J!ack built;
This is the cat that caught the rat—'."

"Stop right there!" said the conductor; "that reminds me of something. On my last trip East, as I went through one of the coaches to look at tickets, I found a nice little girl about your size sitting by herself. 'Tickets,' I said, without thinking. 'Mamma has 'em,' says he, an' she's gone to get a d'ink of water. But won't you please take my orange to that little girl back there with the red handkerchief on her head? Her mamma has forgot to give her any.'

"I looked for the little girl with the red handherchief, and saw a poor woman with five children. They didn't have on much clothes. They didn't look as if they had had much to eat, but nobody was paying any attention to them.

"Maybe your mamma won't like you to give away your orange," I said.

"The little girl opened her eyes very wide, and says she, 'Why Cap'n, my mamma just loves me to give things!'

"All right," says I, and I went back to the little party and gave the orange; and says I, in a loud tone of voice, 'This is from the little girl whose mamma just loves her to give things.'

"An that ever so many mothers pricked up their ears, and presently I saw another little girl bring a box of lunch to the poor children. 'Ah,' said I to myself, this is like that old song about the house that Jack built. This is the cat—' When I got that far a lady pulled a pretty little cap out of her bag, and, says she, 'Won't you let your little girl wear this tam-o'-shanter?'

"I went on singing easy to myself, 'Where is the dog that worried the cat, that killed the rat that lived in the house that Jack built?' And, sure enough, here was a boy giving something out of his pocket—I don't know what. So went on till those forlorn little chicks had more things than a few; a because one ... e kind heart gave 'em ...er orange. Now, small boy, get off my knee. I've got to ring the bell for the engineer to whistle. Go and see if you can't start another 'house that Jack built.'"—Exchange.

A Boy's Wish

I'd like to be a pirate
And sail the Spanish Main,
If every night when darkness fell,
I could go home again.
And slumber in my little bed,
So cosy-like and still,
Where neither storms nor rolling waves
Might come to do me ill.
I'm brave enough in daytime
On land or on the sea,
And nothing in the world around
Can ever frighten me.
But when the ghosts of Shadowland
Are stealing through the gloam,
Somehow I always want to be
With mother safe athome!

Will Power, or Self--Will

Anna Keeler Maxson.

Harry Ford had managed to secure a scholarship in the famous Blank Academy, and was jubilant over his good fortune. He was a boy of considerable natural ability, and had decided confidence in his own powers. This opportunity, he felt, assured a future in which he could rise to a position of influence. But he confessed to his teacher: "All I'm afraid of is the first year. They say they're very strict, and a fellow is likely to get into trouble at first."

She assured him: "Harry, I believe you have sufficient strength of purpose to help you face such difficulties, and carry you through all right."

"That's just where the trouble is, Miss Conner. They say it's the fellows with too much will-power that get into trouble."

"But, Harry, that is not true will-power. I once crossed the Atlantic when the ship rolled dreadfully, and nearly every passenger was seasick. I was determined not to give in, if it could possibly be prevented; so would rush on deck the moment the least uneasy feeling began, and exercise as briskly as possible, getting my mind fixed on objects of interest, until the uneasiness passed off. In this way I fought it out successfully. One passenger asked me: 'Miss Connor, what do you use to keep from being seasick? We have tried everything any one else recommended, and nothing helped us at all.'

"'Why,' I said, 'I haven't used anything but my will-power.'

"'Will-power!' exclaimed another lady; 'I'm sure no one has greater will-power than I, and it didn't keep me from being seasick!'

"I did not answer, but thought over what I had seen of her. A number of us had come on board the evening before the boat was to sail. Miss Baker had been dissatisfied with the cabin assigned her, and made the steward change her to quarters a trifle less cramped. Next morning, she had settled into her steamer-chair in a sheltered place on deck, and required the deck-steward to bring her meals to her, refusing to go below. In fact she had expected and planned for seasickness from the first, and it had come. Will-power had not been called into use at all.

"Now, Harry, I have often thought since that many people mistake for will-power what is only a form of selfishness—just the power to assert themselves, and make others grant what they imagine are their rights. No man has true power of will who can not hold himself completely in check when necessary, and keep himself unswervingly to the right course, no matter how difficult or unpleasant others may make it. "But," she added reverently, "such power must come from God. I am glad you have already learned how necessary it is to depend on him."

"Yes, Miss Connor," Harry answered quietly, "I know it's useless to try to keep right without his help."

As he turned to go, so full of hope and ambition, so richly endowed with God-given powers, she watched his confident step, and felt that he might indeed "take" many "a city," if he did not fail of the truer greatness "that ruleth his own spirit."

Old Friends

John Rutland.

The little dog drooped what tail he had,
The broken doll fainted away,
And poor Teddy Bear was filled with despair
When the new doll came to stay.
"Oh, have you forgotten old friends?" they cried,
But the little girl didn't hear,
As she cuddled with joy her new-found toy.
And song in its waxen ear.

But the days flew by, and she missed her friends,
Though she cherished the new love, too;
But the waxen girl with the flaxen curl
Played none of the games they knew.
So she hunted around till she found them all,
And they snuggled up close to her breast,
And never a word of reproach was heard
As she whispered, "Old friends are best."

A Gentle Hint

A venerable uncle was celebrating a birthday, and one of his first visitors was his niece, Nellie, aged six. Her greeting was to the point: "Uncle Charlie, I wish you many happy returns of the day, and mamma said that if you gave me half-a-dollar I wasn't to lose it."

Oregon lands aggregating 1,873,280 acres were thrown open to settlement on September 12, under the provisions of the enlarged homstead laws. That brings the total of lands in Oregon, which have been restored to date, up to 11,040,240 acres.

even been honest. He had taken money that in the hands of a thrifty and courageous man would have won return, and had lost all the chance of profit. He had not even returned the sum he had received, for at the lowest rating it should have made the common interest of the bankers. Was such a man to be trusted again with money? By no means. Let the man who had made good take the added funds, but take the name of the timid and profitless man off the list of future agents. His chance was gone. He was cast out from the list of the friends of the proprietor into the outer darkness of the unprovided and useless. So of all who have not the courage and energy to work at the great task, and play the game in the spirit of the Great Adventure.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES

Topic Oct. 9: Forward Steps in our Society. Ex. 14:9—15.

The temptation comes to talk about petty methods in the consideration of this subject Besides methods and system are of much importance in the doing of any kind of work. With effective system one can multiply his ability to do things many fold. But important as methods are they are subordinate to the great cause in the interest of which they are employed. There is danger sometimes of becoming so engrossed with the methods employed for doing a piece of work that we loose sight of the original object. Perhaps there is no place where we have that more aptly illustrated than in church work. Multitdues of those who work in the church, treat it as if it were an end of itself, when as a matter of fact it is only a means to an end—the bringing in of the Kingdom of God. To a greater or less extent this has been true of the work of the Christian Endeavor workers. We have become so busy with committee meetings and socials etc., that we have lost sight of the great object which they were meant to serve.

If such auxiliaries as mentioned above are not the fundamentally important things, what are? Paul tells us the the church is the pillar and ground of the truth. It stands primarily for the spiritual ideals of life. The Endeavor then which has for its object Christ and the church, and which chooses for its field particularly the young in the church, seeks, in the last analysis, to interpret the spiritual life to the young. To realize this clearly and fully, and consciously make every method employed, every social held and every committee meeting called, contribute directly or indirectly to that end, is the only forward step which any society can take. The society organized around that ideal and working to that definite and with consecrated workers, although of ordinary powers, will make itself felt as a mighty force for righteousness. Without this ideal there will be gropings and misfits, and incongruities constantly. Without it methods cannot be intellegently selected, nor even employed.

But the church is a militant body and the Endeavor must also be militant. Wrong is constantly before them. It must be resisted and fought back, just as the Christian Endeavor did in opposing the exhibition of the moving pictures of the prize fight. This work is of peculiar importance to the Christian Endeavor because the young people are the ones preyed upon especially. To help the young resist these temptations and to provide something to take their places which is attractive and wholesome and spiritual is a great forward step.

Besides all these there are to be found in every community that vast multitude of the young who are unsaved, who seek the gratification of every desire and appetite within their power. For these the Endeavorer must pray and plan just as did the Christ in whose name he is laboring. Seek the acquaintance and the companionship of these young people not that you may become like them, partakers with them in their folly but that they may become like you in the purpose and ideal of your life. Here is the opportunity to live over again the life of our Lord who came to seek and save the lost and who commissioned us with the same great task.

Chicago's Altogether Campaign

The Laymen's Evangelistic Council, which brought Dr. R. A. Torrey, the evangelist, to Chicago three years ago, and Gipsy Smith last year, has planned for this city in the approaching Chapman-Alexander Simultaneous Campaign, the most comprehensive and far-reaching religious movement that has ever been attempted in any great city. Instead of one large meeting in a great auditorium in a central location, there will be between twenty-five and thirty meetings every night, three to twelve churches uniting in each meeting. The meetings are to open October 16 and will continue for a period of six weeks, closing before Thanksgiving.

Evangelistic campaigns of this kind have been held in many large cities of the United States, Philadelphia and Boston being the largest. Several months ago the Evangelistic Council invited Dr. Chapman to come to Chicago to direct a great series of meetings of this kind, and since his acceptance plans have been formulated and are being carefully worked out for conducting the most far-reaching city religious movement that the world has ever seen.

The Chapman-Alexander Campaign is under the auspices of the Laymen's Evangelistic Council, so that the arrangements are in the council's hands. The officers of the Laymen's Evangelistic Council are: H. P. Crowell, general chairman; Wm. A. Peterson, treasurer; Frank L. Wood, recording secretary; Andrew Stevenson, general secretary and George C. Lazear, executive secretary.

Four hundred churches will co-operate in these meetings. In planning the campaign all the churches of the city were formed into groups, each church of every group receiving an invitation to co-operate with the others of the same group in holding a series of union meetings simultaneously with the other groups throughout the city. The chairman of the group, who is one of the pastors, is called a convenor. The pastors form what might be called an executive committee for the group. There are five working group committees, made up of one man from each church of the group. The chairman of this committee is a member of the general committee for the entire city, which has a chairman appointed by the executive council.

Fifty groups of churches are arranged for. There will probably be others organized before the meetings begin. In one of the churches of each group, usually the largest or most central, the evening meetings will be held under the direction of an evangelist assigned to the group by a committee of the Evangelistic Council. Each evangelist will have with him a thoroughly qualified director of music. In most cases these men are also fine soloists. Upon his arrival he will take charge of the chorus which has been organized by the music committee of the group and the effort of the chorus director will be to co-operate and supplement the work of the evangelist in every way that the power of music is able to do.

It has been found impossible to secure a sufficient number of evangelists of the class desired by the Evangelistic Council to carry on the meeting in all the groups at the same time. In consequence of this, there will be two series of meetings; about half of the groups will hold meetings for the three weeks beginning October 16; and the other half will have their meetings during the three weeks immediately following, some of the same evangelists speaking at two places and remaining in the city for a period of six weeks.

Not only will there be meetings in the evening, but in some of the groups afternoon meetings will be arranged, probably in another church than the one in which evening meetings are held. There will also be special meetings for men on Sunday afternoon, services for women and special meetings for children. Meetings of this kind are usually arranged after the arrival of the evangelist and in conference with the pastors of his group. In most cities a union evangelistic meeting is held in each group on Sunday night. In some places the various churches have also their regular service, and in others not. In this matter is being left for the pastors of each group to decide. The same plan is being carried out here with reference to the prayer meeting which most churches hold on Wednesday nights. Groups that desire to have evangelistic meetings on that night will do so.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman supervises and directs the work of his entire corps of helpers. The plan is for Dr. Chapman to conduct meetings in three large centers, one on the south side, one on the north side and one on the west side. He will remain for two weeks in each place. A committee of the Evangelistic Council has the matter of auditoriums in hand and are endeavoring to secure in each of the three centers a large building that is at the same time centrally located and suitable for the holding of the

—It is not one day too early to make arrangements to go to Topeka.

—Chicago Disciples and those in this vicinity will note the advertisement of the special train on page 2.

—No doubt delegates from the east will take this train with us. We sleep Monday night and have half of Tuesday for social visiting on the train.

—The word "delegates" above should remind us that this is to be a delegate convention in a sense. The constitution of the American Society will be enforced by the President this year for the first time.

This means that every church may send one delegate and an additional one for every hundred members up to five. No church may have more than five delegates.

—See that these delegates are appointed next Sunday morning, and given proper credentials.

—If your church appoints the pastor give him a purse to take his wife along.

—But do not let anybody get the notion that the convention is for delegates only. It will be as much for everybody as our great conventions have ever been.

—Have you ordered your Bethany Graded Sunday-school supplies yet?

If you are a little late send in your order at once and the New Christian Century Co. will surprise you at the speed with which it will be filled.

—Many of the best and largest schools of the brotherhood are adopting the Bethany Graded Lessons this fall.

—The business office just now informs the editorial office that there is every likelihood of doubling previous business in Bethany supplies.

—Put your school in the front rank by giving your scholars and teachers the best Sunday-school literature ever published.

Leon V. Stiles has resigned at Hot Springs, Ark., and entered the evangelistic field.

The meetings in progress at the church in Hiawatha, Kans., are being well attended. Five additions thus far.

A series of services are being held in the church at Pittsburg, Kans., under the leadership of Lowell C. McPherson.

The First Church, Springfield, Ill., will celebrate its seventy-sixth anniversary October 2. Charles Clayton Morrison will preach the anniversary sermon.

John McD. Horne, pastor of the Highland Park Church of Christ, Des Moines, Iowa, is resigning his pulpit, to take effect October 1.

The district convention of churches was held Monday and Tuesday, September 26, 27, at New Berlin, Ill. The church made splendid preparations to entertain a large number of delegates.

A re-opening service in the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, Ohio, was held Sunday, September 18. "The Church in the Community" was the sermon subject by the pastor, W. F. Rothenberger.

G. E. Thompson is in an evangelistic campaign in the second Church,St. Louis, Mo. Bible-school is largest in history of church, reaching beyond 350 mark. Forty have been added in fifteen days.

Two persons were added to the church at Dixon, Ill., recently. This church is to the fore in all good work, observing Church Extension next Sunday, and Rally Day October 2. S. Ellwood Fisher is the pastor.

John L. Brandt, of St. Louis, has accepted a call to the West Side hurch, San Francisco, and will begin on January first. S. J. Myers, of Kansas City, has been secured to preach until that time.

The work at Lawton, Okla., is progressing well under the leadership of A. R. Spicer. Twelve were added last Sunday, making a total of eighty in the last six months at the regular services.

The congregation of First Church, Milwaukee. Wis., has extended a unanimous call to J. H. Craig, pastor at Logansport, Indiana. It is not known as yet whether Mr. Craig will accept the call.

John Roland, pastor of the church at Webster City, Iowa, has resigned his work that he may complete his theological studies in Drake University. The church regrets to lose this popular pastor.

The Second Church of Terre Haute, Ind., will begin a revival October 9, to continue four weeks. Geo. J. Ruth, the minister, will do the preaching and Charles E. McVay of Hardy, Neb., will have charge of the music.

The work on the new church at Hastings, Neb., is progressing in a satisfactory manner. Enough of the face brick have been laid to show that the building with sand stone trimmings will be one of the most beautiful church edifices in central Nebraska.

Gary L. Cook, of Indianapolis, state superintendent of the Sunday-schools, will hold a Sunday-school institute in the Christian Church at Cambridge City, Indiana, September 20, 21 and 22.

The First Christian Church, Lincoln, Neb., will observe Rally Day, September 25. The church has been thoroughly renovated, new furniture replacing the old. The Sunday-school expects to have more than one thousand in attendance. Harvey H. Harmon is minister.

A. Lyle DeJarnette, pastor of the First Church, Santa Cruz, Cal., will close his work there with September. Mr. DeJarnette has not announced his plans for the future, but it is reported he is thinking of going to Southern California.

The Sunday-school of the church at Higginsville, Mo., issued a unique announcement of their annual rally Sunday, Sept. 25. The invitation was a fac-simile of a telegraph blank and was addressed to "A good worker" and signed by the superintendent, F. L. McCord,

F. W. Emerson, the secretary of the Southern California Mission Board, was the permanent chairman of the State Convention of the Prohibitionists held at San Jose on September 6 and 7. He proved himself a splendid parliamentarian and also made one of the best speeches at that gathering.

P. J. Rice, pastor of the First Christian Church of El Paso, Texas, has arranged the following subjects for the four Sundays beginning September eighteenth: "The Sunday-school in Modern Life," "What is the Bible?", "Men for Men's Work," "A Man's Religion," "A Call for Service,' and "The Christian Ideal."

The Christian churches of Carroll county, Indiana, held a union all-day basket meeting in Williamson's grove. An organization was effected for the purpose of unifying the church work and the following officers were elected: J. Frank Smith, of Flora, president; Louis Crum, of Rockfield, vice-president, and N. Ziilich, of Flora, treasurer.

F. N. Calvin, of St. Louis, has accepted the unanimous call of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, to the pulpit made vacant by J. E. Lynn's removal to Pueblo, Colo., some months ago. Mr. Calvin has been for a number of years one of the most faithful pastors of the brotherhood. He is well fitted to the important work upon which he enters.

President E. C. Sanderson, of the Eugene Bible University, has been granted a leave of absence of several months which he will spend in study at the University of Pennsylvania and abroad. A. F. Sanderson, his brother, pastor at Huston, Texas, will have administrative charge of the University in his absence.

The Christian churches of Wabash County, Indiana, recently held their annual convention. The sessions were very largely attended by representatives from all the churches. They elected the following officers for the coming year; Frank G. Carpenter, president; George T. Smith, vice-president; Thomas Hardman, treasurer; E. F. Daugherty, secretary.

S. G. Buckner preached his farewell sermon at Elkhart, Ind., on Sunday, September, 18, having resigned there to accept the pastorate at Ashtabula, O. During Mr. Buckner's pastorate of more than two years, the church membership has greatly increased. The Sunday school has an enrollment of over four hundred, with an attendance in the men's class of 100.

The Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary October 9. Prior to the Sunday services a four days' series of "camp fire" services will be held.

The beautiful house of worship has been redecorated throughout. Finis Idleman, the pastor, has done a remarkable work in this down town center and is projecting still greater things.

Walter Scott Priest, of the Central Church, Wichita, Kans., was honored by an invitation to deliver the Labor Day address in Riverside Park, which he did to an audience of about 2,000 laboring men and their families. The address was well received. On the Sunday evening before he preached a sermon in the Central Church on "Christianity and the Social Crisis," which was heard by many laboring men.

The church at Rocky Ford, Colo., will hold a "Home Coming" service Oct. 2. F. W. Collins has been pastor there since June 1, coming from Garnett, Kans., where he completed a three years' ministry. Mr. Collins is a vigorous preacher, thoughtful and spiritual. The church at Rocky Ford was founded by H. T. Morrison, father of Editor C. C. Morrison, less than ten years ago. It has grown into a substantial and efficient congregation.

L. W. Spayd, pastor of the church at Franklin, Ill., has resigned his pastorate and is moving with his family to Stuttgart, Ark., where he has real estate interests. Applications for the pastorate may be addressed to Henry Duncan, Franklin, Ill. The Franklin Church lost one of its aged members this last week in Mrs. Elizabeth Brown. Several were unable to attend the state convention on account of the funeral services.

Robert Graham Frank, pastor at Liberty, Mo., recently preached the sermon at a union service held with the Baptist church of that town. Mr. Frank declared that two churches were sufficient for Liberty. He advocated the immediate union of Baptists and Disciples. This congregation received and bade godspeed to Dr. and Mrs. Wakefield, their living-link missionaries in China, at the services Sunday, September 18.

A telegram from Ben N. Mitchell, pastor at Litchfield, Ill., says that C. R. Scoville is holding a meeting there with 252 accessions in seventeen days of invitation. The large tabernacle, built especially for the meetings is too small to hold all the people on Sunday nights. Special delegations are coming in to the meetings from towns surrounding Litchfield. Special enthusiasm seems to prevail over the women's meeting and the boys' meeting. Mr. Mitchell highly commends all of Doctor Scoville's assistants.

The Andrew County, Missouri, Christian Mission Society, composed of nine churches, met at Bolckow, September 16 and 17. The meeting was well attended. C. M. Chilton, of St. Joseph, delivered the convention address on the "Present Crisis." State Superintendent of Sunday-schools J. H. Bryan, gave helpful talks on the graded Sunday-school. The following officers were elected for the coming year: F. C. McCallon, president; Mrs. White, vice president; R. E. Musgrave, secretary and treasurer; W. S. Dray, county superintendent of Sunday-schools.

The work at Corning, Iowa, continues to move in the right direction. Since last report, the church has been painted, papered, wood work, seats and furniture refinished and additional electric light provided for the choir. The building now presents a very attractive and pleasing appearance without and within. The work is all paid for and a balance in hand to be applied on further improvements. Two were received at regular services recently. Evangelist C. E. Chambers of Ottumwa and helpers, Mr. and Mrs. F. T. Sturtevant, began a meeting September 18. O. W. Winter is the minister.

Dr. B. B. Tyler celebrated the forty-ninth anniversary of his ordination on Sunday, September 11, in the South Broadway Church, Denver, Colo. He told his people that one year later, at his fiftieth anniversary, he would preach the sermon of his life! At that date he intended to resign the pulpit of South Broadway, and he served notice that they need not present him his resignation before, for he would not accept it! Dr. Tyler passed through Chicago last week on his way to the Centennial celebration of the First Church of Disciples in New York City. He preaches at the dedication of this new house of worship next Sunday morning. C. L. Organ, of Iowa, is to conduct a meeting in South Broadway Church on Dr. Tyler's return to Denver.

At the First Christian Church, Bloomington, Ill., Sunday evening, Edgar DeWitt Jones will begin a series of addresses on "Six Sundays in Europe," as follows: September 18, "A Sunday in Ireland." September 25, "A Sunday in Edinburgh." October 2, "A Sunday in London." October 9, "A Sunday in Paris." October 16, "A Sunday in Venice." October 23, "A Sunday in Rome." Preceding the delivery of these addresses there will be a helpful devotional service with a ten-minutes Scripture study by Mr. Jones, as follows: September 18, "The First Psalm." September 29, "The 19th Psalm." October 2, "The 12th Chapter of Ecclesiastes." October 9, "The Seventh Chapter of Matthew." October 16, "The 15th Chapter of Luke." October 23, "The 17th of John."

The First Church, of Fresno, Cal., has decided to establish a Mission Sunday-school in another part of the city; and for that purpose has called a man to take charge. This church is already a Living-Link in the Foreign Society, supporting Mrs. Wilson at Bolenge; also in the home Society, supporting, Chas. L. Beal, in Fresno. This new venture will make the second Living-Link in the Home Society—and marks this church as one of the leading missionary churches in the Brotherhood. No public offerings are taken for any of these—the two Home Living-Links being supported out of the regular treasury, the same as the pastor. The foreign support is given through individual pledges taken by the missionary treasurer. Sermons are preached of course, but no certain day is set apart for special effort. Ray O. Miller is the pastor of this church. Last year the entire offering to missions and charity was $1,360.

A committee appointed by the Oklahoma Christian Convention met in Chickasha, September 15, at the call of the president, A. P. Johnson, to draft a new constitution for the convention. G. Lysle Smith, pastor of the Christian Church of El Reno; R. A. Spicer, pastor of the Christian Church of Lawton; Dr. Charles P. Brown and A. P. Johnson were the men in charge of the work. The new constitution will be framed by this committee and will become effective before the next state convention. During the past year there has been considerable trouble from the fact that the entire power of the convention of the state lay in the hands of the president of the body. The constitution provided for this and at the last convention in Tulsa an effort was made to remedy this condition. It was ruled by that body that a new constitution be drafted and adopted.

Adam K. Adcock, in August, closed his ministry of nearly three years in Fairfield, Ill., and, after two week's vacation at his old home in East Tennessee, began at Carbondale, September 11. During his service in Fairfield, 150 were added to the church, and sixty-five at other congregations in Wayne County where he held meetings, making 210 in all. He has constantly stressed the Sunday-school, with the result that it has more than doubled and all the schools of Wayne County have received a new impetus. He led in a great Rally Day, when there were 1,200 present and $150 in the offering, whose influence was widely felt. Carbondale is a larger field, where he hopes to double his usefulness; and though keenly sensitive to the pain of separation from his friends and helpers in Fairfield, he goes to his new work with expectant faith and growing enthusiasm. While on his vacation Mr. Adcock preached at Park Street Church, Knoxville, Tenn., in the evening of August 29; at his old home church at Thorn Grove, Tenn., both morning and evening, September 4; and at Rome, Ga., Thursday night, September 8. He reports the work doing well at all these places.

FIRST CHRISTIAN CHURCH, TOPEKA.

The superintendent of city missions, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes the following: "The work among the Russians has been of increasing interest during the past month. From thirty to sixty-five, mostly men, were present at each service and all entered most heartily and reverently into the services, which lasted for one hour. This growth and general interest, in this work indicates the possibilities before us. August 28 they held a special meeting of their church and chose John Johnson as their minister. Mr. Johnson is well qualified to do an effective work, with the help of several of their brethren co-operating with him, who are efficient workers in the cause of Christ. September 4, two Russians united with the Humboldt Street Church as a result of Mr. Sandler's work. They are both excellent fellows and are proving a great help to the work at this point. The great problem we face is the securing of efficient workers to carry on the work among this people. The only way open to us is to educate some of the young men for the work. We have a young Russian, devoted member of the church, of splendid natural ability and would make a consistant worker among his people. If any one would like to help in the education of this young man, for the ministry, I should like to hear from him. Mr. Wittchem is getting a splendid hold on the work at Ridgewood Heights. September 5, they held a baptismal service, using the ocean for their baptistry, and again September 17, three were baptized."

Water From the Rock

I am not a Unitarian. If I were I should be in a Unitarian pulpit. I could not be a Unitarian because I do not simply revere, I worship Jesus Christ as God; but I am concerned not with the things wherein we differ —that fight was fought some time ago. I am concerned with what we have in common, and I confess with immense gratitude my indebtedness to the great body of illuminating, inspiring literature on such common affirmation as the Fatherhood of God, the Brotherhood of Man, the Reality of Spiritual Communion, the Supreme Moral Law and the Future Life. I turn to the Unitarian section of my little library for clear thinking as naturally as I turn to the Roman Catholic section for the glow and passion of devotion.

During my Southampton ministry a dear old lady who had been somewhat disturbed by a sermon of mine on the Eternal City came to remonstrate gently with me, saying that I had too many gates, though I took the number from Revelation! "You make heaven such a big place; but there is one thing," she said, "you can't make it big enough for Unitarians." I did not argue with her. I do not argue with old women of either sex or any age. But after tea I took a much used book and read a few passages from it. "What do you think of that?" And her face was transfigured as she replied, "It is lovely." "The author is dead now." "Ah, then, he knows it is all true now, doesn't he?" "I hope so," I answered. "This was written by Dr. James Martineau, the Unitarian." I had been reading from "Hours of Thought." Then I read extracts from Hamilton Thom's "Christ the Revealer" and from Stopford Brooke's "God and Chirst" and some other things of Dr. Brooke's which positively amazed her. She made me read several times his prophecy of the "closer union" "that shall be ours if only we hold fast to the few spiritual truths which assume as their father-truth that God is and that he loves all men and women with the love omnipotent for their salvation which he embodied in Jesus Christ."—Rev. T. E. Ruth, in Christian World Pulpit.

meetings. The two weeks of meetings conducted by Dr. Chapman in each of the three great sections of the city are not to conflict with the group meetings.

Dr. Chapman has with him as his own director of music, Charles M. Alexander, who is known the world over as a man who can make more people sing who do not want to sing, than any other person living. In Dr. Chapman's personal party there is also Robert Harkness, the Australian, who is a wonderful accompanist, and one or more very talented soloists.

At the present time Doctor Chapman is in Great Britain with Mr. Alexander, making a conference tour of England, Scotland and Wales. They will arrive in the United States about October 13 or 14 and will come immediately to Chicago.

A feature of the simultaneous campaign are meetings of almost every character. There will be noon meetings in one or more theatres, Doctor Chapman conducting one of them. There will be a series of quiet hour meetings in the morning in certain churches in residential sections of the city, besides meetings in factories, special visits to institutions when requested and services in prisons when these are permitted. It is probable that permission will be asked of some of the large department stores to hold a brief service for the employees at noon on certain days.

MR. CHARLES M. ALEXANDER.

Including the directors of music, the special pianists and special workers, the entire evangelistic party who will participate in the simultaneous campaign will number more than eighty persons. Thirty-seven evangelists have been engaged, some of whom will remain through the entire period or six weeks. Fully half of these men are pastors of churches and have been granted leave of absence for three weeks in order to have charge of meetings in one of the groups. The men are being drawn from all parts of the United States and are men who by natural ability and special training are peculiarly qualified for evangelistic work. The men in the party who are devoting all of their time to evangelistic work, have in past years been pastors and know a minister's difficulties and problems.

Emotional preaching is to be avoided, and those who expect any spectacular performances on the part of Dr. Chapman, or any of his party, will be disappointed. The men are coming to Chicago to preach the plain gospel of Christ, and by straight-forward preaching and an earnest effort, will endeavor to impress the people of Chicago with the obligation they are under to live straight, clean Christian lives. In other cities the great simultaneous campaign conducted by Doctor Chapman have resulted in a wonderful spiritual and moral uplift, and have frequently created a religious atmosphere that has impressed the entire city.

Englewood's Anniversary

The Englewood Church, Chicago, observed the twenty-fifth anniversary of its founding Sunday and Monday, Sept. 18 and 19. Enthusiastic congregations filled the house on Sunday morning, afternoon and evening. In the morning the pastor, C. G. Kindred, preached the anniversary sermon, in the afternoon a historical and reminiscent service was held. In the evening C. C. Morrison preached. Monday afternoon a missionary meeting under the auspices of the C. W. B. M. was held and Mr. Randall of Jamaica spoke. That evening a large assemblage came together to hear C. C. Morrison speak on the significance of the World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh. The Englewood church deserves to be called great, an adjective applied so recklessly elsewhere. It is a solid, close-knit, spiritual, and harmonious congregation. Mr. Kindred's long pastorate has greatly endeared him and his wife to the entire membership. There is a fine spirit of sacrifice in the congregation voiced in the evening prayer of the pastor that, "if there were heavy burdens to be laid upon our Chicago brotherhood the Englewood Church might be given the heavy end." Such praying accounts for the proverbial generosity of this congregation in all missionary and civic enterprises. One remarkable fact in connection with the ten year pastorate of Mr. Kindred is that no revival meeting has been held save a quiet one last spring. The growth has been steady and firm. The church now has about 700 members.

A. W. Taylor's Departure

It is with sincere regret that we announce the departure from the Chicago field of A. W. Taylor, editor of the Social Survey, in The Christian Century. During his pastorate of a year and a half at Irving Park church, his enthusiasm and high ideals for the development of his church, particularly along institutional lines, have been a source of inspiration to his fellow-workers in Chicago. These ideals have assumed concrete form in the building of an annex to the church. This will house the gymnasium and greatly increase the Sunday school facilities. When it is considered that of the forty-five accessions to the church during this pastorate, about thirty have been young people, the wisdom of this line of development is seen, for no church could set itself to a worthier calling than to train the energy of these young people, and thereby raise up a strong church for the morrow. That the missionary interests have not suffered by development along the institutional side is shown by the fact that with an active membership of only two hundred, about eight hundred dollars has been raised for missionary causes, an example to some of our larger congregations.

Mr. Taylor has accepted the chair of social service and Christian Missions at the State University, Columbia, Mo., in connection with the Bible College established there by our Missouri churches. The work will be along the line of instruction in sociology and the history and success of missions. Added to Mr. Taylor's many years of study in this field, he is just fresh from a summer abroad, where his study of social conditions, particularly in Ireland, will give him fresh insight into the problems of humanity. We wish Mr. Taylor the happiest results in his new line of endeavor, and are glad that our readers will still have the benefit of his discerning articles.

"Lest We Forget"

Let every one remember that this is the last month of the missionary year, and that the books of the American Christian Missionary Society will close September 30.

Many churches, and among them some of our "Living Links," have not sent their offerings. Splendid gains have been made thus far. It remains for the friends of home missions to promptly remit all offerings and the highest tide in receipts ever reached by the A. C. M. S. can be reported at Topeka.

Dedication at Evanston

The Evanston church is located on the north shore in a suburb which is the home of much of the wealth and culture of Chicago. The town has Northwestern University as its leading educational institution.

Our church was planted here fifteen years ago, long after the other churches of the town had come to large strength and usefulness. It has had an able ministry from the first, E. W. Darst, Dr. E. S. Ames, A. L. Chapman, Dr. E. V. Zollars, Prof. Wallance Payne and W. D. Ward being our ministers. The first nine years were spent in halls. About six years ago, the church bought a vacant mission building belonging to the Congregationalists. This building, however, was a mile from any transportation line and located in the extreme corner of town among the foreign-speaking element.

The present location is within four squares of every form of transportation. Two of the best streets of the town mark its corner. The lot is 100 x 150 and cost $5,000 and is worth much more. The present building is constructed of vitrified brick with a solid cement entrance and cost approximately ten thousand dollars. The auditorium will seat three hundred and fifty people comfortably. The basement is high and dry and is the home of the social activities carried on by the church.

The Evanston church has only a little over a hundred members. Yet they are in possession of this splendid property with only their church extension encumbrance of six thousand dollars and the first annual payment on that provided in pledges. The church carries an annual expense budget of twenty-five hundered dollars. All of this is being done with a membership that does not number one single wealthy man in it.

The church has definitely adopted the ideal of making itself a laboratory of social experimentation and social service. For the third year a short-hand night school is being maintained to give ambitious young people of the town a chance. A kindergarten is maintained through the day. The church has its own printing press for the use of its boys and upon this press all the printing of the church is done. The young men organize each year for athletics and the young women give frequent dramatic entertainments. Other plans are on foot to make the church the center of useful neighborhood activities.

On dedication day, Oliver W. Stewart was master of ceremonies. He was at his best both in preaching and in money raising. At the morning service, a new communion service was used for the first time and at the evening service the formal act of dedication took place. In the afternoon, every prominent minister of Evanston was present and each denomination was represented by a speaker. Dr. McElveen of the Congregational church declared that he admired us for our name and for our message of Christian union. He pronounced most denominational names too narrow and said he would rather wear the name of Christian than any other. The ministers out did each other in expressions of cordial sympathy with the plea and the purpose of our church in Evanston. Dr. Willett was present to respond in his usual felicitous way. He explained the attitude of progressive Disciples and deplored the failure of some among us to measure up to the plea which had been so praised by our visitors. The services of the day brought many of the prominent citizens of the town to visit us. The church was full all day and the shifting audiences made it possible for us to reach in a single day not less than six or eight hundred different persons with our message.

The Evanston church now faces a bright future united in membership and optimistic in spirit. They have built the present building on the rear of the lot as a Sunday school building and parish house. They hope that it shall not be long until they may undertake the construction of the sanctuary proper.

Eureka College Letter

Eureka College opened last week with a fine attendance. The old students are back in large numbers and we have many new faces. The spirit of the student body and the increase in attendance warrant us in pursuing the campaign for the enlargement of the college with increasing vigor.

At the state convention, held in Springfield last week, Eureka College certainly received her share of recognition. It is pretty generally conceded in Illinois that Eureka College is about the livest wire we have in the state. This is a very encouraging aspect of our proposition. The sentiment has been completely transformed within the past two years. All of the old-time friends of the college are rallying as never before, besides we are making new friends constantly.

DRAKE UNIVERSITY AND CAMPUS

Drake University is twenty-nine years old, has eleven buildings devoted exclusively to school purposes, employs more than 150 instructors, and has an annual attendance of more than 1,800 students The University is located in the best suburb of "Beautiful Des Moines," with easy access to every point of educational and religious interest in the city. Library facilities are unexcelled in the West, living expenses are moderate and opportunities for remunerative employment are unusually good. School is in session throughout the year.

THE COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE

The Bible College of Drake University was established at the opening of the school in 1881. It is

Free from the limitations of man-made creeds and sectarian domination; has a faculty of earnest scholars, each an expert in some branch of Bible study; maintains that spirit of loyalty to Christ which leaves the mind free to "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good"; has organic union with a large and rapidly growing university and affords an opportunity of hearing in lecture or recital many of the most famous world characters. Des Moines is an educational, artistic, industrial and religious center.

MEDICAL MISSIONARIES

Drake University has more Medical Missionaries in the field than any other of our schools. No other institution in the Brotherhood offers the advantages to be found at Drake University. The College of Medicine of Drake University is standard by every test applied to such institutions. The training of the medical missionary in the College of Liberal Arts, the College of the Bible and the College of Medicine assures the best preparation for complete service.

Scholarships for Bible College Students

Free scholarships are provided by the university and its friends for all students preparing for the ministry or the mission field.

OTHER COLLEGES

College of Liberal Arts
College of Law
College of Medicine
College of Dentistry
College of Education
College of Fine Arts

For announcement or other information concerning the work of any one of these colleges, address

Drake University, Dept. E, Des Moines, Iowa

The endowment fund is growing and we have set our goal for commencement next for the completion of the $125,000 proposition now before us. We have quite a bit of the money promised and it is very largely a matter now of getting those who have made up their minds to help us to come in at once.

More than one hundred churches took the offering on Education Day last year and we will undoubtedly double the number this year. Education Day observance has been growing in favor for the past four or five years, but by far the largest number took the offering last year. Of course, it would be easy to say that the churches of Illinois could settle this educational problem for us by a single offering, but we have to take into account the fact that we have not been developing an educational conscience, and this is the chief thing before us at this time. H. H. PETERS.

American Missions

There are many people of true heroism in the home mission field. We recently learned of one man in his zeal to establish a church in a new community has been trying to sustain himself on $20 per month. Of course, this has caused great sacrifice. He has an opportunity to enter railroad service at $100 a month but he has determined to do "this one thing." It is because of such faithful men as this "on the firing line" that the kingdom has occupied new fields and advanced speedily in every section.

Salt Lake City church will enter upon an evangelistic campaign immediately following the Topeka convention. C. R. Neal will do the preaching, assisted by Frank Huston.

The church at Dunkirk, N. Y., recently closed a series of meetings with L. C. McPherson as Evangelist. These meetings did much to advance our cause in this eastern community. R. P. McPherson is the pastor.

The outlook for Arizona work is splendid. J. W. Mitchell of Kentucky takes our work at Tucson and G. W. Thompson of Cincinnati, is at Tampee. The members of our Arizona board expect to attend the Topeka convention.

Henry F. Lutz, our Atlantic Coast evangelist, is scheduled for a meeting at Mountain Church, Maryland in September; Whitney Avenue, Washington, D. C., in October; Swampscott, Mass., in December; Harrisburg, Va., in January and Syracuse, N. Y., in February. As these meetings will probably run from four to six weeks, his time is practically spoken for until April. If the American board could secure the money another evangelist would be placed to labor in this ripe field of the east.

Our work in the eastern states has progressed quite satisfactorily during the year just closing. The annual reports at the conventions of Eastern Pennsylvania, New England, Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia, and West Virginia, contain many items of great cheer. A visit to that greatest of the world's mission fields, New York City and contact with the brave men and women who are faithfully standing by their posts and using every opportunity to advance the kingdom inspires us with courage and zeal to bring reënforcements to this army of occupancy marching against the citadels of Satan's stronghold, the American city.

GRANT K. LEWIS, Secretary.

Notes From the Foreign Society

The Foreign Society occupies Thursday, October 13, at the Topeka convention. The board of managers meets in the First M. E. Church on Tuesday, October 11, at 3:30 p. m. The life directors and the executive committee constitute the board of managers.

The books of the Foreign Society close September 30. All offerings should be in by that time so that proper credit may be given. We urge that everyone co-operate in the gathering together of all possible receipts. Last year September was a great month. The receipts were $80,000. Let us not fall behind this year. Send all offerings to F. M. Rains, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

The Sunday-school at Monieka, Africa, has 2,000 pupils in attendance. Canton, Ohio, had better look out, their African brothers are a close second. Monieka is the point on the Bosira River, 250 miles above Bolenge. They have not yet had a resident missionary. Timothy Iso, the native evangelist, is in charge. The missionaries visit this point as often as possible. The town of Monieka has 10,000 inhabitants. Our church there has 200 members.

The China mission reports their greatest year. 145 baptisms and 45,000 patients treated by the medical missionaries. They also report great advances in Bible study and Sunday-schol work.

Steps have been taken to establish a union medical college in Nankin, China. It is proposed to train native Christian doctors in this school. The Chinese have no medical science. The medical missionary from America can only reach a limited number of people. The native, Christian physician will have a large part in the future redemption of China. If the union is consummated, the different Protestant missions in Nankin will unite and establish a strong institution. Our missionaries will choose the finest young men from our missions and send them there for training.

The Foreign Society is planning a great campaign of mission study this year. Last year the Society sold over 7,000 books. No one can measure the value of such a campaign of mission study. Two books by our own workers will be used this year. "Break-Down Chinese Walls" by Dr. Elliott Osgood of Chu Cheo, China, and "Bolenge" by Mrs. Eva N. Dye of Africa. Many other volumes are also available. The fall months are good for starting mission study classes.

The following earnest appeals for equipment come to the society from the missionaries: $10,000 to hold and equip the newly granted station at Lotumbe, Africa; $10,000 for a hospital for Dr. C. L. Pickett at Laoag, Philippine Islands; $6,000 for a Bible College building at Nankin, China, for A. E. Cory's work; $3,000 for a kindergarten building at Akita, Japan. The Akita, Japan missionaries have pledged $600 toward the new kindergarten. The Japanese mothers have pledged $250, and another Japanese friend has offered as much as the mothers gave. This splendid generosity ought to stir up the people in the homeland. $3,000 for Doctor Drummond's hospital at Harda, India; $3,000 for a chapel at Manila, Philippine Islands; $3,000 each for missionary homes for C. B. Titus, Chao Hsien, China, J. C. Ogden, Batang, Tibet, F. E. Hagin, Tokyo, Japan, and Dr. Paul Wakefield, Chao Hsien, China. These are fine investments for the kingdom. J. E. Tisdale and wife, of Kentucky, have just given $5,000 for a hospital for Dr. Elliott Osgood of Chu Cheo, China.

There is nothing so costly as success. As the work grows the needs multiply. Buildings and other equipment must be provided. This fact should be borne in mind by all the friends of the work.

W. R. Hunt, of China, writes that this has been his greatest year in evangelism. He is very happy in his work. He is entering his work in Wuhu full of joy and love and peace.

Two friends of the society in Akron, Ohio, have just pledged $5,000 for a much needed mission press and equipment at Vigan, Philippine Islands. S. J. COREY, Secretary.

Cincinnati, Ohio.

USE THE ELECTRICITY
Of Your Own Body
To Regain Health

Electricity moves every muscle and performs every function of the Body and Brain. All the secretions and excretions are Electrical Processes. These facts are proved by Andrew McConnell through his Science of Human Electricity.

Electricity run into a muscle contracts it—the negative current expanding the positive contracting, and it is the constant contraction and expansion of the vital organs which keep up their normal functions.

Take the stomach for example—it is the contraction and expansion of that organ which produces Peristaltic Action (churning movement) and prevents fermentation of the food. Again the attraction from the blood of the elements which form the gastric fluids is an electrical process and does not exist when this power is not present.

Then take the Intestines—it is their contraction and expansion which pushes the waste matter on and out of the system. Once recharge these organs with sufficient electricity and they function perfectly. There can be no further trouble from Constipation, which is a most annoying and dangerous complaint.

The Heart is an Electrical Pump—the positive current contracts that organ and forces the blood out and into the great arteries to circulate to the remotest parts of the body. The negative current expands the heart and draws the blood back into it through the veins. Thus the circulation is compelled to be poor and imperfect where these currents are not sufficiently strong.

A man's health and mental power is measured by the amount of Electricity in his body; low supply leading inevitably to sickness, and a return to the normal resulting in recovery.

The laws and methods for increasing and regulating the Electrical Production are successfully taught by correspondence and can be easily understood and practiced by everyone. Even the weakened invalid can soon recover normal health and the well man can rapidly increase his working capacity. No drugs, apparatus, applied Electricity or mental suggestions are necessary.

Send for the "McConnell Researches in Organic Electricity," which prove that one can with the Electricity of his own body cure the various forms of disease.

SOCIETY OF UNIVERSAL SCIENCE,
Suite 924, 246 Michigan Tve., Chicago, Ill.

The proof that Electricity is the Life Power, and that it is possible for man to understand and use the laws by which it can be generated and controlled in the human body will bring a new era to mankind.

Mr. McConnell has made a tremendous discovery, which I think is bound to revolutionize science. He has founded a movement which has proved to be world-wide in its influence.

Bethany Graded
Sunday School Lessons
INTERNATIONAL COURSE - - - INTERDENOMINATIONAL HELPS

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

The new graded Sunday-school lessons provided by the International Lesson Committee constitute the

in a half century of Sunday-school progress. The Bethany Graded Lesson Helps for teachers and pupils are the acme of excellence in Sunday-school supplies. The Teacher's Helps are planned so that no one need fear to undertake the teaching of the lesson because of lack of special training.

The publishing houses of sixteen denominations have united to produce a non-sectarian and scientific system of religious instruction. About $200,000 was spent last year in producing these lessons. No such elaborate and artistic helps have ever been offered to the Sunday-schools as this Interdenominational series.

The writers of these lessons are the most expert in the Sunday-school world. They are not chosen because of their denominational connection, but because they are specialists in the teaching of the word of God and possess the fine art of inspiring other teachers. The literature is fascinating to teacher and pupil.

The Bethany Lessons afford the Sunday-schools of the Disciples a signal opportunity for

PROMOTING CHRISTIAN UNION

Both as an expression of unity and as a factor making for deeper unity this enterprise is more significant than any other event in recent church history. The lessons are not prepared in a sectarian spirit, nor for a sectarian purpose, yet the editor is perfectly free to assert his convictions in any point of doctrine vital to him or his constituency. Ample provision is made for teaching the history and plea of the Disciples and for telling the story of Disciple missionary heroes. Certain of the courses will be written by Disciple authors.

YOU CANNOT BE AMONG THE FIRST

To exchange the Uniform for the Graded Lessons, for already thousands of schools are ahead of you—8,000 in the Methodist Church alone, 4,000 in the Presbyterian, and many thousands more, in the sixteen denominations that have made the forward step, with Disciples' Schools in rapidly increasing numbers.

BUT DO NOT BE AMONG THE LAST!

These Lessons may be begun at any time. October 2 is the beginning of the year. Send immediately for samples, prices and order blank.

Not a Representative Motto

FOUR STRATEGIC POINTS IN THE ULTIMATE RELIGION OF AMERICA AND THE WORLD.

An Inspired Bible or No Scriptures.
A Divine Christ or No Savior.
Scriptural Baptism or No Baptism.
A United Church or No Christianity.

The Christian-Evangelist is requesting the Disciples of Christ to allow it to occupy a unique position as representative of the brotherhood.

Such a request invests every Disciple with the duty of thinking through the whole question of a brotherhood paper. Whether with our peculiar freedom as a people, our wide variety of opinion, our continually growing thought-systems, it will make for the well-being of the brotherhood for any single paper to be put in a position where it can assume to be the brotherhood's representative, is a question calling for dispassionate and long-sighted discussion.

Such discussion should be carried on during the period of the Christian Evangelist's candidacy for this unique position.

The Christian Century will leave to others to consider the abstract question whether in general such an organ will help or imperil the Disciples' cause. We wish to raise the very specific and concrete question whether the Christian-Evangelist is now under its new management representing the ideals of the brotherhood.

This question we feel justified in discussing without apology.

The reactionary character of the paper, since its editorial control passed from the hands of J. H. Garrison, has been the occasion of much regretful comment among those who had become accustomed to looking to it for forward leadership.

A motto formulated soon after the new management came in, and nailed to the mast-head where it floats continually, explains for each discerning reader why the contents of the paper do not answer to the finer ideals of the Disciples.

The motto is reproduced at the head of this article in order that it may be examined thoughtfully. The gist of all that The Christian Century has to say concerning it is that it neither represents the ideals of the Disciples of Christ nor are its points in any sense strategic.

"An Inspired Bible or No Scriptures."

This antithesis is an anachronism.

The whole trend of sensible religious thinking today, both conservative and radical, is to regard the theological doctrine of inspiration as superfluous. It is becoming plainer every day that the Scriptures stand by their own intrinsic worth without any dogmatic prop whatsoever.

Not scholars alone, but plain, thoughtful men are saying: If the Bible is true it does not need a doctrine of inspiration, and if it is not true no inspiration can make it true.

It is the truth of the Bible that is the important matter, and when you go to the trouble to add inspiration to truth you have not enhanced the value of truth a whit.

Now to set the Bible in a place where its value and its very existence depend upon a doctrine of its inspiration is to render it insecure in the peoples' mind and to rob it of half its power. The power of the Bible is in its immediate appeal, its wonderful lighting up of the dark pathway of life, its comforting revelations when the soul is stricken and distressed, its gracious promises of forgiveness and reconciliation as a result of repentance, its complete answer to man's whole need.

To make the doctrine of inspiration a strategic point in the ultimate religion of America and the world is absurd. The world is fast forgetting the doctrine in its earnest effort to apply the truth of the Bible tothe life of mankind.

"A Divine Christ or no Savior."

This anthithesis is a truism.

There was never a time in the history of Christianity when the divine glory of Jesus Christ was so universally recognized as now. In no influential quarter is there an issue over the divinity of Jesus.

To call this antithesis strategic is to create an issue where there is none, for the purpose, perhaps, of a mock victory. Christian scholars of today are not interested in defining the office of Christ. They are deeply devoted to the high enterprise of finding out how he lived, understanding what he taught, and catching the secret by which other human lives may be made like him.

There are no signs that this old issue of the creeds will be revived in the religious consciousness of the world. This consciousness will regard it as settled and go on to the vital matters of obedience and faith.

"Scriptural Baptism or No Baptism."

This antithesis is a gratuity.

And it cannot be spoken in a tone of voice which does not carry an affront.

Its intended implication is that somebody else practices an unscriptural form of baptism. The Christian-Evangelist does not represent the true spirit of the Disciples of Christ in making this implication.

As individual Christians Disciples have their individual convictions on the baptism question—the editors of The Christian Evangelist and the editors of The Christian Century among the rest. But the Disciples of Christ, as the body of those who strive to practice Christian union, do not take sides in the controversy over this dogma or any other dogma.

The Disciples, as pleaders for union, have learned that to try to enforce one's own individual dogma by claiming that it alone is scriptural, does but harden and fix those of opposite minds in their contention.

Our ideals, therefore, call for a spirit of tolerance toward others who are every whit as loyal to Christ and the Bible as are we ourselves, such a spirit of tolerance as will even allow that their view of the Scripture may be right and ours wrong.

But even more offensive to broad-visioned Christian men is the inclusion of the baptism question as one of "the strategic points of the ultimate religion of America and the world!" How deep into the problems of human life has a mind gone which can make so solemn an asseveration about an item of the Christian ritual?

How far can we expect the Christian world to trust the Disciples as guides to unity when our leaders give a representation of our sense of proportion and perspective that amounts to a caricature?

The baptism problem is a real problem. But it is small, almost negligible, compared with other problems. To set down the first one that comes to our mind—it is not so strategic as the problem of the Lord's day. Yet the Lord's day is not named as one of the strategic problems of the ultimate religion of America and the world.

The truth is that baptism is not strategic at all.

It is an irritating, perhaps often an exasperating, problem, but that is the most that can be said of it.

"A United Church or no Christianity."

This antithesis is an obscurantism.

It must be admitted that in this last item of the motto there is an attempt to state a big, live, real issue that Christianity actually faces.

But the creator of the motto has sacrificed clearness to the antithetical form in which his other devices are cast. It would be hard to justify the obvious meaning of this slogan—that without a united church there will some day be no Christianity. It may be a true prediction and again it may not.

Anyhow, the Disciples are not interested in Christian union as a means of preserving Christianity. They are pleading for Christian union as a means to a triumphant Christianity.

In a further article The Christian Century will try to state what some, at least, of the really strategic problems of ultimate religion are. Our present purpose is to say frankly and in as plain terms as we can find that a religious movement operating under the motto standing on the front page of The Christian Evangelist is impotent to touch the really live, crying needs of this human world.

Such a movement is bound to be provincial, academic, contentious, legalistic, clannish.

It is the firm conviction of The Christian Century that such a motto does not represent that catholic-tempered people known as the Disciples of Christ.

Chapters From a Travel Journal

VI. Disciples Discussing Family Troubles

The good health of the Disciples' conscience on the subject of Christian union is nowhere better illustrated than in the "Supplemental Conference" held immediately after the Anglo-American Conference on Christian union in London. Having considered the question of unity in its wider interdenominational aspect, the Disciples betook themselves from Caxton Hall to the West London Tabernacle to come to close quarters with their own duty, to face their new opportunities and to try to remove the shame of their own internal division.

Two days were given to the consideration of their family affairs—the same length of time as that given to the main Conference. On the first day the company of perhaps 150 representative Disciples discussed their relation to the great trend toward unity that has set in over the whole Christian world. Missionaries J. E. McGavran and A. F. Hensey spoke concerning the progress of union in foreign lands

It fell to my lot to speak on "Lectureship and Conferences on Christian Union" as a means of promoting union sentiment and studying union problems. The discussion was in every way gratifying. There was strong feeling that the Disciples were not fulfilling their mission by simply organizing churches and growing as the denominations grow. It is our task to mingle freely with all Christians, to put ourselves in a position to conduct such a conference as the one we have been holding in London and to encourage everywhere a dispassionate study of the problem of unity.

The practical outcome of this day's session was the adoption of a resolution looking toward the forming of a Christian Union League which shall be a definite society, interdenominational in its membership, and given wholly to the cause of Christian union. A committee was appointed to frame a memorial to the various religious bodies of Great Britain asking their co-operation in forming such a league.

Rev. Leslie W. Morgan proposed the forming of this league in a well-considered address. He was made chairman of the committee whose other members are Rev William Durban, Rev. H. A. Procter and Rev. George A. Quiggan. I sincerely hope this committee will take its task seriously and set about, with whatever patient preparation and waiting is necessary, to make such a call as will meet with hearty and influential response.

Yet the paradox of all this is pathetic. As I read the history of the origin of the Disciples, and feel their ideals in my own soul, I cannot with unalloyed satisfaction think of them as organizing a Christian union league. My conception of the Disciples is that they are such a league. It was to be such a league that they were born; and now to find themselves in such a position that in order to foster the cause of unity they must organize a league outside their own body is a sad commentary on our later hitsory.

When Thomas Campbell stepped out of the Presbyterian Church the Christian Association of Washington, Pennsylvania, was organized as a Christian union league. It was not meant to be another denomination. The fear that it might become a denomination, or be regarded as such, actuated the Campbells in accepting the opportunity to identify the movement with the Baptist church. These fathers did not wish to father a new denomination. They would have resented the proposal of one of their number to form a Christian Union League. That is what we are already, they would have said.

I do not make these observations to discredit in any degree the program of the English Disciples. I am heart and soul committed to their league. It is my prayer that it may prosper greatly in their land and spread to our own. But the very act of organizing such a league reveals the far departure of the Disciples from the original ideals of their movement. Can these original ideals be recovered? Can the Disciples become for our day the league of those churches of Christ and those Christians who believe in the duty of Christian union and strive to practice it?

To answer yes, is to commit oneself to the forward movement among the Disciples, a movement which finds its inspiration in the uncompleted and, by many, unperceived, task to which our fathers set their hands.

Next day came the conference between representatives of the two groups of Disciples in Great Britain. I had not intended to be present, for so much of my stay in London had been taken up with meetings that I felt it my duty to do some sight-seeing. But I was prevailed upon to attend. And now I wish to testify that I had rather have missed Westminster Abbey than that little, informal conference between the conservative and progressive Disciples.

My readers should know something of the conditions in order to appreciate this conference. The Campbellian movement spread to England in its earlier days. It took on a very stereotyped form there, however. Without a paid ministry, without instrumental music and with close communion it differed from the main body in the United States. Less than forty years ago Timothy Coop, a wealthy and devout leader of the church in Southport, became convinced that they were making but little progress. He studied the methods and temper of the American churches and finally decided to put his money back of an enterprise to organize Disciple churches in England on the American plan. Few, if any of the existing churches co-operated in this movement. The result was that the new churches organized were compelled to consider themselves an association apart from the older churches. They are today bound together in the Christian Association and are about twenty-five in number.

The "Old Brethren," as they are often called, are much larger than the progressive body, having about 300 churches and some 15,000 members. Several attempts have been made to bring the two groups together, not only without success but without signs of progress. This conference is yet another attempt. Both sides feel the scandal of division and respond with deep and sincere emotion to an appeal for unity. Uptodate, however, the response has been altogether an emotional one.

When I got to the Tabernacle that morning Mr. Morgan was speaking. On one side of the church were seated the "old brethren," and on the other the "American brethren," as they are often called, because they follow American methods and their churches are in many cases aided by American missionary funds. I was much impressed with the countenances of the conservative side. They were grand looking men. Piety and purity were in their faces. But I thought they scanned everything narrowly. Many had note-books in their hands and were following Mr. Morgan's speech with their lead pencils.

A. McLean was chairman. Following Mr. Morgan's speech in which he drew the curve which it was deemed wise for the conference to follow, the meeting was thrown open with the understanding that alternate speeches were to be made, one from the conservative and then one from the progressive side, as long as the discussion continued. And the discussion continued—from nine in the morning until after three o'clock. At the lunch hour all were sustained by the feeling that it was meat and drink to be doing the work we were engaged in, and we soon forgot the demands of the body. Not a person left the house until the meeting adjourned.

I have very little space in which to say what was done. The differences between the two groups were enumerated and discussed. The organ, the title "Rev." the salaried preacher, close communion, "close" contribution (for some of the conservative churches refuse money proffered by non-members)—all were gone over. The position taken by the "old brethren" was that in restoring New Testament Christianity we must take their side on these questions. Mr. McLean voiced the progressive conception when he contended that the New Testament is not explicit on these questions, and the most the conservatives are warranted in claiming is that their position rests upon inferences from the New Testament, not upon direct teaching.

Finally a resolution was presented. It was based more upon the constructive statement made by Mr. Morgan at the opening than upon the controversial utterances of the discussion. It was interesting to watch this resolution undergo the microscopic examination of these good men who read their Bible with painful attention to the letter. It was read aloud a dozen times if it was read once. Now one word was changed, now another. The mover of the resolution stood with pencil in hand ready to make any change that anybody suggested. But when it was proposed to change the words "conscientious convictions," in the last sentence, to "New Testament teachings," he balked! This he insisted would beg the whole question and make no progress at all. Perhaps it was because he had been generous in a score of other changes that the conference allowed this item to pass unchanged. Following is the resolution as it finally passed unanimously:

"Resolved, that it is the sense of this conference that it is the will of Christ our common Lord, that the two communities to which we respectively belong as individuals, should become one in our common loyalty to Him, and that we believe it most desirable to effect between the two communities a genuine Christian union which will not involve the surrender of the conscientious convictions of ourselves or our churches."

This is not very much, but it is all that could be gotten through that conference. And it may become a basis of further overtures, for it was provided that a joint committee should be appointed by the annual meetings of both groups to point the way to more intimate co-operation.

The one fact which emerged from this conference more plainly than all else was the failure of the "Restoration of New Testament Christianity" idea as a Christian union principle. The notion that this "Restoration" idea is peculiar to the Disciples is a strange obsession. That Disciples wish the establishment of New Testament Christianity more heartily or more consciously than other Christian people is simply not so. All the sectarian divisions of Protestantism justify themselves by the appeal to the same New Testament which Disciples read. The sorry divisions among the Disciples themselves—this British division, and our American division between the main body and the one hundred thousand so-called "anti" brethren—are rooted in the failure to agree on what New Testament Christianty is.

This is not to say that the principle of the restoration of New Testament Christianity is an illegitimate principle. I would affirm, on the contrary that it is not only a legitimate principle but a highly necessary one. But it is not a principle of union. A true principle of union must transcend the controversy over the details of New Testament Christianity. Or, to say the same thing conversely, the ideal of a New Testament Christianity is to be worked out, if at all, in a united church, not in a divided one.

Here, as I see it, is where the Disciples' unique contribution is to be made to Christian union: by illustrating in their practice the possibility of uniting in one fellowship all Christian souls who love and obey Christ without waiting for their agreement on the exact terms of New Testament Christianity.

May our English brethren of both groups lead in making this demonstration!

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

The Persistence of Temptation

We are tempted as long as we are growing. There is always the tendency to be satisfied with a habit already formed when a better one is needed to fit the circumstances. The most strenuous long at times for the comfort of those whose habits are formed and are pleasing to them. The constant attention required during the period of forming habits exhausts nervous energy and we give way to anarchistic impulse. As soon as the doing of one right thing has passed beyond the stage of attention and has become automatic, other demands are made and new habits must be acquired.

Race habit is a source of temptation. What the race has done is written in the nervous structure of every new generation. The race has not always done what it ought to have done. A habit that was good for the hunter and herdsman may not be good for their descendants. The evils of economic and political life are in no small measure due to the persistence of ideas of honesty and truthfulness which our ancestors acquired when they were in the tribal state and fought wild beasts and wild men for the privilege of living upon the earth. Many a man who thinks he is in the front rank of progress is governed by the moral code of the jungle. He does not know how far behind the times he is.

Individual habit is a source of temptation. Once we have become accustomed to doing a piece of work in the wrong way, we have trouble for the rest of our days if we try to discover and use the right way. A good man said to me a few days ago: "I find that some bad habits of my youth are coming back to me with added strength. I thought I was done with swearing but I am not. I am easily angered." The excited man drops back into the dialect of his childhood and forgets the choice language he has been taught in the schools. In like manner, moments of intense emotion bring to light what we wrote on our hearts in early life. If we wrote evil, the strength of the present temptation is greatly increased. The reformed drunkard and gambler have a tremendous load of temptation to carry. So have the reformed liar, thief, and business shark.

"The end justifies the means," is a motto much honored in practice where it is repudiated in theory. Men become so absorbed in what they are doing that they lose all sense of right and wrong with respect to the methods they employ. This is true of preachers of the gospel. They resort to methods of advancing the church which they denounce when the business man employs them. The devices which good men tolerate in connection with revivals are often a disgrace to religion. Concern for the increase of the church in membership and power shuts the eyes to the plainest sort of fraud in "winning souls." In order to defeat the rascals, votes are bought and the party of reform finds itself under obligations to the very element it denounced. It is easy for a good citizen, in the excitement of an election, to persuade himself that, if there are marketable votes, his party ought to have them inasmuch as it alone can save the country from ruin.

The wise man expects temptation at every turn in life and he prepares to meet it. He trains himself to recognize sin under its many disguises. He avoids temptation when he can. Only the fool tests himself to see how strong he is. Temptation needlessly invited always wins the first point. The sort of temptation which the wise man openly chooses is that which comes along with duty. This world is no place for men who choose to get under the shelter of a wall and watch the rest of mankind struggling with the dust storm in the road. The brave man takes his place among the fighters. In fact, he goes into politics because politicians are crooked. If they were not, he would not be needed by the state. He is in the church because there are crooks and hypocrites in it. He fights them where they are. If the church were filled with saints, the brave man would have some reason for letting it take care of itself. That he may not be surprised by temptation he goes daily to the cross of Christ to learn the meaning of truth and goodness. He there learns to despise the mean subterfuges by which men try to justify their treason to the moral ideal. Morality is secure when the passion for souls which is revealed in the cross is given the place so often occupied by the desire for respectability.

Editorial Table Talk

Reformers Before the Reformation

The records of the First Church of Disciples, New York City, reach back to October, 1810, when a number of persons met for the study of the Scriptures, calling themselves the Disciples of Christ in New York. They abandoned all creeds formed by men and accepted Christ as their only creed. They agreed to read the Scriptures diligently and follow their teachings. There is credible evidence that there were meetings before that date, but no formal records. This congregation has never missed a communion service one Sunday in a hundred years. Their centennial celebration taking place this week, beginning last Sunday with an address by Dr. B. B. Tyler and closing next Sunday with the centennial sermon by H. L. Willett is a signal event. In view of the fact that the congregation was meeting and worshipping before the Campbells left the Presbyterian church, they feel that they are really celebrating the centennial of the Disciples of Christ.

A Notable Ministry

The Christian Century regards a long pastorate as one of the most creditable commentaries on both congregation and preacher. In these days when the pastoral bond is held lightly, due note should be given of every exception. In the case of Rev. A. C. Smither, pastor of the First Church, Los Angeles, Cal., we take especial satisfaction in setting down the achievements of his twenty years' leadership. Mr. Smither went to Los Angeles direct from Butler College, where he had just graduated, in 1890. He has had but this one pastorate. His was the only congregation of Disciples in the city at the beginning of his ministry in the First Church. Today there are eighteen. During the twenty years, 1,300 persons have been taken into and removed from the First church, besides the 1,100 who constitute its present membership. Mr. Smither is the dean of all the preachers in Los Angeles. He is identified vitally with every movement for the uplift of the community's life. His work has been primarily spiritual in its emphasis. Twice he has traveled through the Holy Land. He loves books and succeeds in keeping alive to the movements of his age. His anniversary was celebrated two weeks since by religious services and social events with much enthusiasm. The Christian Century hopes Mr. Smither may never have another pastorate!

From Laboratory to Pulpit

It has long been our conviction that the most important testimony to the truth of religion and the reality of a spiritual world is yet to come, not from theologians but from psychologists. The day of dogma is past. The scientific method of study and proof sweeps the field. Many of the old arguments for faith are without point and meaning to the modern mind. But because the old arguments are dead it must not be imagined that the old verities are dead. They were never so alive and so insistent as today. And happily a new type of proof is forthcoming—the professors call it a new apologetic—which grounds itself in the bed-rock of experience and follows the most rigid method known to any science and comes out, fairly and without stumbling, on the side of faith. The psychologists are the apostles of this new gospel. It is a notable event, therefore, that the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ should have gone into a psychological laboratory to find a star speaker to tour the country in the interests of masculine religion. The name of Professor Arthur Holmes, of the University of Pennsylvania, has become well known to the entire body of Disciples through his recently completed convention journey across the continent. Everywhere he has spoken as a man with a message. His message was spiritual, idealistic, evangelical. He gave men a new grip on religion. And he gave many men a new conception of the work science is doing. That science has any word to say against the verities of religion he bluntly denied. In a passionate outburst of personal testimony he told his Springfield, Ill., audience that his own faith had never been so firm as today—not so firm when he was a child, nor when he was a student of Hebrew and theology, nor yet when he was pastor of a church, as it is today when as a teacher of psychology much of the old argument for faith is useless. The minister, he said, need make no apology for his work, and he should therefore abandon the apologetic air. "Let the minister, therefore, insist upon the right of his message. Let him recognize that the scientist—the biologist, the physicist, the chemist, the psychologist, —and the metaphysician have their distinctive and clear cut fields. But let him insist and insist and insist that he equally has his field, his territory, his holy ground, and upon that he is supreme. The foundations for his realm are laid so deep and so strong that not one scientific fact nor one scientific theory ever framed by the mind of an investigator can touch them. His realm is above sense perception, beyond the ken of the measuring rule however fine, beyond the ferreting microscope or the sweeping telescope, yet always so close to every man's every day life that it was said of it, "the Kingdom of God is in the midst of you.'"

Celebrating Origin of Protestantism

In Germany, France and Switzerland, the Protestant churches have the custom of celebrating the birth of the Protestant Reformation on the last Sunday in October or the first in November. The last Pan-Presbyterian Alliance suggested that Presbyterian pastors all over the world use one of these days to preach on the Protestant Reformation, the principles which guided it and the blessings which flowed from it. This would be a wholesome custom for Protestant preachers of all denominations. At the Edinburgh Conference last summer when the Anglican High Church Bishops, with the long rope allowed them by Chairman Mott, were disporting themselves rather too familiarly with Rome and Roman ideas, an American delegate cleared the air and brought the Conference back to its breath again by declaring that he was "not yet ready to apologize for the Protestant Reformation." It is still timely for the pulpit to discourse upon the rescue of primitive Christianity from the clutch of degenerate authority in which Martin Luther found it.

Congregationalists and Episcopalians

October is to witness, besides the national convention of the Disciples at Topeka, the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Cincinnati and the National Council of the Congregational churches in Boston. The latter is a celebration of the Centennial of the American Board of Missions, the oldest missionary society in America. A program of marvelous richness is announced, both in point of speakers and themes to be considered. The great subjects of modern religious and social life will be discussed. In the papers just now there is some revival of earlier talk on the possibilities of union between Episcopalians and Congregationalists. In an editorial on the subject, recently, The Congregationalist (Boston) undertakes frankly to describe the situation as it lies in the minds of Congregationalists, in order that there may not be useless waste of time in fruitless discussion and "to save the waste of these awakened impulses to fellowship which are impressing the world anew with the greatness of Christian love and the unity of Christian faith." In one paragraph the Congregational position is summed up.

"The barrier preventing any organic union between the Episcopal and the Congregational denominations is as impassable now as it has ever been. Attempts have recently been made by some Congregational leaders, notably by Dr. Newman Smyth and other honored brethren in Connecticut, to propose Episcopal ordination of Congregational ministers as a via media for such a union. But the method of ordination practiced by the Episcopal Church is not regarded by Congregationalists as an obstacle to union. The barrier is the theory of the ministry held by the Episcopal Church. Congregationalists protest against the claim that they have not a valid ministry and are not a church of Christ because they refuse to attribute to any order of men or to any institution a power imparted by Christ to be the necessary intermediary between the soul and him."

The Congregationalist holds the position of the Disciples that union on a dogma is neither possible nor desirable, whether that dogma be the historic episcopate or immersion-baptism of any other dogma. Against the episcopate as a historic institution, gathering into itself certain aesthetic and historical, even religious, values, we would imagine the Congregationalist would raise no objection. But that the Congregational ministry should submit to be reordained, thus implying the invalidation of their present status as ministers, is inconceivable. All talk about Christian union is an affront and an impertinence which does not begin by the frank and hearty acknowledgement of the ministerial status of the present Christian ministry. And, it may be added, all union talk which, to enforce the dogma of immersion, proposes to invalidate the present Christian status of the larger portion of Christendom by re-baptizing those who have not been immersed, is to be characterized in the same way.

Commotion Caused by Comma.

Behold what a great commotion a little comma kindleth, over in England. Some one recently called attention to the fact that in the republication of the Book of Common Prayer sixteen years ago, certain persons, "deliberately and without authority," changed a comma in the Lord's Prayer, and that the change has persisted ever since. Where it formerly read, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven," it now reads, "Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven." The new method of punctuation makes the clause, "on earth as it is in heaven" apply to the prayer "Thy kingdom come," as well as to the clause, "Thy will be done." The change has been adopted by the King's printers, and also by the University presses in their editions of the Bible, so it seems that it has come to stay. As the original Greek texts are unpunctuated, we can take our choice, and many people will regard the change as one for the better. The matter, however, is causing a great deal of discussion and some ill feeling in certain quarters in England.

Emigration to Siberia.

There was a time, not a very great many years ago, when the better part of the civilized world looked with horror on Russia's system of exiling political prisoners to Siberia, that vast country of snow and ice and solitude, by the imperial will and without due process of law. So intense was the feeling that the Russian government in 1904 abolished the system and substituted regular court procedure. This was considered a great reform, and so it was. But perhaps Siberia is not such a bad country as it was pictured. At any rate it would seem so, for Russians are now emigrating to that country in large numbers, of their own free will. Last year Russian emigration reached the highest figures yet, and the great majority of the emigrants went to Siberia. It is estimated that 500,000 Russians settle there annually. Of course the opening up of the country by the Trans-Siberian railway has had much to do with it. And then, too, no doubt many thousands of Russians leave the mother country every year on the theory that they can not possibly make their condition worse, no matter where they go.

A Successful Tipless Hotel.

There is a non-tip hotel in the Strand, London, which is a success so far. It has been running just about a year now, and all the rooms are taken all the time, and every day the managers have to turn people away. The success of the hotel the directors believe, is mainly due to the non-tip rule. Guests are forbidden to offer any servant of the hotel a gratuity and servants found accepting them are instantly dismissed. People know exactly what it is going to cost them before they set foot in the hotel and when they pay their bill there is no need for them to put their hands into their pockets to tip anybody. The management has had no difficulty in securing plenty of waiters and chambermaids despite the fact that they receive no tips.

George V. and Temperance.

It is a gratification to learn that the new King of England is so interested in the progress of temperance reform. A worker in the total abstinence ranks tells in the Methodist Times of a conversation of some length that he had in India with George V., then Prince of Wales. He described to the prince the personal side of his work among the army men—individuals saved from habits of intemperance, sons gladdening their parents' hearts by long-prayed-for reformation, and contributing to the support of widowed mothers, out-of-work fathers and crippled sisters. The prince expressed his deep satisfaction at the life stories which were unfolded, and was profoundly moved as he heard what the grace of God had accomplished among his soldiers. He was much impressed by the hymn-singing among the sailors and marines on the ship that had brought him to India. He had listened with great interest to their spiritual songs as the men met together for Bible study, praise and prayer. He approved of the striking of a silver badge, bearing his own crest, to be presented to each soldier in the cavalry, artillery and infantry, who had done the best in the cause of temperance.

Summer Vacation Schools.

Vacation schools have become quite popular of late in some cities. They are found especially valuable for those pupils who failed of promotion in June, and for those who wish to strengthen their grade work and get in better condition for the coming year's work. A year ago last June ninety classes were formed in New York City for summer vacation work. The sessions were from nine to twelve o'clock. Only teachers with a high record were selected for the work. Admission to these classes was by certificate made out by the regular class teacher. The certificate indicated the subjects in which the child was weak, usually arithmetic or English. The main work of the summer school was thorough drill. There was no problem of discipline, as all of the pupils were interested and earnest in their work. Of the 2,798 pupils who entered these classes for the purpose of making their promotion, 1,935 succeeded, while the remaining 863 made good progress. All of the 702 pupils who entered simply for the purpose of making themselves strong in grade work, succeeded in a very marked degree.

Explorers.

The missionaries have climbed mountains, examined temperature, taken the latitude and longitude of their stations, made charts, gathered data about the flowers and vegetables and animals and the geological formation of their mission fields. The whole modern educational system of India, devised by Macaulay, is rightly credited by him to Carey and Duff.

But the most remarkable by-product of all has been kept for the last word. It is in the field of literature. In many a case the missionary has made a written language. That was done in the South Sea islands by Dr. Paton. Hundreds of dialects in Africa and Asia have been reduced to writing by them. Morrison made a dictionary for China, Carey for India, Hepburn for Japan, Judson for Burma, Bronson for Assam, Nathan Brown for the Telugus, but the list is too long to give. They have created their technical and general, as well as religious literature.

And this does not take account of the moral and religious regeneration now going on in the mission fields.

Outdoor Campaigning in England.

The English are great for open-air meetings, especially political meetings. They form a great and distinguishing feature in political campaigns. A few days ago forty-two conservative campaign vans left London on an open-air speaking tour throughout England and Wales to last three months and embrace 10,000 meetings in 400 constituencies. Each van is fearfully and wonderfully equipped, gramophones, cinematographs and acetylene gas apparatus being mixed up with cooking utensils, hammocks, tents and a large assortment of foreign manufactures dumped in England by protectionist nations. The vans will work principally in the rural districts, but many meetings will be held in the centers of population and industry. It is the object of the campaign to reach everybody, and especially people who ordinarily take little interest in political issues. In every locality visited the van men will be joined by the local political hustlers, so that the campaign, it is expected, will be one of the hottest yet seen in England.

Celebrating Italian Freedom.

It is now just forty years since the Italian troops entered and took possession of Rome, and the temporal power of the Pope in Italy and its capital passed away forever. It was a bitter experience for the Pope of that day, and for such of his followers who believed that all other earthly powers should be subservient to him. From that time to the present the fiction has been preserved that the Pope is a prisoner in Rome. It is a harmless fiction, and deceives nobody. Meantime, since the Italian nation freed itself from the Popish rule it has made fine progress in many ways. As an instance, in 1870 the imports from the United States to Italy were valued at $6,474,653. In 1909 they had risen to $58,509,595. During the same period the exports from Italy to the United States had risen from $6,641,566 to $49,287,894. postal savings banks deposits rose from about $50,000,000 in 1870 to $290,808,886 in 1908. In this connection it is well to recall from a letter written to John G. Whittier and read at a great public meeting held in New York city on January 12, 1871, to celebrate the emancipation of Italy from Popish rule: "It is a great thing that the redemption of Rome has been effected so easily and bloodlessly. The despotism of a thousand years fell at a touch in noiseless rottenness. The people of Rome, fifty to one, cast their ballots of condemnation, like so many shovels full of earth, upon its grave. The withdrawal of the temporal power of the Pope will prove a blessing to the Catholic church, as well as to the world. A century hence, it will have a few apologists as the Inquisition or the Massacre of St. Bartholomew."

Polygamy Still Practiced.

Polygamy is supposed to be prohibited by law in the United States. Twenty years ago the Morman hierarchy at Salt Lake City pretended to abolish polygamy, in obedience to the law. Was it really done? The Salt Lake Tribune says not, and recently printed a list of 139 names of Mormons, nearly all of them bishops and elders of the church, who are charged with having taken unto themselves plural wives since the law went into effect. Most of these marriages, it is true, took place in Mexico but many of them in the United States. A large number of those married in Mexico have brought their plural wives to the United States, and are now living with them, in violation of the law. The Tribune does not charge that polygamy is general among the Mormons, but it estimates that instances of actual polygamy are about ten times as numerous as it has been able to discover. The fact that practically all the instances it can trace are among accredited officials of the Mormon church lends color to the charge that the church is deliberately aiming to keep alive the custom of plural marriage.

A Sermon on the City

"For we have not here an abiding city." Hebrews 13:14

BY REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D. D.

It is reported that the great German Chancellor, Bismarck, declared on one occasion that great cities are great sores upon the body politic. I do not suppose any of us who are at all familiar, experimentally with the cities of to-day, or from our reading with the history of the cities of the world, will be inclined to differ from that opinion. The history of cities has through all time been the history of the gathering together of men, and the presence among them of forces which destroy. We are perpetually confronted in our dealing with human nature with two apparently contradictory impulses. The first is that of the gathering together of men into the life of the city; and the second is that of the ceaseless and almost restless desire to be away from the city.

The Passion of Men.

Abraham left Ur of the Chaldees because in it he could find no rest, and he left it seeking a city whose Builder and Maker is God. That chapter is gathered carefully around that central word of revelation; and thus we discover that the march of these men, their pilgrimage, their warfare, their constructive passion, were inspired by the vision of a city, a city established, a city of perfect order, a city whose Builder and Framer is God.

The city which Abraham went to seek was not a city postponed beyond this world; but the city of God established on the earth; the city of God, the symbol of the whole wide world subdued to the Kingship of God. Toward that the men of faith have ever moved. Toward that the men of faith are moving still to-day. The supreme passion of faith is not the selfish desire to win heaven, but the self-emptying desire and devotion to win the earth for God.

In every human being there is a sense of the city, and the desire for the city. However much we would if we could—and let me say it quite bluntly, we would if we could—keep our young people away from great cities, and let them live in the country; we cannot keep them away, the lure of the city is in the heart of the young. they crowd toward the city, I am not discussing the question from the economic standpoint, but from the human standpoint. The underlying passion for the city is according to the Divine purpose, according to the Divine will; one of the primal forces of life, one of the elemental things of human nature, from which there can be no escape.

Expresses Human Failure.

Whether you count the Scripture lesson of this evening as poetry or history for the moment, I care nothing; I am after its central lesson. The first city the Bible names was built by Cain, a murdered, a self-centered man, whose offering was refused because he was refused. That is the first city to which the Bible refers. The naming of names will be enough to help us to see the history of cities since—Sodom, Babylon, Nineveh, Carthage, Rome, Paris, London, New York—a long continuous succession, and always the same thing, the city expressing human failure as nothing else can; startling the ages, and inevitably passing and perishing; in the time of their existence—places where evil gathers, and where Satan's seat is; then crumbling to decay.

Man is always attempting to build a city; he has never yet built a city. Why? Because man has been attempting to construct a city out of a garden, in forgetfulness of the God of the garden, and the laws of his own life in relationship to that God.

Why?

"We have not here an abiding city." Why not? Let us answer that question first, by reminding ourselves of what the Christian character really is, and what it therefore demands.

The first essential element of the Christian character is the death of self—so easily said, so imperfectly understood, so little realized—the death of self; not the destruction of self, but the death of self, so far as self is a separate personality, thinking only of itself and making all outside forces minister to its own well-being and advancement.

The result in the economy of grace is holiness of character; purity of motive; holiness and righteousness, the two sides of the one great pure Christly character; holiness, rectitude of character; righteousness, rectitude of conduct springing out of rectitude of character. Add to these two things that one inclusive word which has in it the fire of holiness and the passion of self-denial, the great word love. These are the distinctive elements of Christian character.

The City of God.

What are the resultant needs of the people who share this character? A dwelling place in harmony; the congregating together of like characters; enterprise inspired only by such motives; the City of God. The presence and work of our Lord in the world was for the creation of these characteristics, and of this character. I go further, and say that the presence and work of our Lord in the world has resulted in the creation of these characteristics and of this character. Dealing with individual men He communicates the dynamic which produces the change; and those who are so converted, turned back again to the divine ideal for humanity, born again, find their life centered no longer in self but in God, and are conscious of the passion for holiness without which no man can see the Lord, and feel within them the thrill and throb and driving of this great eternal life. Those who partake of these characteristics become men and women who are constrained to say, "We have not here an abiding city." The men of faith are homeless in this world, having no place where they can perfectly rest; having no place where the surroundings are in harmony with the mysterious and mighty forces of their own life, as created by their contact with this Lord Christ Himself.

Plato's Explanation.

Turn from that first consideration, and think of earthly cities. We have already glanced at them in general outline, having named several. Plato declared that the origin of the city was the desire of man to protect himself against marauding and wild beasts. Aristotle declared—and came far nearer the deepest truth—that the city was the outcome of the social instinct in individual life. Moses, in the chapter I read, does not attempt to give us a philosophy, but tells the story of the building of a city; it was an attempt to make out of a garden a city, and an attempt to do it without God. Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, by which the writer did not at all attempt to suggest a localized Deity, but in figurative language spoke of a man who turned his back upon God and chose his own way, determining to carve his own fortune, and be independent of the Divine government and instruction. He went out from the presence of the Lord and built a city. In that case the city was the outcome of social instincts on the lowest levels; and men still look upon cities as opportunities for self-aggrandizement, and for ministering to coveteousness.

London.

What is the history of London at this moment? Write it in one brief and burning word, the survival of the strongest—not the survival of the fittest, the fittest is not always the strongest. If you doubt it, stand any Saturday night upon the Embankment with our men who are doing work which is perhaps the most sacred of any we are trying to do, touching the flotsam and jetsam of the city, unemployable men, many of them; but mostly men unemployed as the result of the grind of brute strength flinging out weakness. If you could be divested of your accidental—or if you prefer the word providential—resources, and put down here in this great city with its tides of life and its abundant wealth, what would you do? In spite of all your education and ability, you would be ground with the rest. London is selfish to its heart and core. It is not peculiar in that. That is true of every city in the world to-day.

The Spell of Rome.

Perhaps after all there is no city more eloquent to the man of faith than Rome, the eternal city—oh, the irony of it! Those who have stood in Rome will understand what I mean. Rome is in three layers—pagan, ecclesiastical, modern—and the weakest of these is modern. I am speaking materially of course. There was a strength in pagan Rome which abides until this day in spite of the overlaying of ecclesiastical Rome. There was the strength of awful cunning in ecclesiastical Rome, that abides in hoary magnificence in spite of the newer Rome that is arising. Three layers of failure; perpetual memorials of man's inability to build an eternal city without God.

Whatever city you come into, throughout the world, you will find the same thing. Why? Because of the man who builds; because the man attempting to build is self-centered and not God-centered; because at the heart of city life, varying its expression, changing its garments, altering its methods, there always sits enthroned the individualism of selfishness.

Individual Selfishness.

Look at the advertisements on the boardings or in the newspapers, and listen to the song of self! The Greatest Boom ever offered to the Public! The Greatest Discovery on Earth! The Largest Retail—something—in the World! Buy of Me: Take My Wares: They are the Best! What does that mean? Make me rich, whatever other man many suffer. Selfishness is everywhere.

If these are the incidental symptoms, the essential malady is godlessness, forgetfulness of God. Have you given up the story of Babel? Restore it to your Bible for it is the veritable truth. Let us make us a name! Let us be a confederacy independent of all men, and of God Himself! That is the ancient story of the Bible; but you can find it in to-morrow's newspaper in the last Trust formed, the newest monopoly cursing the earth: Selfishness! That is the history of the city. Self in its lowest forms, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, the pride of life; with a neglect of all those who are unequal to the strife and the struggle. Great cities are great sores upon the body politic.

No Harmony.

"We have not here an abiding city." And again, why not? Because there can be no harmony between the method of sacrificial service and the mastery of covetousness; between the determined proclamation of the evangel that declares salvation for the lost, and the determined propagation of the philosophy which is expressed in the word, the survival of the strongest. The two things contradict each other necessarily and perpetually. We have here no continuing city for we are men of faith; men who believe in God and in holiness and in love. The cities of earth are built by men of sight, attempting to do without God; who speak of sin as though it were an infirmity which does not very much matter; who prate of love but never practice it in commerce, statesmanship, or social life.

The Measure of Separation.

The measure of the separation of Christian men from the maxims and methods and motives of the cities of men is the measure in which they are able to correct the things that are wrong; to destroy the forces that destroy; to construct the city of God. We men of faith make no greater mistake than when we take up our abode in any city of earth saying: "Here are we and of this city we are citizens," saying in contradiction to the great word of the letter: "Here we have found our abiding city!" No, the tent is the symbol of the life of the man of faith, always ready to be disturbed by the Divine government, always ready to respond to the command to move away to bear witness somewhere else. That is the first lesson, but not the last, not the final one.

There is much to be done while we sojourn in the tent. We shall have to pray for Lot and for Sodom; we must go out and fight for the rescue of Lot; but there will always be Melchisedek, the Priest to meet us on our way, and minister to our needs. The first lesson is that of the tent, side by side with the altar.

The Church of God—speaking now in more general terms—can only help the nation, as she is composed of pilgrims, warriors, builders of faith who dwell in tents, and erect altars, and work with sword and with trowel for the building of the city of God.

Our only true content should be in our abiding discontent with everything unlike God. That is but another way of saying all I have been trying to say. The measure in which we sit down in the city, and are content with it, and rejoice over it, and are satisfied with it as it is, is the measure in which we have lost our vision of the city of God, and personal fellowship with the God of the city.

Out of our supreme content and rest in God and in His will, arises the restlessness of perpetual protest against everything that is unlike God. That is the driving force which will enable us to destroy the destructive, and to help in the building of the city of God. Pilgrims, warriors, builders, "We have not here an abiding city"!

Old Past, let go, and drop i' the sea,
Till fathomless waters cover thee!
For I am living, but thou art dead;
Thou drawest back, I strive ahead
The way to find. SIDNEY LANIER.

The Judas of Johann Zwink

BY EDGAR DeWITT JONES.

The Christus of Anton Lang, potter of Ober-Ammergau, is well known. Much but not too much has been written of him and his part. The Judas of Johann Zwink, house painter of the same quaint village should be, next to Lang's Christus, the widest known of the Passion Play. Little, too little, has been written of this interesting person who in the opinion of many is the star actor of Ober-Ammergau.

To begin with Herr Zwink is playing the part this season for the third time. He was thirty-nine when he first took the role, he is sixty-nine now. Assuredly, a man to act such a part for three decades and with increasing power at that must be an extraordinary character.

Make-up Not Elaborate.

Zwink's make-up for the part, I should say, is very little, if anything, in the way of pencilings, and grease paint,—certainly none of false beard or hair. Wigs are not used on the Ober-Ammergau stage. Two years before the play is given those whose parts demand long locks or flowing beards proceed to grow them quite luxuriously. I should suppose some of the players, as for instance Anton Lang, wear the beard and hair long all the time, but this, I am told, is the exception and not the rule. Johann Zwink's face is a worthwhile study since it is wrinkled of brow and furtive of glance. I fancy his style of beard and hair is patterned closely after the Judas of DaVinci's famous picture but of this I have no certain knowledge. From the first appearance of Judas in the Passion Play to the last he is a marked man, not simply or solely because the Judas part is in the very nature of the case, a predominant one, but because Herr Zwink gives the role an impress of his personality so striking as to render it unforgetable when once seen. One essentiality to the portrayal of Judas is so to present him as in the disciple group but not of it, as with the twelve but not one of them. This aloofness, which is a sort of atmosphere created by a score of little details, such as a glance, a pose, a stride or a gesture, Zwink affects consummately.

Take for instance Judas in the Last Supper Scene. There he is way in the background, yet in a very real sense, dominating the scene. Now, his evil face is strongly silhouetted against the shadows so that every feature of the bold profile stands out cameo like.

In the Bargain Scene, Zwink is very strong. There he holds himself in admirable check so that slowly, gradually you see him weakening and finally fairly flinging discretion and conscience to the winds.

The Scene in the Sanhedrim.

The scene in the Sanhedrim where the Rabbi counts out the thirty pieces of silver is one of the most dramatic in the entire play. The silver is counted out to Judas piece by piece and is thrown down on a table with sufficient force to make it ring. In the very midst of the counting, a coin falls off the table and rolls on the floor; instantly, Judas dives after it, returns it to the company of its sordid fellows, and continues to watch avariciously and closely the counting process.

In the Garden Scene Judas is repulsively strong. The traitor's kiss is done not melodramatically but quietly and with successful attempt to show a vestige of affection still in Judas' heart for Jesus.

Of course, the climacteric scene for Judas is his remorse and it is here that Zwink makes the audience to feel his histrionic power. One is actually moved to sympathize with him and his tragic mistake, rather than to condemn him rudely as a great sinner. His penitence seems sincere, not feigned, or inadequate, and you feel somehow that may be beyond the ken of mere mortals even this traitor's sin will be blotted out. Now nothing but fine acting could accomplish this, taken together of course, with his lines which admit of a more lenient interpretation of Judas' act than does the text of the New Testament. Here is the dramatic passage put in his mouth, the greatest and last of the scenes in which Zwink appears. As he ceases speaking and the curtain falls, he is in the act of encircling his neck with the rope girdle in order to strangle out his miserable life.

The Remorse of Judas.

"Where can I go to hide my fearful shame? No forest-shade is dark enough, no mountain-cave is deep enough. Oh, Earth! open thou and swallow me! I cannot, cannot live! Ah, my Master, the best of men, have I sold, given Him up to ill-treatment and to the tortures of a Martyr's death. I, detestable betrayer! Oh, where is there a man on earth on whom such guilt rests? How good He always was to me! How sweetly did he comfort me when dark gloom lay on my soul! How wondrously happy I felt when I sat at his feet, and heavenly teachings, dropped like honey, from His mouth! How sweetly he admonished, even warned me, as I brooded over the scandalous treachery. The dear Lord! and I—I have repaid Him thus! Accursed avarice—thou only hast led me astray, thou hast made me blind and deaf. Thou wast the ring that Satan fastened on me to drag me to the abyss. As no more a disciple I can never look my brethren in the face again.—An outcast, hated everywhere, everywhere despised, even by those who led me astray, branded as a traitor, erring, I wander, with this fire burning within me! Ah, there is still One! Oh, if I might see his face once more! I would cling to him, my only, only hope and anchor. But this One—lies in prison, is perhaps already murdered by wrathful enemies. Ah! no—By me, by me! I, I am the outcast who has brought Him to prison and to death, Oh, woe is me! Scum of mankind! There is no help for me, there is no hope. My crime it is too great. No penance can make it good. He is dead and I am his murderer! Unhappy hour in which my mother brought me into the world—shall I still longer drag out this wretched life. As a pest-stricken, fleeing from men, shunned, despised by all men! No—not one step further—I can bear no more! Here, accursed life, will I end thee. On this tree will hang the most wretched fruit. Ha! come, thou serpent: wind about my neck and strangle the betrayer!"

As An Actor Zwink is Star.

Thus, to the minds of many who sit the famous Passion Play through Johann Zwink as Judas is the star—and this despite the fact that he plays the part of a hated character, one whose very name is synonymous with ingratitude and shame.

Nothing but great ability could produce such a general appreciation of Zwink's power as one easily discovers in the vast audiences that fills the Ober-Ammergau theater. This is Johann Zwink's last season as Judas since it is out of question that he could look the part at 79, though it is easily possible that he might act it successfully. One cannot but doubt if an equal to Johann Zwink's Judas will ever stride the stage at Ober-Ammergau, —certainly none superior.

Our Readers' Opinions

"Interpretation" Running Wild

Editors The Christian Century:—In your issue of May 12, and answering a question of B. H. Cleaver of Lewiston, Ill., which question was as follows:

"Would you advocate the reception of an unimmersed Congregationalist who presented credentials of fellowship from a church of that order, without requiring him to be immersed?"you make the following statement:

"Yes. Such a person is a Christian, a member of the Church of Christ, already in the fellowship of all members of the Church of Christ. Any congregation that denies him the fullest fellowship is a sectarian congregation, narrower in its basis of union than the Church of Christ."

This answer, fairly interpreted, means this:

1. That baptism (immersion) bears no relation whatever to one's becoming a Christian. We are not "baptized into Christ." There is nothing in Peter's pentecostal statement that baptism is unto the remission of sins. In baptism we do not "put on Christ." The commission of our Lord is binding only in part. We are to teach, but baptism is purely a matter of choice and opinion.

There is even no hint here of the dogma of baptismal regeneration. That dogma must not be permitted, however, to frighten us to the wide extreme of attaching no meaning to the plainest statements of the Scripture. One extreme is about as dangerous as the other. There is no good reason why we should swing to either. It is not so much our duty to explain the meaning of these scriptures as it is to practice them. Let those persons who see no efficacy whatever in baptism do the explaining.

2. The form or action of baptism, is to The Christian Century, a matter of opinion. It is not to you a settled question. It is not clear to you that immersion is the scriptural form. Sprinkling and pouring may be right. At least such forms are permissible. That the action of baptism with the majority is not a settled question, we all know. But we have all supposed that question was settled among the Disciples. Your position is not a new position. It is the position of Methodists, Presbyterians and Congregationalists. But it is a new position for a paper claiming to represent the Disciples to assume. It does not represent the Disciple position.

3. Immersion is a sectarian practice. You have an entirely different conception of sectarianism from what I have always esteemed to be correct and true. My judgment has been and is, that only that which is peculiar, which seperates one religious body from another, is sectarian. Does immersion fall under this head? If so, your own articles on the baptismal question, appearing sometime ago, had but little meaning. So far as baptism is concerned, it is not immersion that stands as a bar to union. That is not peculiar to any religious body. It is held and practiced by all. It is regarded as scriptural. It is the only form of baptism which is not sectarian. In receiving an unimmersed person into the fellowship of the church, you are practicing division for the sake of union. You divide in order that you may unite. You become sectarian in order to be non-sectarian!

Suppose this Congregationalist would not be immersed, and you would not receive him without it. Viewing the matter entirely from the union standpoint, whose fault would it be? You are on common, non-sectarian ground. He is not. He asks you to come to him. Your refusal is the refusal to desert a platform broad enough for all. His refusal is the refusal to desert a platform which is not broad enough for all to stand on! And yet you would desert!

4. The New Testament churches were, after all, sectarian, and the Disciple movement, adhering throughout a century and more to immersion only as a means to Christian union, has made a monumental blunder, and all along has been narrow and sectarian, narrower than the Church of Christ. This is the inevitable conclusion from your reply. Perhaps you will say that no New Testament church was ever put to such a test. If such is the case, then our own course of action becomes all the plainer. Why should there be occasion for it now? Only because men have departed from the New Testament teaching and the practice of the Apostolic church. Our plea has been for a return to the teaching and practice in order to secure union.

Your cause means division, not union. It has always meant division in our own churches whenever tried. It will weaken, not strengthen our plea for union. There can be no such thing as union without authority, and it is idle to say that authority must be found outside of Christ. The Disciple position is today and always has been, that immersion is based on the authority of Christ.

My opinion of your answer is, that such a procedure is not warranted by the Scripture, not justified by experience, not conducive to union, and only tends to weaken the testimony of the Disciples in their plan for union.

Anticipating your reply, that to require immersion for a person presenting such a church letter, would mean a denial of their Christian character, and practically unchurch, not only the person himself, but the body from which he comes, I have this to say:

1. We can, with perfect courtesy, hold to the scriptural view of immersion only as baptism, recognizing Christian character, and granting that which is a fact, that any individual is a Christian, and any body a Christian body, in so far as that individual and body adhere to the will of the Lord Jesus. The Congregationalist who has not been immersed is a Christian, but not complete. What he needs is teaching, not compromise. The great bodies practicing other than immersion are churches of Christ, but lacking in this—their obedience to Christ in baptism.

We as a religious body, may be lacking in some matters as important, perhaps, as baptism. We have much to learn from other bodies. We need to learn of them and grow up to them, as they need to learn of us and grow up to us. What is needed on all sides, is not compromise, but teaching.

2. We can with perfect courtesy insist on immersion only as a condition to membership, because of our advocacy of union. We must either stand for what is non-sectarian, for what is held in common, for what all can practice without sacrifice, or else cease holding out any program by which union may be effected. The difference between the Disciples and other bodies is this: They, at least some of their representatives, advocate union, but have no program. We have advocated union for over a hundred years, and have held out a program—what we have believed to be scriptural, and the only basis on which union could be effected. That program is just now coming to be known and appreciated. Are we ready to give it up, or say it is altogether inadequate?

In conclusion, permit me to say I have no disposition to argue. I would have much preferred if some one else had written this reply. I appreciate The Century and rejoice in its prosperity. Your articles on the baptismal question were greatly enjoyed. It was this reply to Mr. Cleaver, in view of these articles that surprised me.

In my position as National Superintendent of Christian Endeavor for the Disciples, I am thrown constantly with other representatives of other religious bodies. I have some knowledge of how we are viewed by these men. And I desire to say very emphatically that we are not looked upon by others as narrow or sectarian. We are not regarded as inconsistent in our advocacy of Christian union. Further, in a ministry of fifteen years, only twice as I now remember, have I come in contact with persons desiring to become members of our churches, who have hesitated on the ground of our position on the baptismal question. After all, the difficulty is more fanciful than real.

Valparaiso, Ind. CLAUDE E. HILL.

[The above article was received at The Christian Century office early in June. The department "Our Readers' Opinions" was suspended during Mr. Morrison's absence in England, and through some mishap the article was meantime lost. It turned up this week and because we wish to encourage the freest criticism of our editorial utterances we give it to our readers, even if it is belated. We have only space enough for a brief reply. And since Mr. Hill's statements are made out of whole cloth without any connection with or reference to the editorial which he assumes to be criticising we can do no more than make categorical statements to set over against his. We shall follow his sectional numbers.

1. The Christian Century does not believe that "baptism bears no relation whatever to one's becoming a Christian"—nor is there any implication of this sort in the editorial.

2. The form or action of baptism is to The Christian Century a settled question. It is clear to us "that immersion is the scriptural form."

3. Immersion is not a sectarian practice. Sprinkling and pouring are sectarian practices.

4. The New Testament churches were not, "after all," sectarian, and the Disciples' movement "adhering throughout a century or more to immersion only as a means to Christian union," has not made a "monumental blunder" nor has it on this account been "narrow and sectarian, narrower than the Church of Christ."

How Mr. Hill could have dug so much that The Christian Century does not believe out of that little quotation we do not for the life of us see.—EDITORS.]

Peril of the Brotherhood

Editors Christian Century: Your editorial "What Can Men Do?" was good. The work and the place of the "Brotherhood" is indeed a thing to be taken very seriously and worked out wisely lest a tragedy overtake it.

Greeley, Colo. A. E. DUBBER.

Evidently, in order to be a manifestation of Christ we must be in some way like him. . . . The best Christian is he who most reminds the people with whom he lives of the Lord Jesus Christ. He who never reminds anybody of the Lord Jesus Christ is not a Christian at all.—George Hodges.

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

Copyright, 1910, by J. C. Kilner

By M. A. FULTON

"How daur ye enter this hoose? Hae ye come tae glory in my desolation?"

"I hae come tae ask yer pardon for the wrang I did ye lang years ago. I had nae richt tae be your judge. 'Twas my ain prood hert led me on. I hae lived tae know that we are a' alike onder condemnation. That nane o' us can offer a ransom for oor ain souls. I was mair tae blame nor you, John. Had I been kinder wi' ye, it would ha' been better for baith o' us. For the sake of the sainted pairtner o' yer life who has this day gaed awa tae her everlasting reward, I ask ye tae forgie me and be friends again." At mention of his wife, John M' Ketridge broke down, with face hidden in his hands he sobbed bitterly. Mr. Graeme tried to remind him that his loss was unspeakable gain to the pure soul who had gone. But in the presence of the man's utter misery, he too broke down and both men cried together like children. Suddenly John M'Ketridge raised his head. His face was haggard and seamed with grief. His eyes were sunk with weeping. He gazed at Mr. Graeme with wild incredulous looks.

"Is it in mockery ye hae asked forgiveness o' me, David Graeme?"

"No' in mockery, John, but in humility o' hert, seein' I'm but a frail man mysel', an' needing the mercy o' heaven, even as ithers."

"An' hae you forgi'en me, David Graeme."

"I hae telt ye' John, it's no' for me tae grant pardon. I crave yours."

"I hae naething tae forgie. Ye meted oot justice tae me, naething mair."

"But if justice should be measured oot tae me an' mine, where would we a' be?"

"Gin ye kenned what I hae tried tae dae against ye, ye wadna think o' mercy. Ye wad curse me tae ma face. An' I wad deserve it, too."

Na, na, John, in the presence o' the onexpected visitor who has come tae ye this day there's nought in my hert but kindness for ye."

"Hark, till ye hear my plans, then say if ye can forgie the man whose hert was black against ye. Since yer son Donald was fifteen years auld, I hae been flattering and coaxing him be every will in my power tae be friendly wi' me. I deceived my wife, whose prayers stood between me an' destruction. Ay, I deceived her, pretending that I wanted tae be friendly wi' the young man, so that in time bygones would be bygones, even between his faither an' me. The wife, the best woman ever God gave tae a brute, was delighted at the thocht o't. She joined her invitations wi' mine. An' the lad was fain tae spen' mony an hour wi' us. When my plans were ready, I did what I had aye intended tae do. I brocht a wheen o' the fastest chiels in the whole o' Brigend into this very room we're sitting in. It's nigh on tae twa years since we began playin' cairds, jist for ha'pence at first. Then I pressed the lads tae a wee drap o' drink. Donald wad take naething but wine. That gaed on for aboot a year. Some o' the lads boasted yin nicht o' havin' made a big thing oot o' betting. I pressed them tae drink. Donald wad only tak' wine us usual. I drugged it. After that he was wax in my hands. In the presence o' twa or three ithers, I challenged him tae play. He fell into the trap. We ne'er stopped till he owed me a hundred pounds." He paused. David Graeme wiped great drops of sweat from his brow.

"Did he pay you?" he inquired in a hollow voice.

"Ay, after I had threatened him ower an' ower again that I wad tell his faither." His listener groaned and remained speechless. After a pause John continued—

"I cared nae mair for that money than for the dirt on my shoon. But I wanted tae crush the hert oot o' ye. I wanted tae be able tae cast up tae ye, that yer nearest an' dearest had sunk tae the same level as the man ye despised lang ago an' drove forth wi' the name "bettor an' gambler' ringing in his lug. But a' the same I wanted tae get the money frae him that I micht be able tae fling the hale truth in yer face an' so hae my revenge. Months ago I wad hae done it too, but for the pitiful pleadings o' her that's awa. She's awa—an' what's tae stan' atween me noo, an' the bottomless pit." David Graeme sat before him, crushed and helpless, but as the wretched man uttered the last sentence he started as if from a nightmare.

"John M'Ketridge," he said solemnly, "it's no' a sinful mortal, nae maitter how saintly can stan' atween ye an' the place o' torment, but the mercy an' love o' a sin pardoning God."

"Can ye still speak tae me o' pardon, David Graeme, after the black page I hae telt ye?"

"The seed was o' my ain sowing, John. I was cruel tae ye. I hae reaped the hairvest —the hairvest nae maitter what ilk it is, is ay mony fold the seed cast into the soil. Like the Roman soldiers, John, ye didna know what ye did. May God forgie ye, as I do this day."

"Maister, maister, ye're heapin' coals o' fire on my heid. Me that's no worthy tae clean yer boots—a black-herted, leein' thievin', broken-doon racer."

"We'll pray, John." When they rose from their knees they grasped hands, they who had been enemies for more than eighteen years.

"It's like she needed tae gang hame afore her prayers were answered, maister. An' maybe she sees that her unworthy man will be beginning life ower again frae this day. Strong drink gangs oot o' my shop, the day she's laid in her lang home. An' dinna ye be fearin' for Donald, maister. He never set foot in my hoose, since he saw the evil I had brocht on him."

"Does he no' meet wi' the ithers—the sons o' Beloil some ither place, think ye?"

"Nae, maister, he telt me that nicht, that it was his last bet. He wad never ha' done it if I hadna drugged him."

"Ye hae done what ye could, John, tae set the wrang richt. It'll be coonted tae ye."

"I hae na ither thing that I can dae yet. Wait a meenit, maister." He unlocked a drawer and taking out an envelope, he glanced at the contents. Lifting a pen he addressed it to Donald.

"Gie it tae him, maister, an' tell him it's no' as an enemy I sen' it tae him. An' it's no' as an enemy I hae telt you the story o' my sin an' shame, but oot o' a penitent hert that wad fain mak' amends. It's no' the revenge I had planned. Na, na, this is Mattie's plan." Again he fell a-weeping, and David Graeme left him so.

With trembling limbs and aching heart he turned homewards. The last doubt was now removed. His son Donald was not only a gambler but a forger. This was what he needed the money for. What would his mother say now? Oh, he would rather see her at rest as Mattie M'Ketridge was, than tell her. And Mr. Sinclair too—what a blow it would be to him, for his faith in Donald seemed to have grown strong again. Would he go on to the Manse at once and tell the minister all? Or would he first hear what Donald had to say. When he reached his own door, mechanically he entered. Donald was in the office. His father looked ten years older to him as he stood before him.

"Donald, what hae ye tae tell me—be quick lad, my burden is greater than I can bear." Donald tried to swallow a lump in his throat but failed. He tried to speak, but only stammered.

"Ye said ye wanted tae tell me aboot John M'Ketridge—ye needna bother. He has telt me a' himsel'."

"I wanted to tell you myself, father. I didn't think he could be such a fiend, at such a time, too."

"Yer mista'en, Donald. He confessed a' oot o' penitence. An' he freed ye o' blame, too. He telt me he drugged ye. I think this will prove that his repentance is no a sham."

He handed Donald the envelope. With trembling fingers the young man tore it open and drew out two notes—fifty pounds each. Donald grasped the chair he leaned on to steady himself—

"Is it a miracle, father?"

"Yes, a miracle o' grace, Donald. But are ye no gaun to confess the rest, my son?"

"I have nothing more to confess, father. I have never been guilty of anything I need to hide from mother or you since I got clear of John M'Ketridge."

"But the forgery was to pay him, Donald. What's the good of lying more aboot it?"

"I never committed the forgery, father. I would have told you about my foolishness in M'Ketridge's long ago, only I feared you would think I went deeper into that folly than I ever did. I am speaking the truth, father."

"Where did you get this money, then?"

"Don't you remember at first I did not speak out openly and deny the forgery as I ought to have done? I told you later that I feared Jeanie had done it. If she had. I meant to bear the blame myself."

"Weel, go on."

"Jeanie borrowed the money for me, she has not told me who gave it to her." His father's breath came in short gasps. He hesitated a moment.

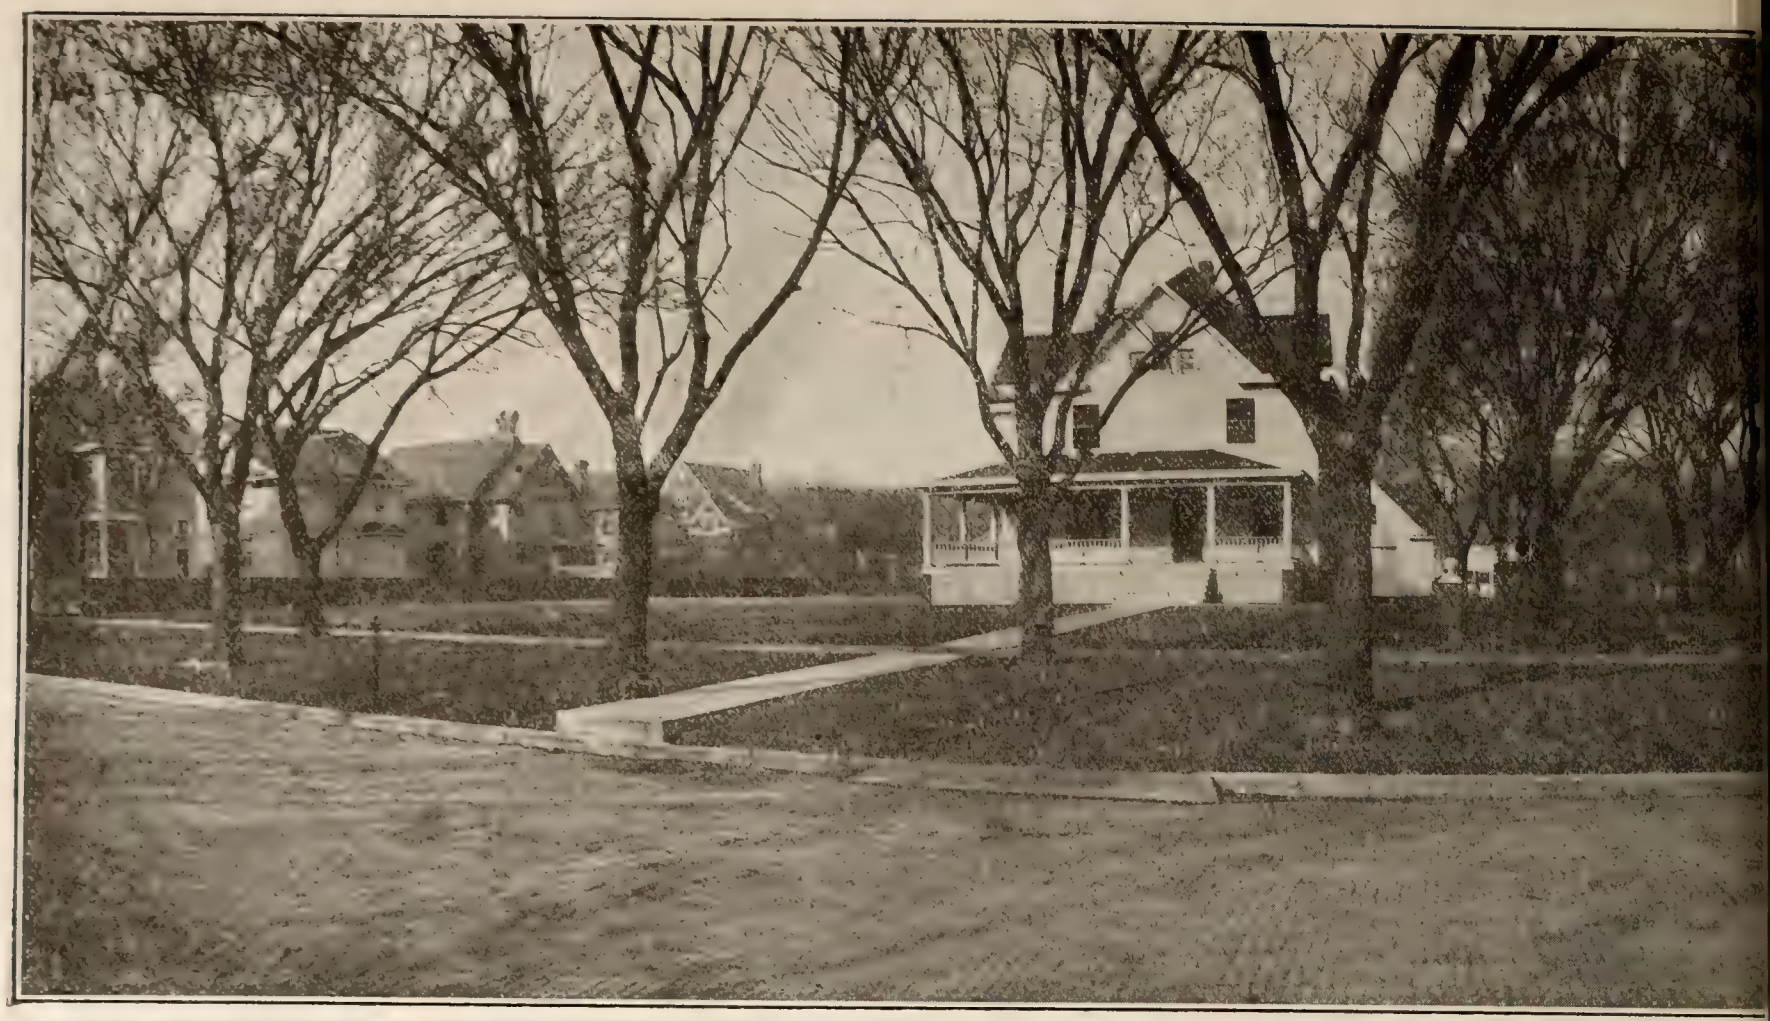
"I'll gang tae the meenister first, Donald. It may be after a' yer faither's grey hairs'll no' gang doon in sorrow tae the grave.

CHAPTER XXI.

A Breeze from the Highlands.

It came by midday post—not the breeze, but the letter that bore it. Donald took it from the postman listlessly. But on seeing the postmark "Oban," he tore upstairs two steps at a time. He had lived in an atmosphere of excitement since yesterday evening. John M'Kitridge's confession, his repentance, his restoration of the ill-gained money, helped to fan the smouldering flame of hope in his heart, into a wild blaze of expectation. He had seen his father set out again for the Manse with a gleam in his eyes that had not been there for months past. He, Donald, could not tell why the sight of that letter from James, stirred him as it did. Probably it was only an intimation that he had arrived safe at his destination and was none the worse of his journey. All the same, when Donald burst into the presence of his mother and sister, he was breathing hard and his eyes were shining with eager light.

"A letter from James," he exclaimed.



"Already?" replied the ladies at once.

"I'll read it aloud," he said, seating himself in his father's armchair by the fire.

GOVERNOR'S SQUARE, TOPEKA. — PALAT

TOPEKA IS READY

Already the advance guard of the great army of delegates is beginning to arrive, and it is proper for us to send out our last word concerning final instructions for all who are coming. Delegates still have time to send one dollar to R. K. Wilson, Topeka, Kansas, Box 50, which will entitle them to a badge and program and a pre-assignment, all of which will be ready and waiting for them upon the presentation of their names at the registration booth, stating that they have sent in their registration fee. Upon arriving in Topeka, guides will conduct you to the headquarters at the State Capitol Building, where you will register and afterwards be taken to the places assigned. Do not, on any account, attempt to hunt up the Auditorium Building first; no assignments will be made at that place, and it would only delay your getting settled and attending as early as possible the sessions of the convention. The Capitol Building is the place where all exhibits will be placed, and in the center of the entire city. Standing upon the broad, sweeping steps of the north wing of the capitol, which is the entrance to the registration tables, each delegate can thoroughly familiarize himself with all of the various places where the sessions of the Convention will be held; from this elevated point, one can see nearly all of the first churches of the city, and will be able to locate the Auditorium building, and familiarize himself with the streets of the city. The street cars from all depots will discharge passengers within one block of the Capitol building, making it very easy of access. The Capitol building will also be the place where the delegates will call for their mail, as we have arranged with the postal authorities to have the mail for the Convention delivered at headquarters.

The hotels are already filled, with the exception of smaller hotels some distance from the Auditorium building. At this late date it will be well nigh impossible for delegates to secure entertainment at the Throop Hotel, which is the headquarters, or at the National, just a block and a half from the Auditorium building. Delegates writing for entertainment from this time on should not expect such accommodations. From every quarter of the country, letters are pouring in, which seemingly indicate a very large attendance. On every mail for the last month, some of the committee have been writing concerning accommodations, and letters are now coming in by the hands full. The average price for beds will be fifty cents each. There may be some variation in different homes. The rates for meals will be from fifteen cents to fifty cents, according to what delegates desire. Hotel rates are from $1.50 to $4.00. Topeka will take care of all who come. The committee has been working very hard, and now feel confident that the thousands who will be our guests will receive the best of attention. The great Men's Parade on Saturday the 15th, is attracting a great deal of attention. It is expected that four thousand men will be in line. Myron C. Settle, Superintendant of Bible Schools, has arranged for a great Bible School session on Sunday morning in the Auditorium. His watchword is: Four Thousand in Attendance; Twenty-five Hundred Bibles; and Five Hundred Dollars for an offering. Immediately following the Communion, a session of the Brotherhood will take place, and it would be well if the women arranged some place to which they might retire, as the men will enter into their own session. This is something new in our history, but as the Convention ends on Monday, the men felt that they needed to get a start on Lord's Day, and interest delegates before they begin to return home. The Brotherhood session will be really a great session Brothers Macfarlane and Elliott have been working hard to make this a great meeting for men. Watch for the Reception Committee and trust yourself to them. They will explain everything, and not a few will meet trains at Kansas City and Emporia, having you all feeling as if you were in good hands before arriving at the capital city. The tables are set, the feast is spread, and now we are waiting for our guests to sit down.

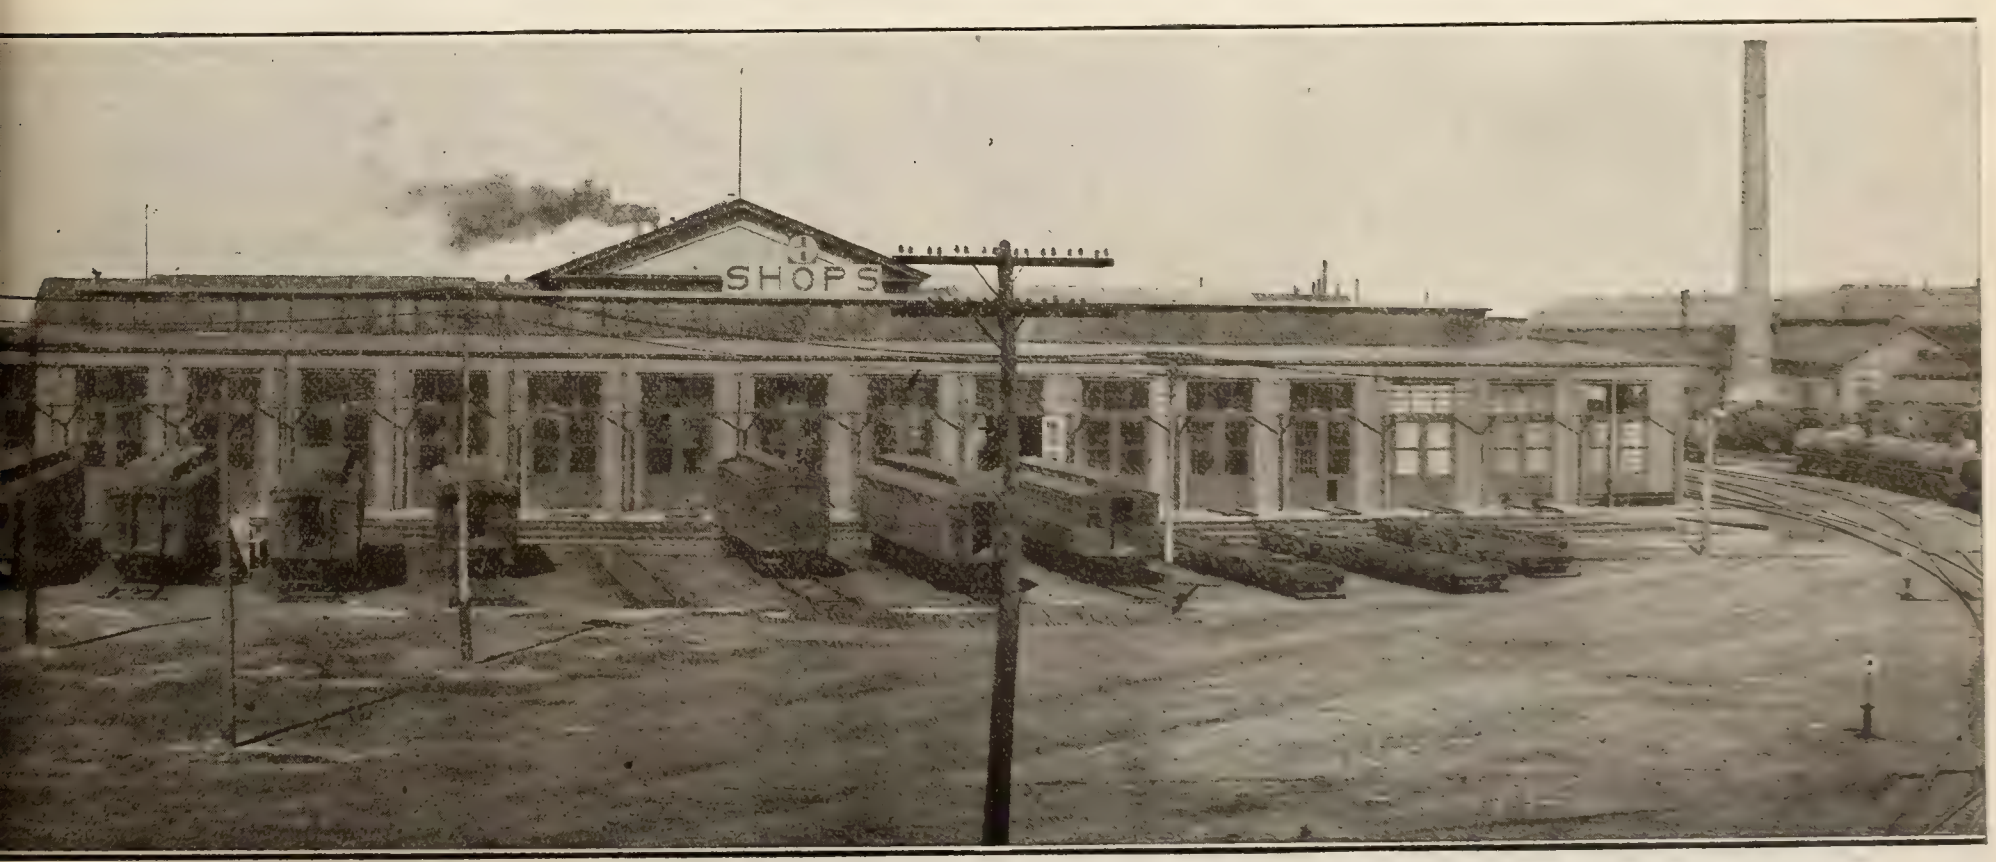
American Missions

Secretary I. N. McCash on September 18, dedicated the new $50,000 church at Marshalltown, Iowa, of which H. Chas. Morris is pastor. Great congregations attended the services and in the course of the day $13,500 was raised, which enabled the house to be dedicated free of debt.

Secretary McCash will attend the Southern State Conventions during October and November, after the Topeka Convention. While he is in the South he will dedicate the new churches in Dublin, on November 1, and Sumter, S. C., November 7 and 8. He is to dedicate the new church at Kehr street, Buffalo, October 23; this is where Roy Deadman is doing such a fruitful work as the Living Link of the Jefferson St. Church in Buffalo.

The Ministerial students from Johnson Bible College rendered very effective services during the summer vacation, holding meetings in Georgia, is the report which comes from G. H. Wood, corresponding secretary.

F. P. Arthur of Michigan has held eight meetings, attended eight conventions, traveled 8,000 miles, visited thirty-five churches, delivered 170 addresses and raised for the missionary enterprises in that great state $5,712.62. The work makes steady progress.



J. W. Baker, of West Washington, has led the Missionary forces in that wonderful empire through the year with pronounced success. New buildings have been erected in eight mission fields, and four new churches were organized.

Herman P. Williams, formerly missionary to China, under the Foreign Board, has been living in New Mexico the past year regaining his health. He has organized a new church at Farmington and preached throughout the surrounding country. Improved health permits him to go to Albuquerque and take charge of our work in that city.

Ten missions assisted through the Chicago Missionary Society report general progress for the year. To those missions have been 196 additions, fifty by baptism; and they have raised for all purposes $11,171. A work has recently been opened among the Russians with Daniel Protohf in charge.

Samuel Gregg, one of our Evangelists in Oregon, has preached in fourteen places. He has done a remarkable year's work in this difficult pioneer field. An inspiration has come to all the places visited in the 222 additions to the churches, and the seed sown for a future harvest.

Donald: If I were a poet I would likely begin my letter—"May the New Year"—But not being a poet I can't rightly fill in—"True year" "good cheer" "You dear." So I must leave it to your own imagination to fill in whatever your own heart most craves for, and sign my name to the wish. I haven't the slightest doubt in my own mind but that the poetry would have come all right smooth and true, if the parish school had not stept in, when I was a lad, and spoilt what might have been a modern edition of Burns. How can a fellow whose soul delights itself in utterances of broad Doric, be expected to pour out his heart in "unpremeditated art" like the skylark, whose mother tongue has never been interfered with by the school boards and other modern innovations of that ilk? It's not my old school-master I blame, mind you, though he almost divided me in two, like Solomon's baby. For long generations before I was born, my tongue was set to wag in the expressive, musical, dignified, broad Doric. But when art steps in, instead of assisting nature, it's the other way about. From the first day that a pen was placed between my wee fat fingers and thumb, up to the present time, I have been expected to divide myself. I am one man when I'm speaking, clinging like a limpet to a rock for dear life, to the tongue that I learnt, maybe hundreds of years ago. But when I write, as I am doing now, I am another man, doing my best to put the thoughts that are dancing through my brain, into a joyful message to a friend, but failing. The truth is, that the English tongue among the Highland hills looks dull, even on paper.

Could my Uncle Robin here, go whistling after the plough, if he had on his Sabbath "Blacks?" It's not to be thought of. No true Scotchman ever feels just like himself either on the Sabbath day, or at a funeral. Partly because of his "Blacks." It's just the same with me in regard to my pen-tongue. I scarcely know myself in it. This is why I need to make such a long explanation, as if I were introducing the writer to you. Some one whom you had never met before indeed. But, as I mentioned above, it's the fault of the school board. I suppose they mean well, and doubtless they have the majoriy of the world on their side. But to me, a born Highlander, it seems strange that Scottish bairns must all be taught to express their written sentiments in sober English, while the rich language of their forefathers clings to their lips, even as the heather does to their native hills.

Are you wondering how James Douglas can be such a fool as to spend his time writing such nonsense? Donald my man, you don't know. You don't know what it is to be like a fish out of water, blinking wearily in the sunshine, and feebly gasping for breath. Wishing too, that every breath might be the last so that the unutterable weariness of living might be over. You have not passed through days like that, for what might appear a century. And then suddenly find yourself resting. Oh, the glory of it. And at last, new life coursing through your veins like all the voices, and smells, and hopes of early springtime rolled into one delightful sensation, and thrown all over you, like the grand, new coat your father gave me.

Talking of the new coat, you can tell your father it did great things for me on the journey up.

Your mother's drawing-room could not have supplied me with more comfort, and that's saying a great deal. But then, all the caps that were touched to me as I ventured to look out at the station were amazing. Of course the first class carriage may have had something to do with the respect shown me, but I think the fur collar and cuffs of the coat had more. When we reached Oban a hotel runner had my portmanteau snatched out of my hand almost before my both feet reached the platform. My rug and umbrella were seized by a porter, and both men were touching their Highland bonnets to me, as if they had learned English ways already, short a time as it is, since the railway has brought itself, and other things, among the bonnie hills of Oban.

My Uncle Robin, dressed in rough grey tweeds, and leggings that may have been black years ago, leaning on his iron ferruled staff, came slinking along the platform. His keen eyes gleamed from under the brim of his tartan bonnet. I felt his glance slide over me like, as he looked along the carriages. Then, back his eyes came to mine, like a shot and I could not hide the smile in my own. He strode up to me with outstretched hand, just as the chap from the hotel was saying:

"The best hotel in Oban, my lord."

"Ye can tell yer maister, ma chiel, that Lord James Douglas has gone off wi, auld Robin Purdy tae pay a veesit tae Craigdher Fairm."

Before I had time to recover from the fit of laughing his words threw me into, my uncle had natched my bag from the runner, and my rug from the porter, and we left both men staring at each other, as my uncle remarked, with a gleam of satisfaction in his eyes, "wi' hingin' lugs."

But it's not to tell you about my Uucle Robin, kind as he is, that I want to write; nor yet about my Aunt Bell, the best man of the two. But it's about the strange thing that happened to me when I awoke this morning after daylight.

At first I could not tell where I was. I got up on my elbow to look round. A peat fire was burning in the small grate. A curiously carved chest of drawers stood near the one window of the room. The truth dawned on me then and I lay back on my pillows with a feeling of most perfect content, except that there was a feeling too of yearning expectation in the region of my stomach. Presently the door was opened cautiously, and my aunt's rosy face peeped in.

"Hae ye opened yer e'en at last laddie. I though ye werena goin' tae waken, the day. How did ye sleep?"

"Sleep? I've slept enough for a week, Aunt Bell. But I must hurry up now. I ought to have been dressed long ago. Why did you trouble putting a fire here? You're far too kind."

She laughed softly.

"Too kind indeed! An' what for must ye hurry up? Do you no ken that yer breakfast's ready for ye, an' that yer gaun tae tak' it here?"

"You're an angel, Aunt Bell, I'm starving."

When I had finished breakfast, no use particularizing, she tossed my pillows and ordered me to lie down for at least an hour. There was no use protesting I was strong as a lion, and ought to be thinking of going back to my work within a few days; she had her way, as every good woman has when she meets with a wise man. She drew up the blind and left me. From where I lay, by piling all the pillows under my head, I could look out on the bay. The day was calm and the sea had a gray look like that sometimes seen on a human face under great sorrow.

Then the border of white foam under the black rocks, somehow made me think of a young widow in her white frills. I couldn't keep the thought out of my head while my eyes rested on that white border at the base of the dark hills. And I couldn't help smiling at myself, too, for being thankful that if I had died of fever, or Mr. Sinclair had been killed in the accident, neither of us would have left a sweet young face sad for life. After that I thought it would be a worse fate for a noble minded girl to be wedded to a villain who would scruple at nothing to gain his own ends. I hated to look at that sad ring of sea. I longed to see it as it had been in summer, when I was here for holidays. How blue and beautiful, and sunlit and shimmering it had looked then as I lay lazily in the early mornings, looking out of that same window.

How well I remembered the first morning I had seen a steamboat shoot into the bay between the hills, as if it were out of the hills themselves she was gliding, instead of from an unseen deep beyond. Memory, having taken hold of the summer again seemed loath to leave it.

Presently things that I had forgotten, at the time apparently simple things, came back to me with a rush. I remembered a day in August when one came to me in the shop and asked me for writing materials. He was above suspicion, so I thought. I showed him into the master's office. Oh, Donald, my very heart's bursting with its thoughts. It looks cruel to be writing so to you when I cannot explain fully.

But I want you to come to me. Come without delay and bring the forged cheque with you. If you don't come at once, I'll go home at once.

There now, I've told you abruptly after all. And the nonsense I commenced my letter with, was to keep you from thinking I had anything serious to say. I can see your poor hands shaking as you read, and maybe the tears in your eyes for joy, that the dark shadow that has lain on your life all these months is lifted. I see it as plain as two and two are four. And my thankfulness for the life granted me from the very jaws of death, will be nothing, nothing, to yours for an honorable name cleared from the blot of a foul suspicion. Tell Miss Jeanie—but no fear, she could see the fangs of the wolf, maybe better than most of us. There, I didn't mean to make anything clear to you and instead I have told you all. I couldn't keep the thoughts of my mind to myself, they would suffocate me. I'll be waiting for you by the first possible train after you get this. I do want to stay here a few days longer. The air is swell but invigorating. So come, Donald come, and doon't forget the devil signed cheque. J. D.

During the reading of the latter part of the letter Donald was so excited that he had to gasp for breath more than once. Jeanie who was almost as excited as he, tried to take the letter from his trembling hands that she might read it herself. But he grasped the epistle like grim death and between his sobs, he read on to the close.

As Donald read the last words, he fell on his knees at his mother's side and buried his face in her lap. Strong man though he was he sobbed like a child.

"I feel that James has spoken truth my son, though all is not yet clear to us, it is easy to see he blames your cousin Archie for the terrible deed that some of those who love you best, have feared that you had done."

Jeanie sat pale and silent for awhile. Then she knelt beside Donald and putting her arms round him she said:

"Donald, I am sure, that if the evidence is not quite clear against Archie, you would never wish to shield yourself by blackening him?"

The words roused him and he rose to his feet.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 9.

Theme for the Day—The Coming of Christ.

Scripture—But when the fulness of the time came, God sent forth his son, born of a woman, Gal. 4:4.

For there is born to you this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord, Luke 2:11.

He came
Of purest Mother, Perfect Child, begot
Divinelier, surely, than we know; arrived
In this world—of His many worlds—by path
Leading to birth as new, as sweet, as strange
As what His dear feet opened past the Tomb.
If we should strive to say in mortal speech
Where He was Man, and why much more than Man,
The earthly words would mar the Heavenly truth.
—Edwin Arnold ("The Light of the World.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we bless Thee for the wonderful Gift of Christ Jesus our Lord, who for us men and our salvation entered the gates of human life and walked with us as brethren in the days of his flesh. Help us, we beseech Thee, to comprehend something of the intimacy of his relationship with us in the family of God, and to feel that what he has accomplished of holy living and dying, of noble devotion to the ends of righteousness, and of victory over sin, disease and death, is now made possible to us, in some degree at least, through the power of his cross. We crave his friendship, his spirit and his saving grace. And in his name we pray. Amen.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 10.

Theme for the Day—The Passing of Summer.

Scripture—The harvest is past, the summer is ended, Jer. 8:20.

Wisdom and might are His; He changeth the times and seasons, Dan. 2:20, 21.

Oh, sacrament of summer days!
Oh, last communion in the haze!
Permit a child to join,

Thy sacred emblems to partake,
Thy consecrated bread to break,
Taste thine immortal wine.
—Emily Dickinson ("Indian Summer.")

Prayer—O God of the seasons, Thou Giver of days and years, we witness Thy providence in the coming of ever new and marvelous times in the hurrying calendar of our lives. The gifts of the autumn are from Thy hand. All the seasons of the year are necessary to its roundness and value, and to our enjoyment of its changes. For the fruits and colors of the autumn days accept our thanks, and may there be no sadness in our hearts at the departure of the summer, but only a joyful welcome of the sterner days of winter that are to come. We ask for Thy name's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 11.

Theme for the Day—The Coming of Age.

Scripture—The days of our years are three-score years and ten, or even by reason of strength fourscore years; yet is their pride but labor and sorrow, for it is soon cut off and we fly away, Psalm 90:10.

Altars once flaming, still with incense fragrant,
Passion's uneasy nurselings rocked asleep,
Hope's anchor faster, wild desire less vagrant,
Life's flow less noisy, but the stream how deep!
—Oliver Wendell Holmes ("The Iron Gate.")

Prayer—The passing of the days makes us aware of our own passing life, our Father, and of the shortness of the time we have for the completion of our plans. We grow in appreciation of the fact that much we once purposed to do we must leave unaccomplished. Our strength grows less, and our joy in the physical world about us declines. But help us to find increasing happiness in the things that do not pass away. May the sunset hours of life be the most beautiful of all. And may we find increasing satisfaction in the assurance of the life that shall not end. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 12.

Theme for the Day—The coming Day of God.

Scripture—Behold the day of the Lord cometh, Isa. 13:9.

And he shall judge between the nations and reprove many peoples; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. Isa. 2:4.

Great day of God, all glorious;
Great day of Peace, so blest;
The thought of Thee brings gladness,
And dilates every breast.
Great day of one religion,
When all are understood;
One faith in Life Eternal,
One God, one Brotherhood.
—Louise R. Waite ("The Great Day of God.")

Prayer—Our gracious God, we know that the world in which we live is not yet made after the pattern of the kingdom of God that is to be. The prophets of all the years have looked with eyes of hope for the dawning of a better time, and our Savior has taught us to expect and pray for the day when Thy will shall be done in earth as it is in Heaven. Give us some good part in the hastening of that time, we pray. And may the influence of our words and conduct serve to convince those whose lives we touch that the program of our Lord is worth while and sure to be realized. In his name. Amen.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 13.

Them for the Day—The Guidance of God.

Scripture—I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go; I will counsel thee, with mine eye upon thee, Psalm 32:8.

Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me in glory, Psalm 73:24.

Yet be it less or more, or soon or slow,
It shall be still in strictest measure even
To that same lot, however mean or high,
Tow'rd which time leads me, and the will of heaven;
All is, if I have grace to use it so,
As ever in my Task-master's eye.
—John Milton ("Sonnets.")

Prayer—Our holy Father, it is a comfort to us in all times of trouble and of joy that we have Thy friendship and direction. We do not always yield ourselves to Thy guidance, but after every attempt to find our own way we come back weary and footsore to Thee. Save us, we beseech Thee, from vain efforts that profit nothing. The paths that we choose are not good; the cisterns that we dig hold no water. Thou only hast the words of life, and in Thee alone, as revealed to us in Jesus, is there hope and comfort. So keep us close to Thy side all the day, and in the evening lay Thy hand of blessing on us as we go to rest. We ask in the name of our Master. Amen.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 14.

Theme for the Day—The Sons of God.

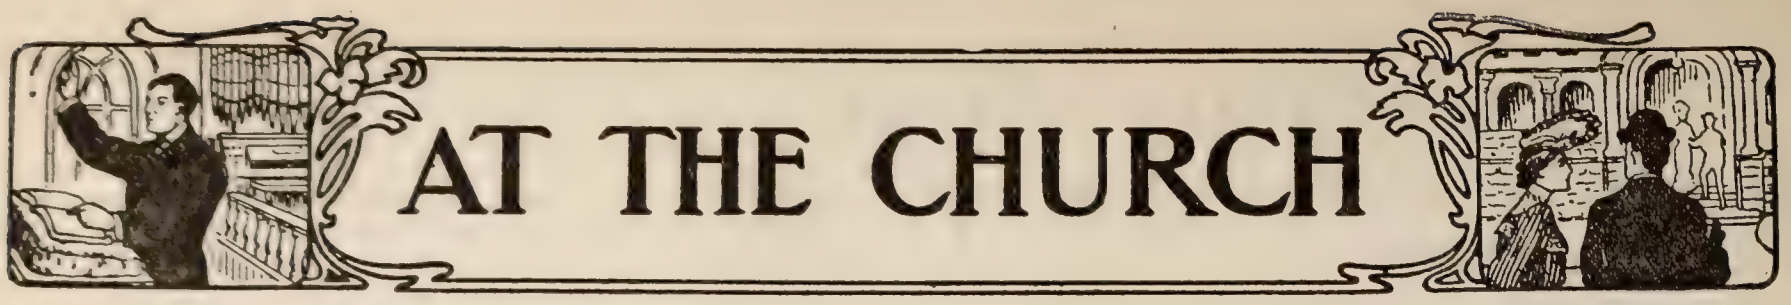
Scripture—Beloved, now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him; for we shall see him even as he is, I John 3:2.

Follow you the star that lights a desert pathway, yours or mine.
Forward, till you learn the highest Human Nature is divine.
—Alfred Tennyson ("Locksley Hall.")

Prayer—We are made very humble, our Father, by the honor Thou hast put upon us in our high calling in Christ Jesus our Lord. To us who are but weak and wayward Thou hast opened the gates of life and of service, and we grow daily more confident of our ability, by Thy help, to live the holy life. Our Father, aid us to aspire to the best that human life has revealed of possibility. We should like to find for ourselves the way of peace, of progress and of power. May our desire to be like Christ so control our actions that we may prove the promise that even here we may become truly the sons of God, through faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. In his name we pray. Amen.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15.

Theme for the Day—Into the Light.



Scripture—Again therefore Jesus spake unto them, saying, I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life, John 8:12.

For indeed we that are in this tabernacle do groan . . . . that what is mortal may be swallowed up of life. 2 Cor. 5:4.

O Lord of Light, steep thou our souls in thee;
That when the daylight trembles into shade,
And falls the silence of mortality,
And all is done—we shall not be afraid,
But pass from light to light; from earth's dull gleam
Into the very heart and heaven of our dream.
—Richard Watson Gilder ("Undying Light.")

Prayer—Our Father who art in heaven, we desire to have our way made plain by the clear shining of the Light of the World upon our path. Save us from darkness and doubt, and may the presence of the Christ in our lives make evident the road we take and the meaning of our experiences. We thank Thee for our daily blessings, for food and raiment, and for the friendships which enrich our lives. We accept these gracious blessings as from Thee, and want to order our conduct so that we may please Thee, our God and Friend. Hear us for Jesus' sake. Amen.

A child believes in his father, trusts his wisdom, power and love. And what is the result? The child's nature is changed into the likeness of what it admires and honors. . . . If, then, a man has faith in our Lord Jesus Christ and loves him, trusts him, adores him, as the wisdom and power and love and holiness of God, will not he, too, be changed by secret influences into the image of what he worships with all his heart and mind and strength?—H. C. Beeching.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Eternal Verdict*

It was natural that the approach of the tragedy of Jesus' life should direct his conversations with the Twelve to the themes which concerned the future, and his establishment of the new order in human society, which it was his purpose to introduce. It was also natural that the forms in which the future was described should conform to the Jewish thought of the age regarding the coming of great convulsions and catastrophes before the time of deliverance and happiness could arrive. The discourse on the "Last Things," which occupies considerable space in the closing part of each of the Synoptic Gospels, is devoted to the tragic events which must soon overtake the Jewish state, and the unseen and quiet spread of the kingdom of God during the same time.

Like the putting forth of the leaves of the fig tree, they would be able to see the outward signs of the age in the disasters that should fall upon Jerusalem. But like the invisible coming of summer, the kingdom would be arriving at the same time, and without observation by any save the most alert. The necessity of readiness and watchfulness on the part of his friends, lest the opportunity of the time should be missed and the new age come without their knowing, was impressed in all our Lord's teachings. This was not to guard against the danger of being caught unprepared at a moment when he should come in visible form, though such has been the age-long interpretation of the words. It was the purpose of Jesus rather to insist that his disciples must study the outward changes that were about to take place in Jewish experiences and in the order of the world, in order that they might perceive the less patent but more important changes in the world of spiritual laws and forces in which God is ever at work.

Parables of Warning.

In order to make this meaning still clearer Jesus used several parables. The constant repitition of his warning to watch needed clearer explanation, lest it should be misunderstood to refer to some imminent and external event. In the parable of the ten virgins he gave his disciples warning that they must be prepared for long and disappointing delays in which there was no appearance of progress toward the coming of the kingdom. Yet all the time events would be hastening on, even though they could not be perceived. The attitude of watchfulness and preparation lest the hour should come and they not be ready was insistent. The parable of the talents emphasized the need of faithfulness to opportunity and courage in the use of the abilities which could aid in the realization of the divine purpose. Days of persecution were soon to be expected. It was only those who could maintain an attitude of constancy and activity in such a time who could profitably accomplish the work of the Lord.

But a still more impressive lesson was needed. The work of all the servants of the king was to be passed upon and assessed acording to its value. Like all the other teachers of the new order which Jesus was bringing into being this was to be a continuous and persistent process. Yet it was inevitable that even this thought, that the servants of the kingdom worked under the constant scrutiny and verdict of their Master, should be cast in the usual form of Jewish belief. One of the fixed teachings of the Old Testament concerned itself with the Great Day of the Lord. In the prophetic vocabulary that phrase meant any time of overthrown and the cause of the nation vindicated. Gradually, however, and especially crisis when the enemies of Israel were to be in the apocalyptic literature of the last pre-Christian centuries the idea took the form as a fixed and definite time at the end of the ages, when all humanity shall be brought into judgment, as prisoners are arraigned in a court for vindication or punishment. Without discussing the validity of this belief, Jesus accepted its form because of the great truth it contained that the conduct of man is constantly passing under the divine scrutiny and is being judged at its actual value.

The Language of Jesus.

It would seem at first that Jesus definitely chose to impress the diciples with the thought of a future judgment at the end of the ages. His reference to the coming of the Son of Man in his glory with the angels seems to give a precise setting to the picture as referring to the future age and the consummation of all things. But a reference to his common methods of speech robs the utterance of this definiteness, for it is clear that our Lord frequently used just such apocalytic terms to describe the constant and progressive forces of his work in the world. For example, before the High Priest at his trial Jesus in response to the demand whether he were really the Son of God replied that he was, and added, "From this time forth you shall see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power and coming on the clouds of heaven. (Matt. 26:64). Here of course Jesus was using the very words of the Jewish apocalypses describing the spectacular and visible coming of the expected deliverer of the nation. Yet he uses these words in the sense of a continuous and ever-increasing arrival on his part in the affairs of the world and in the accomplishment of his purposes as the Son of God. So in the passage we are studying, the language at first sight implies a visible and definite event, but the meaning is clearly the age-long and progressive judgment upon the affairs of the world which it is the business of the kingdom of God to institute.

It will be seen that in the broad division made between the two classes of human society under the representation of sheep and goats respectively, our Lord is making the same great discrimination which John the Baptist made between the useful and the useless. John said that the one who came after him would separate the wheat from the chaff. Jesus says that the sheep and goats are to be divided. The mixed character of most oriental flocks as including both sheep and goats, though the former were far more valuable than the latter, gave force to the figure. Every man's survival value is to be reckoned in terms of his usefulness to the divine program in the world.

Surprises.

There is also significance in the surprise of those who are commended and pronounced blessed. To them it seems unaccountable that the little that they have been able to do should be rated as worth while from the standpoint of eternal values. They are not commended for their belief in doctrines, their observance of ordinances or ritual, or their membership in an organization, but for their good will, their human sympathy and their care for the unfortunate. In these regards they have shown themselves to possess the spirit which God approves, and which was so clearly shown in the life of Jesus. This is the very essence of holy living as our Lord viewed it.

On the other hand those who are disapproved are equally astonished. The words of condemnation are caustic and severe. Not one of them so far as our study goes is charged with any of the offenses against morals and good conduct which society is quick to condemn. It is not that these sins are condoned, but rather that some things may be taken for granted. Of course one whose life is unsocial, hateful, impure, proud and vindictive has no part in the kingdom of God. But the point which our Lord makes in his lesson is that those who are indifferent to the welfare of their fellowmen are useless as members of the divine society, and therefore are excluded from the company of the blesed. The criterion is their attitude toward the Master and his little ones, the poor and unfortunate in body and in soul.

Eternal Decisions.

Nothing could be more striking than this element of surprise in the narrative; the surprise of the holy that they have been counted worthy of the King's approval, the surprise of the selfish that what they have counted as the small sins of their lives, hardly worthy of notice, have made them ineligible to admission into citizenship in the kingdom of God. This puts a very different construction upon the laws of admission into heaven from what the world and the church have commonly taught. From this point of view those who are worth while because their character and conduct are helpful to the King in his work are approved and admitted. Those who are useless must go elsewhere by the very gravitation of spirits.

Nor is this a brief and transient decision. The conditions into which men choose to go day by day are those in which the tendencies of spiritual growth indicate they will abide. There is no arbitrary admission into heaven nor exclusion from it. Every man abides in the condition for which he has prepared himself and to which he belongs. "He that is unjust will be unjust stil; he that is filthy will be filthy still; he that is righteous will be righteous still and he that is holy will be holy still. There is no reason to suppose that the change that we call death will reverse men's characters, changing good to evil and evil to good. Nor that any future judgment will do more than confirm the long and persistent choices of the days of our flesh. As long as we go on choosing evil there is no other verdict upon character. So long as we go on choosing the good there is no limit to the attainment of virtue and happiness, in this and every other life.

And in this work of judgment every day is critical, every hour is a time of decision. Whatever may be the truth with reference to a future judgment, or a last judgment, as theologians have called it, the far more important question relates to the daily and hourly judgment of God upon the lives we live, and to the cumulative power of either good or evil in habit to shape character and to fix destiny.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES

Topic October 16: Rom. 15:1-3; Ps. 36:7-12. Your Amusements, Do They Build Up Or Tear Down.

This subject is so overwhelming one scarcely knows what to say first. We seem to be almost frantic these days in our search for amusements. Was pleasure-loving Rome ever more so? Perhaps not. Not that amusements are bad. Quite the contrary. These are strenuous days. We pursue our tasks with intensity. And since we are not machines we must have diversions. The burden must be lifted for a time. We must have time to change it to the other shoulder. To rivit out attention to just one thing would make us mono-maniacs. Amusement like everything else when used within its place is good. But like everything else when carried to excess it becomes bad. And some good people seeing this excess have erroneously concluded that amusement is bad per se.

One of the important things is that we control ourselves with respect to our amusements. However harmless a particular amusement may be in itself it becomes harmful to us the moment we indulge in it to the neglect of other obligations and duties. There is nothing wrong for example in taking an automobile ride if the opportunity is afforded. But if one should become so fascinated with it as to neglec this business obligations, his duties as teacher or pupil in school, or the work of the Sunday-school or Christian Endeavor meeting on Sunday evening, he is allowing that to become his master which ought to be his servant. That which if properly used was right and legitimate becomes wrong and harmful when carried to excess. This, of course, is true of any sort of amusement or pastime. That would be a narrow mind indeed which would condemn an evening of social intercourse on the part of people either young or old, but if these gatherings should become so frequent and so prolonged as to interfere with the more imperative duties,—our daily tasks, they become wrong. This is not an infrequent thing. We doubtless know many boys and girls in the high school, and young men and women in college who are doing this very thing. When we remember how many parents are educating their children at heavy sacrifices, the truth of these statements is apparent.

All things are good, but not all things are fgood amusement. The physical appetites are good things, but when one seeks to amuse himself by drinking and drinking, he is traveling the road of the drunkard and the glutton. Even alcohol is a good thing when, as it can in a thousand ways, be made to serve human needs. But when men drink it as a means of amusement it becomes one of the most destructive agencies known to the race. It opens the way for over-indulgence in other bodily functions and becomes one of the destroyers of both soul and body.

Our amusements then like everything else that we do must be selected from the Christian point of view. That is to say, will this or that form of amusement which we choose react favorably or unfavorably upon the realization of our Christian ideal? By that standard let us select and test our amusements as we touch other things. By that standard let us measure the amusements which now engage us and by that same standard let us seek to have others determine their forms of diversion.

By-Products of Missions

BY J. S. KIRTLEY.

The Packing-house people sometimes tell us that they try to make expenses on the main product, which is meat, and get their profits on the by-products.

The main product of the oil business, of course, is oil, but there is a long list of useful by-products, which we are familiar with.

We find something like that in missionary work, only a great deal more marked. The main product of missions is converts to Christ and His cause, and we find them in such large numbers, that we have to call the work a great success, and we find a long list of by-products, each one so valuable that we would have to call the enterprise a tremendous success, even if it had produced only that particular by-product.

Perhaps we American people can appreciate the financial returns from our investment in missions as well as anybody else can. Fifty years ago Henry Venn stated that when a missionary had been abroad twenty years he was worth £10,000 a year to British commerce. Today any one of our missionaries in Africa, or China, or Japan, is worth that much to any one of our great centers of trade, like Chicago, or New York. The world's trade with the Congo is due to Stanley and Stanley is due entirely to Livingston, who, on his last return to Africa, said he must go back and open a path for commerce and Christianity. He was called the great trade opener.

Testimony of the London Times.

As to South Africa, the London Times says: "We owe it to our missionaries that the whole region of South Africa has been opened up." Our exports to Africa are nearly $30,000,000 and our imports from there about $20,000,000—mostly due to the missionaries. We have been getting things from them, but the best thing is that the missionaries have taught them to want our goods. What the missionaries use the natives always want and the local dealers carry for sale—condensed milk and clothes and farming implements and rubber tubing and soap and packing-house products, especially beef extracts. Every mission means a school and every school a market. Industrial schools mean American implements.

Followed by Railroads.

Railroads are being built by the thousand miles in Africa and China, and that means that American manufacturers and builders are putting up bridges over the rivers of Asia and Africa and the Philippines and building houses by the thousand. From the one point of Apia, in the Samoan islands, we have a trade of one-quarter million; with the Fiji Islands in 1905 it was five and one-quarter millions; with Hawaii we have a trade of twenty million exports and thirty million imports; with Asiatic countries we had a trade of $128,000,000 in 1905, and as the great revival in Corea came on our trade with that country jumped from six to fourteen million in two years. John W. Foster was right in saying that the missionary is the forerunner of commerce.

They started the savings banks of India and industries everywhere; have created wants which we are supplying; have promoted business integrity; have introduced better business systems; have opened the way for every kind of American worker in those countries, as well as for all kinds of American products. And it has just started. The churches of Chicago, to take an illustration, gave last year to foreign missions $164,000, and that is a very small part of the financial return which the business men of the city have gotten from it. If the merchants and manufacturers and traders of our country had employed those men and women to go out and work as they have done in the interest of business, it would have been a wise investment and very inexpensive.

Political Results.

The by-product next in interest to us is the political. No other class of citizens have done so much for our government. Our present status in the world and our fortunate diplomatic relations are very largely the result of their influence on foreign governments. They have done three things for us—have been steadily transforming those nations and fitting them for such relations with us; have retrieved the reputations which our adventurers and some of our traders gave us, and in many cases have been the wisest and most influential diplomats.

Mr. Taft tells us that the present budding of China into new life is the result of their work. That is the reason we now possess Hawaii and Samoa. The testimony of English officers in India is that the missionaries have done more than all others together and are effecting the most far-reaching social and political changes. Marquis Ito says that Japan's present development is chiefly due to the missionaries. Admiral Uriu says to them they owe their stable foundation. Administrative methods have been devised in almost all places under their advice. Without them our present advantages could never have been secured.

A Long List.

When we come to write the history of the African state the history will begin with the coming of the missionary. The names of the men who have been of such incalculable value to our country could be written, but there is not room for the long list. Had our government employed men to do for it what they have done, it would have had to pay them more than we have paid them.

No accurate charts of the world would be possible today without the work they did. They have been our explorers and historians. Twenty-five years ago all we knew about Oriental countries was from missionaries. All the books were written by them. Of late other explorers and historians are following them. Some of our travelers, on their return confessed to ignorance or indifference or prejudice before going, but without fail they give missionaries credit for what they have done, not only in their direct religious work, but in these great secondary results of their work.

Among them we may name President Taft, Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop, Robert Louis

Church Life

—All aboard for Topeka!

—It will pay any church to raise a purse and send its pastor.

—He will be a better preacher.

—He will be a bigger man for getting out into the world of the church's larger life and problems.

—And do not forget to give him credentials as a delegate to the American Christian Missionary Society, duly signed by the church clerk.

—Let all Illinois Disciples note the countenance of J. Fred Jones on another page, read the article, remember his services to your cause and send to the Christian Century a gift. It need not be a large one but a kindly one.

A series of meetings is being held at Parsons, Kan., by W. P. Reedy.

Herbert Yeuell is in a meeting at Marshall, Ill. He reports ninety accessions.

L. M. Moody, formerly of Meadville, Pa., has been called to Buffalo, N. Y.

Foundations have been laid for a handsome new church at Hamilton, Ohio.

Many additions are being made to the church at New Castle, Pa., under the ministry of D. P. Shafer.

Central Christian Church of Lebanon, Ind., has issued invitations to a "Home-coming" day on Sunday, Oct. 2.

G. P. Clark, our minister at Perkins, Okla., has removed to Enid and will enter the Oklahoma Christian University.

Harry M. Barnett of Webb City, Mo., will conduct a meeting at Hudson, Ill., the first part of October.

W. Bedall, who recently closed his work at Willows, Cal., is now settled as the pastor of the church at Coeur d'Alene, Idaho.

The Minnesota South-west District convention was held at Cleveland Sept. 12-14. C. B. Osgood of Mankato was elected president.

The meeting at Shirley, Ill., under the leadership of F. L. Starbuck of Eureka, closed recently with forty-two additions, and much interest was manifested.

Charles Reign Scoville continues his meeting at Litchfield, Ill. A novel feature was a Sunday afternoon parade by the Sunday-school children led by the city band.

P. C. Macfarlane, secretary of the Brotherhood of Disciples is ill with appendicitis in Los Angeles, Cal. He was progressing encouragingly at last report.

H. A. Denton, of Bradford, Ind., has received an urgent call from the church at Troy, N. Y. It has not yet been announced that he has accepted.

The sermon subjects at Central Church, Indianapolis, Sunday, Sept. 25, were "The Model Church" and "How We May Hinder Others."

Mrs. Nannie M. Dunkin of the Associated Charities, Bloomington, addressed a union meeting of the four churches at Danville, Ill., Sept. 22.

At his first service after his return from a summer abroad, Edger DeWitt Jones spoke to his congregation of First Church, Bloomington, Illl., on "A Sunday in Ireland."

W. E. Crabtree of San Diego, Cal., writes: "I have married 100 couples since Jan. 1, 1910. If any minister excels in this respect, let him speak up."

Thomas H. Papplewell, Arkansas City, Kan., reports eight additions to the church in the past month, and a Sunday school of 300.

The annual convention of the Cass County churches was held Sunday, Sept. 25, at the Ninth Street Church, Logansport, Ind., the address being given by E. R. Edwards of Kokomo.

H. O. Breeden and Charles Clayton Morrison will preach at the morning and evening services, respectively, celebrating the semi-centennial anniversary of the Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa.

The Seventeenth annual convvention of the Arkansas Christian Endeavor Union will be held at Fort Smith, Oct. 25-27. Dr. Francis E. Clark, the founder of Christian Endeavor, will be one of the speakers.

The church at Red Bluff, Cal., has called Ellis Purlee, for nine years the minister at Coffeyville, Kans., as its minister. Mr. Purlee has arrived and is rapidly getting hold of the situation in that city.

At a Sunday-school parade held recently at Tacoma, Wash., the Disciples' schools looked forward to having 1,500 children in line. This is certainly living up to the Tacoma slogan, "Watch us grow."

The First Church of Fresno, Cal., has extended a call to J. Griggs Mize, late of Kentucky University, to become assistant pastor. It is reported he has accepted and will enter upon his labors at once. Ray O. Miller is the regular pastor.

The new church at Sanger, Cal., was dedicated recently. F. M. Dowling, of Los Angeles, was announced to preach the dedicatory sermon. J. L. Snyder is the minister, and his work has been especially successful in this field.

C. H. Winders, secretary, writes that the Indianapolis Ministers' Association, Monday morning, Sept. 26, (28 being present) voted unanimously to endorse the move for a Delegate Convention and the union of our missionary interests.

Word has been received of the death of Mrs. Jesse P. McKnight, wife of the pastor of Magnolia Avenue Church, Los Angeles, Cal. Mrs. McKnight was greatly beloved by this congregation, having been identified with it since its organization seven years ago.

Dr. W. T. Moore says that he has not received a single vote against his proposal to have the Topeka convention authorize a letter to the denominations of Christendom urging a plea for Christian-union. He has received letters from many of the leading men of the brotherhood.

Miss Mary Kelley, a consecrated missionary of Nankin, China, reported a great revival at the mission station with which she is connected. She mentions the fact that as one of the results of the meeting sixty-three women and girls who became Christians have been placed under her tuition.

The church at Ukiah, Cal., has extended a unanimous call to Frank S. Ford, retiring pastor of the First church of San Francisco, to take up the work in that city. Mr. Ford, who is president of the State Board of Missions, has not announced his decision in the matter.

The following is the recommendation passed by the Illinois State Convention reference to which was made in our editorial note last week. "It is the judgment of your board that the churches should enable the society to support missions in Chicago in a manner adequate to the field.

Through the ministry of J. W. Kerns, Central Church, Austin, Tex., is increasing in all its activities. The West Austin Church, which had a great financial burden hanging over it, has been relieved by the management of State Evangelist Boggers and the officers of Central Church, of which it is now a mission.

The North Lawrence, Kans., Sunday-school has opened up a unique contest in the form of a football game. A chart has been marked off like a football gridiron, the majority of each team counting on yards gained. The contest will continue until the holiday season when a banquet will be served by the defeated team.

G. F. Williams of Oregon, has just closed a very fine meeting at Willamina, that state, resulting in the organization of a church of sixty-five members. Sixteen of these were brethren living in the community and forty were by baptism. The finest corner in the city was purchased and paid for, on which a suitable house of worship will be built.

First Church, Fresno, Cal., which is already supporting a missionary in both the home and foreign field, has added another department to its activities in a mission Sunday-school in another part of the city, supporting the leader called to take charge of this work. These two Home Living-links are supported out of the regular treasury, the same as the pastor.

The church at Mason City, Iowa, shows a commendable and progressive spirit in plans which are under way for the construction of a parsonage. With all our vaunted American progressiveness, we are put to shame by the Scotch "manses" and English "rectories" which our brethren over the sea provide as a matter of course for the temporal needs of their ministers.

Tolbert F. Weaver has been in two good meetings, at Orange and Bertram, Texas.

He is now located at Austin, Tex., and in addition to taking some work in the State University, will preach at Cameron, Georgetown and Bertram. He reports that Dr. Jewett of the Texas Bible Chair, is doing a fine work and reaching many University students.

Mrs. George A. Miller, wife of the pastor of Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C., died last week. Mr. Miller passed through Chicago enroute to Bloomington, Ill., where interment was made. This news will touch many hearts.

Miss Cora Dawson, who for years was in charge of a large orphanage at Peoria, Ill., and later the superintendent of a home for aged women in St. Louis, has accepted the position of superintendent of the Colorado Christian Home, and is already at work. Miss Dawson is an experienced worker. Her splendid ability is being used to develop this new and growing benevolent institution of the brotherhood.

E. B. Bagby, pastor of the church at Ft. Smith, Ark., appeared in the Christian Orphan's Home in St. Louis, not long since, with a whole family of needy little ones from his community. Mr. Bagby did not feel that he could trust them to come alone. He expressed himself as being delighted with what he saw in the Home. He has just received a unanimous call to the Harlem Avenue Church at Baltimore.

Texas Christian University opened its session of 1910-11 on Sept. 14, at Fort Worth, Texas. The removal there was occasioned by its buildings at Waco being destroyed by fire, with nearly a total loss of equipment. The temporary quarters at Fort Worth are satisfactory for the present, but plans for a new plant will be selected at an early date, with an expenditure of about $270,000. The enrollment is up to the standard of previous years.

C. C. Wilson of Bellefontaine, Ohio, in a recent sermon on civic needs and ideals, touched on the necessity of bringing religion into politics, not politics into religion, showing the wide difference between the two, and further if the Christianity of Jesus was given to us to meet every human need, its workers must keep abreast with the progress of humanity in other lines, so that they may have a full appreciation of these needs.

The twentieth anniversary of the founding of Walnut Street Church, Canton, Ill., was observed Sept. 27 and 28. The exercises included a history of each department of the church and many letters were read from former pastors, evangelists and members. Addresses were made by a number of speakers among whom were J. A. Barnett of Galesburg, C. R. James of Ipava, William Price and W. F. Turner of Peoria, S. H. Zendt of Bloomington, B. H. Cleaver of Lewistown and A. I. Zeller of Cuba.

At the annual Rally Day services at First Church, Hagerstown, Md., Sept. 25, a large enthusiastic audience was present, and those familiar with the work, say the affairs of the church were never in a more healthy condition, and that the outlook was never so bright for the future. The sermon subject was "To Every Man His Work," and the lesson was applied to the individual responsibility of every member in the work of the season upon which the church is now entering. Dr. R. H. Crossfield, of Transylvania University has been secured to conduct an evangelistic meeting later in the year.

Cecil J. Armstrong of Troy, N. Y., has accepted the hearty call of the Union Church, Monroe, Wis., and will enter upon his work at once. This is the congregation composed of Baptists and Disciples united some six years ago under the leadership of J. H. Berkey. The work has grown steadily since then and the church is now undertaking positive advances for which the members feel the need of a most competent leader. Mr. Armstrong's long and successful pastorate at Troy, his well trained mind and splendid Christian character make all friends of the Monroe church feel sure that success will crown the work.

The opening this year of the Oklahoma Christian University is one in which the people of Enid take great pride. It is the institution of all institutions of this young, thriving city. An ideal university located out on the fertile prairies in an index to the public that the cowboy is gone, and the wild and woolly west eliminated and instead those refining influences of higher and better education substituted therefor. The brilliant array of talent constituting the faculty is a credit to any educational institution. The facilities are the very latest and there is no question as to the standing of the school. The financial condition is good and before the year is ended it will be free of debt and an endowment of over fifty thousand dollars will be one of its assets. President Zollars has worked incessantly for the past three years and each year he has observed an increase in the attendance and a call for larger and more schools until now he sees a real college, graduating men in the A. B. and A. M. degrees. To him has the mighty responsibility been entrusted and his broad shoulders have born the burden and wrought hard to bring the success.

A beautiful new church is in process of construction at Hastings, Neb., at a cost of about $26,000. The plan is a distinct departure from the ecclesiastical architecture of past generations, being arranged and planned to meet original and modern requirements. Provision for the institutional development of the work has been made, including a gymnasium, shower baths, and a large club room and library which will be open every day, to afford a pleasant and profitable place for young men to spend their evenings. Under the pastorate of its present minister R. A. Schell, there has been an expansion in growth in all the activities of the church.

Dr. Errett Gates, who is spending a year abroad, has been studying in the libraries of Edinburgh University for several months. He goes October 1 to Germany where the remainder of the year will be spent. Dr. Gates has made a number of trips to the places which Alexander and Thomas Campbell's lives touched. He will begin the story of his observations as soon as the editor's current series is completed. Dr Gates will tell a very interesting story. During his stay in Edinburgh he has been preaching every Sunday for the congregation of Disciples (our "British" brethren). A personal letter from James Nimmo, an elder in the congregation says that they have greatly enjoyed their fellowship with him. "He has made himself much at home and has been so helpful that we shall miss him."

F. H. Groom, pastor of Central Church, Tacoma, Wash., is doing a good work in bringing before the public the subject of child delinquency, and the necessity of dealing with this vital subject in a more personal manner. There has been too much of the "soulless corporation" spirit in this work, a fact that is being more and more recognized by courts and public alike. Mr. Groom is a member of the state visitation board, and has interested himself particularly in the Industrial Home at Chehalis, Wash. With certain of the children there he keeps up a regular correspondence, letting them know they have a friend and adviser. This problem, which is comparatively a modern one, due to the somewhat unnatural life of the crowded city, is one of the vital ones that confront us, when we consider what its neglect would mean to coming generations.

Plans are under way looking to the merging of the congregations of Fourth Church and the Hammett Place Church, St. Louis, Mo. Both of these churches are of about the same importance, and each owns about the same amount of property. It is thought by the members of the Fourth Church, who are making the overtures, that, by combining forces, a strong church could be formed, which would mean a larger growth and better equipment. The site would be changed so as to make the combined church stand at some point between the two present locations. "What a city needs," said E. T. Edmunds, pastor of the Fourth Church, recently, "is not weak churches, but strong ones. The large organization has more than double the power of two small ones which merge." An instance in point in the Disciples' Brotherhood is that of the $250,000 Union Avenue Christian Church, which was formed by the merging of the old Mount Cabanne and Central churches. The Fourth Church is about twenty-five years old. Its property consists of the church building and a lot on Florissant avenue, near O'Fallon Park. There is a membership of several hundred, about the same as the membership of the Hammett Place Church. Rev. C. C.

AUDITORIUM, TOPEKA, WHERE DISCIPLES' NATIONAL CONVENTION WILL MEET.

Garrigues is pastor of the Hammett Place Church. He recently resigned, but reconsidered when the congregation began to agitate a plan for building. It is thought that this movement toward building may be taken advantage of by both congregations. The merging, if adopted, will involve the resignation of each pastor, and a re-election.

What promises to be a social event of exceptional significance in Chicago Discipledom is the reception to be given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest McDonald Bowman as a "home coming" greeting to them on their return from Europe. The occasion is being arranged by the Christian Business Men's Association of which Mr. Bowman is chairman. The Palmer House is to be the place of the party and the plates are two dollars each. Mr. Bowman is one of the prominent business men of Chicago and combines with his practical life a deep and constant interest in religion and especially in the work of the Disciples of Christ.

In the course of a few hours on the first Saturday in October, a church building will be erected within the town of Tolleston, Ind. The structure is to be known as the First Christian Church and during the day following its hasty birth members will congregate to hear the dedicatory sermon by the pastor, Mrs. Martha Trimble. Not a timber will be fitted, not a nail driven towards the construction until the signal is given by the ingenious leader C. J. Sharp of the Hammond church of Christ. Then the 100 volunteers will commence operations and the expected result will be a frame building 20 feet in width, 50 feet in length and 20 feet from ground to eaves. All materials and fixtures for the proposed house of worship have been ordered and are to be delivered before the eventful day. All furnishings not requiring unobtainable appliances in the construction will be made upon the grounds. Special appointed committees will build various necessities such as the pulpit stand and pews. The plan is to conduct work on the order of the olden time barn raising festivities. The women's societies of the Hammond and Gary churches will serve dinner to the workmen. A similar enterprise was recently carried to completion at Long Beach, Cal., when a bungalow capable of seating 300 people was built by the East Side congregation, in one day.

Mr. T. W. Phillips, of Newcastle, Pa., has just given $1,000 to the National Benevolent Association. Mr. Phillips is deeply interested in the work in which the Association is engaged, and makes this gift outright as an expression of his sympathy and as an evidence of his appreciation. The Association has usually occupied a night period on the program of the National Convention. In response to a demand for more time for business it has surrendered its place on the program of the evening of the last day, and will appear at 10 o'clock on Friday morning. The old ladies who have been so beautifully cared for in Eugene, Oregon, have been removed to Walla Walla, Wash. This is in line with the purpose of the Association to unite all of its work in the Northwest, settling it at Walla Walla. Work on the new building that is to be used as a Home for the Aged, in Dallas, Texas, has been suspended on account of the lack of funds. This building was begun about six months ago in response to the imperative demand for the enlargement of facilities for the care of aged, indigent brethren. The walls are up and under roof. It will require about $8,000 to complete this building, which will cost about $24,000. Thirty-two applications from persons desiring a home have been received in the last few months. Several of these are from preachers or their widows, and nearly all of them from persons who have rendered conspicuous service in behalf of primitive Christianity. The Association will maintain a rest room at the Topeka Convention, with a trained nurse in charge. The room will be equipped with easy chairs and cots. It will be open throughout the entire convention for the free use of those in attendance upon the convention who may need its benefits. Special attention will be given to caring for those who may be taken sick or suffer from accident.

On Sunday, Sept. 18, the corner stone of the new church at Boise, Idaho, was laid. This is to be a handsome structure of pressed brick and stone, built at an expenditure of about $45,000. This church was established in 1887 with a membership of about twenty. This has grown to 350, with every department of the church in flourishing condition. In his sermon, the pastor, A. L. Chapman, touched on Christian union as follows: "Believing that the divided state of Christendom is one of the greatest hindrances to the progress of the gospel and the conversion of the world, we shall seek to make our influence count for the promotion of Christian union. It is not merely unity that we seek, but a union that is visible and such as will impress the world. The Savior prayed for a union that might be seen, that the world might believe that God had sent Him. The world today looks on and sees a divided church and will not believe in Christ. In our advocacy of Christian union we shall seek not only to wear a name, accept a creed and confession of faith and practice ordinances that are catholic, scriptural and entirely possible of acceptance by all Christians without compromise of convictions, but also to manifest the spirit of union and even hold ourselves in the attitude of Christ towards all those who love the Lord in sincerity and truth. It is in no exclusive sense that we desire to be known as simply Christians, for that is the common family name of all the followers of Christ, but we insist that all party names should be thrown aside. And it is not in a dogmatic spirit nor with the assumption of superior knowledge that we practice only the immersion of the penitent believer in Christ as baptism, but rather with the conviction that this form and subject of baptism are not only scriptural, but also the most likely of acceptance by a united church, because all Christian bodies recognize the immersion of a penitent believer as Christian baptism. Realizing that it is much more difficult to practice a doctrine than to set it forth theoretically, we wish to give ourselves to the practice of union by the cultivation and exhibition of all the Christian graces and virtues and thus exemplify the plea we make and which we desire to advocate with all the zeal, love and intelligence of our beings."

A New President for Keuka College

At the close of the school year 1909-1910, Keuka College suffered a great loss in the resignation of Mr. Arthur Braden, as president. While Mr. Braden had been with the college but one year, he had won his way to the hearts of the faculty, students, residents of the college community, and general constituency of the institution. Believing in the work and mission of the school and in its great possibilities in the future, Mr. Braden himself was loath to give up the work, but was forced to on account of his health.

The trustees found it difficult in so short a time and in the face of a necessary strenuous campaign for funds to meet the current expenses of the school to secure a man for the vacancy. It was not until nearly time for school to open that they secured the consent of Rev. Jos. A. Serena, of Syracuse, to assume the responsibilities of the head of the Institution. He would not, however, accept the office until certain financial conditions were met. The Ball Brothers, of Muncie, Ind., made possible the meeting of these conditions by pledging $5,000 yearly for three years in case a like amount was raised. The trustees heroically went to work to secure these funds, and in less than two years $15,000 was secured in pledges to supplement the Ball Brothers' gift.

The success of the undertaking is shown by the fact that the whole amount with the exception of $300 or $400 was raised within a very few miles of the school. "Little Yates," one of the smallest counties in New York, responding most nobly to the call, shows that it appreciates the need of its home college.

Thus Keuka College starts upon its 20th year of work with a brighter view financially than it has had for some time. Still its great success in securing $30,000 for the next three years is but a beginning. We must not rest upon our oars. The noble gifts of the Ball Brothers and the immediate locality have opened the way to greater things. It should only be a spur to the friends in New York and throughout the country at large to contribute to the immediate needs of the school and to a permanent endowment fund, which is absolutely necessary to the life of the Institution. In fact the whole amount of $30,000 was given with the definite understanding that the religious denominations back of the school would immediately raise funds for endowment.

Mr. Serena, who was pastor of the First Church of Disciples, in Syracuse, has been in close touch with the institution as trustee and member of the executive committee since the Disciples acquired a co-operative interest in the school. He holds degrees from Eureka College and Harvard University, and before taking up his work in the ministry, spent several years in business. In point of ability, training and experience, Mr. Serena is well fitted for his new work. His wide circle of friends and acquaintances predict a bright future for Keuka College under his leadership.

W. L. Judd, Secretary.

Illinois Convention's New President

The election of John R. Golden, pastor of the West Side Church, Springfield, as president of the state convention for the coming year is a merited honor to a young preacher and to the convention itself. Mr. Golden's ministry has been given a repute for militancy which one can hardly credit on meeting him for the first time. There is a reserve and modesty about him that makes you wonder how he has ever conceived the purpose of running for the state legislature. But he did, and was elected and served his term with honor. That was while he was pastor at Gibson City. His two years at Springfield have been fruitful in the upbuilding of the church and the great enlargement and beautifying of the building. He ranks in the front in Springfield and Illinois.

JOHN R. GOLDEN.

Notes From the Foreign Society

The church at Lebanon, Indiana, L. E. Brown, pastor, becomes a Living-link in the Foreign Society and sends the entire $600 necessary. This is a great victory, and Brother Brown writes that the church is very happy in its consummation. The church plans to become a Living-link in the home field next year, through the C. W. B. M.

One of our good Ohio women sends $1,000 for the foreign work and says in her letter: "I have decided to give the right of way to my missionary contributions this month and let some of my bills I expected to pay wait over."

A letter from Chas. S. Settlemyer of Nankin, China, states that he and his bride (nee Miss Edna Kurz of Nankin) have been spending their honeymoon in Japan.

Your Secretary gave an address on "Teaching Missions in the Sunday-school" at the Kentucky State Convention at Owensboro recently. The interest manifested in this subject was extremely gratifying. Quantities of literature on the subject were sold at the close of the session. We believe missionary instruction in the Sunday-schools is one of the most needed things. The Foreign Society has a beautiful new announcement or catalogue on this subject. It will be sent free on application. It is surprising how much material is available for such work in the Sunday-school.

The First Church, Kansas City, Mo., plans to become a Living-link in the Foreign Society. W. F. Richardson is the pastor.

D. A. Ewers of Australia writes, "We are expecting an enthusiastic conference with Brother Rains when he lands September 5. Our Foreign offering last month was a record breaker. Over $8,300 reported so far and more than $3,000 of that from South Australia. Rains' visit will give the work great impetus."

Secretary F. M. Rains writes from the Fiji Islands on his way to Australia. He says: "One of the Seventh Day Advent Secretaries is on board making a tour of their mission stations. There are only about 80,000 of them in the United States, and they have more missionaries on the foreign fields than we have. They average over $4.00 per member for Foreign Missions."

Professor Frank Marshall of Oklahoma Christian University reports a mission study class of more than 125 members. That is great! Hiram will have to look well to her laurels to beat that. Profesor Marshall is using Bolonge, by Eva N. Dye as a text book.

The indications are that this will be a great mission study year. Many orders are already coming in for text books. Dr. Hurd of Hiram succeeds Professor C. T. Paul as leader of the great class there. Professor Paul is now at the head of the Missionary Training School, Indianapolis.

Dr. A. L. Shelton of Batang reports that he has been visiting the villages and mountains near Batang. At the time of writing all the missionaries were in good health and were joyfully expecting the arrival of Dr. Hardy.

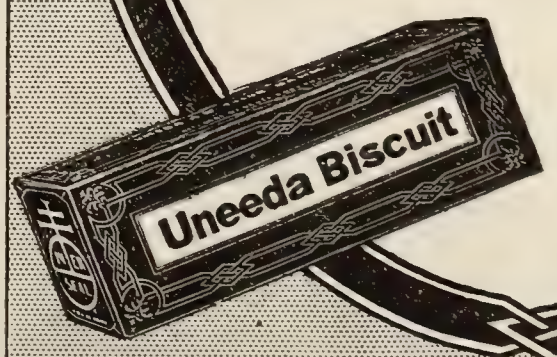
There is an epidemic of cholera in Harda, India. One of the Indian evangelists was taken down with it. For a time his life was despaired of, but at last report he was on the way back to health.

Since his return to the Philippines, W. H. Hanna has been operated upon twice. The operations were performed by Dr. Lemmon in Manila. It is believed by the physicians now that he will have no further trouble from this source.

The misionaries at Batang believe that that is the proper place to build the school, chapel and hospital, and even if the country were open at Lassa, Batang is the center of a good population, and all the import-roads meet there.

Dr. Paul Wakefield and family sailed from San Francisco September 27 on the "Manchuria." They go directly to Chao Hsien. Dr. Macklin returns to China immediately after the Topeka Convention. Miss Bertha Clawson sails for Japan on the 7th of October. R. Ray Eldred and wife start for Africa within a few weeks.

The Foreign Society is planing for a great exhibit of literature and curios at Topeka. This will be in charge of C. W. Plopper, Treasurer of the Society.



Moisture Will Spoil Ordinary Soda Crackers

NO matter how good the ingredients or how careful the baking, once expose soda crackers to the slightest dampness of air and they lose their taste and much of their food value.

That's why bulk crackers kept in barrels, boxes and cans get tasteless and tough and hard to swallow. They absorb moisture, and they also gather dust, germs and store odors. What a pity that this most nutritious of flour foods is so contaminated!

But there is a soda cracker too good, too perfect to be thus treated! After baking, Uneeda Biscuit are immediately placed in dust tight, moisture proof packages which preserve their crispness, flavor and nourishment.

The fourth edition of "Bolenge" is now on the press and will be ready to be sent out in a few days. This book has had a remarkable sale. Ira Adina Paternoster gave a copy to the missionary training home in Adelaide, Australia. One of the teachers writes: "This is one of the most charming missionary stories that I have read. One calculated to stimulate prayer and effort in the interest of the regions beyond. May God's richest blessing abide on the faithful few who out on the Congo are shining as lights in a dark place."

The Foreign Society occupies Thursday, the 13th of October at Topeka. The Board of Managers meets on Tuesday, the 11th, at 3:30 p. m. The meeting is to be in the First Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Foreign Society has published a Concise History of itself and work. This history was written by the missionaries on the field and not by someone in his study at home. It was written as the Epistles to the New Testament were written, at the front. There are two hundred illustrations in this work. It is sold at the nominal price of 25 cents per copy.

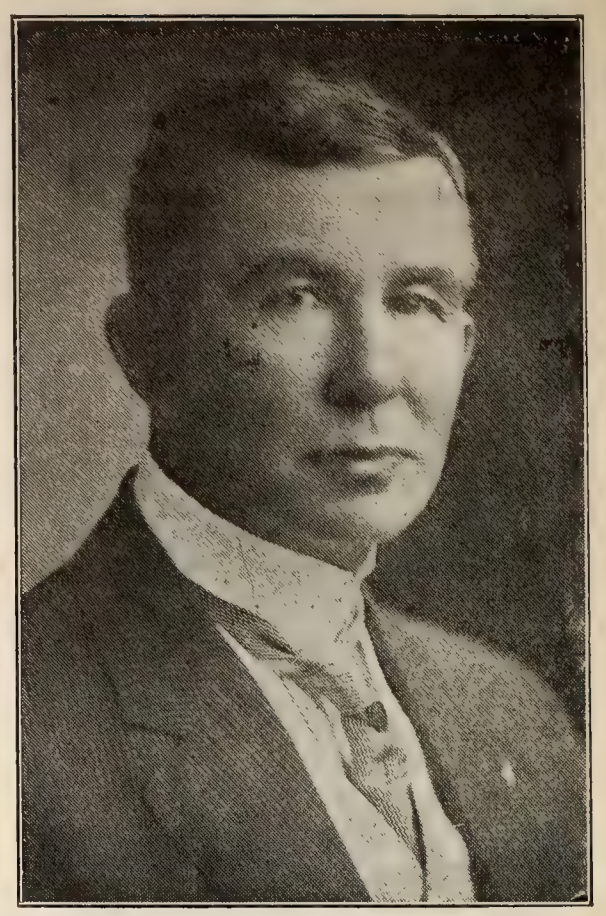
New England Convention

The Forty-fifth annual convention of the Disciples of Christ in New England was held with the Brockton, Mass., church, Sept. 8 to 11. About one hundred delegates were present from our New England churches. The little church in Brockton did nobly in caring for the delegates. Owing to the size of our church building the meetings were held in the Wendell Ave. Congregational church building, and the communion service in the First Congregational Church. Most of the general societies had a representative present. Their messages were cheering and helpful. The annual reports showed a year of hard work with some gains in this most difficult field. The treasurer's report showed all bills paid with over a thousand dollars in the treasury.

Two questions of interest were discussed by the convention. The employment of a general evangelist and secretary for New England, and the establishment of a Bible Chair in connection with Harvard University.



The addresses of our own men were of a high order. Every church in New England is supplied at present with a pastor.

Plans were put in operation to hold next year's meeting at Lubec, Maine, in conjunction with the convention of the maritime provinces.

A Secretary Who Serves and Sees

The esteem in which State Secretary J. Fred Jones is held by his brethren was evinced by a resolution at the Springfield convention granting him a month's vacation and suggesting that a purse of $100 be made up for his expenses. We have not heard that the latter feature got any more tangible than a suggestion. The Christian Century take the liberty of making itself the treasurer of such a fund. We will receive and acknowledge gifts from 50 cents up to $10 from friends of Mr. Jones who wish to testify their appreciation. J. Fred Jones has served Illinois for fifteen years. It is a splendid record of achievement which hung upon the wall of the state convention headquarters a few weeks since. Being state secretary is a big and hard task. To most church people the appeal of state missions is not very thrilling. It hasn't the romance in it, or seems not to have, that the foreign mission appeal possesses. The secretary is therefore working constantly among indifference and inertia. This is the hardest kind of work. But Mr Jones finds his compensation in the fact that progress is gradually made toward his ideals. He is a man of ideals. And if we have any fault to find with him it is that he does not put sufficient argument back of his ideals to make them win out in our state policy. Some of the good proposals that met with defeat at Springfield were inspired by the state secretary. They were defeated because they weren't adequately explained. Our state convention and much of our state work needs reconstruction. No one sees this better than our good-natured secretary. We could wish

SECRETARY J. FRED JONES.

DRAKE UNIVERSITY AND CAMPUS

Drake University is twenty-nine years old, has eleven buildings devoted exclusively to school purposes, employs more than 150 instructors, and has an annual attendance of more than 1,800 students The University is located in the best suburb of "Beautiful Des Moines," with easy access to every point of educational and religious interest in the city. Library facilities are unexcelled in the West, living expenses are moderate and opportunities for remunerative employment are unusually good. School is in session throughout the year.

THE COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE

The Bible College of Drake University was established at the opening of the school in 1881. It is

Free from the limitations of man-made creeds and sectarian domination; has a faculty of earnest scholars, each an expert in some branch of Bible study; maintains that spirit of loyalty to Christ which leaves the mind free to "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good"; has organic union with a large and rapidly growing university and affords an opportunity of hearing in lecture or recital many of the most famous world characters. Des Moines is an educational, artistic, industrial and religious center.

MEDICAL MISSIONARIES

Drake University has more Medical Missionaries in the field than any other of our schools. No other institution in the Brotherhood offers the advantages to be found at Drake University. The College of Medicine of Drake University is standard by every test applied to such institutions. The training of the medical missionary in the College of Liberal Arts, the College of the Bible and the College of Medicine assures the best preparation for complete service.

Scholarships for Bible College Students

Free scholarships are provided by the university and its friends for all students preparing for the ministry or the mission field.

to see him break from the stereotyped methods and conceptions and go forth with the zeal of a pioneer and create a new order of things. The brotherhood of the state would back him. Go off somewhere and have a good vacation, Brother Jones, the best time you ever had in your life and come back and do it!

But friends, that $100 purse, don't forget your share in it! Send to The Christian Century.

Front Rank Sunday-school

The schools holding front rank certificates are steadily increasing, there now being 200 schools in twenty-two states. According to the secretary, Kansas has nearly snowed the national office under with one of its blizzards, sending in forty-six applications in one week. Kentucky still remains in the lead.

The Power of a Revival

In a spiritual revival there is commonly much speaking. But the power in it that moves a nation or a generation is not caused by speech nor communicated by it. That, so far as we can trace it, lies in the absorption by some elect soul, or group of souls, of the inward spiritual forces that lie around us waiting to be tapped and used. Religious men talk of "baptisms of the Spirit" as though these were casual, uncharted phenomena, coming one knows not whence or how. When we have a true science of the soul we shall not talk thus loosely. We do not speak of "baptisms of electricity." We know this as constant force, available when we recognize its laws and put ourselves in right relation to it. We have yet to recognize the truth that in like manner the spiritual powers are constant—here about us available always when we know how to find them. The great impulses that from time to time break upon the world and stir it to a new inward life come always in the first place from prepared natures, pure, unworldly spirits which, as the retina to light are impressionable to the higher influences, become impregnated with them, and then communicate them mysteriously to their fellows. From such souls issue mystic potencies which charge the atmosphere, making it electric, creating in it new vibrations which penetrate and overwhelm the hearts of men. That is how revivals come. We shall never get them by loquacity. They are the results, wherever they spring up, of some silent, inward culture of the spirit.—J. B., in London Christian World.

By-Products of Missions

Stevenson, Consul Wilber, Henry M. Stanley. Explorers

The missionaries have climed mountains, examined temperature, taken the latitude and longitude of their stations, made charts, gathered data about the flowers and vegetables and animals and the geological formation of their mission fields. The whole modern educational system of India, devised by Macaulay, is rightfully credited by him to Carey and Duff

But the most remarkable by-product of all has been kept for the last word. It is in the field of literature. In many a case the missionary has made a written language. That was done in the South Sea islands by Dr. Paton. Hundreds of dialects in Africa and Asia have been reduced to writing by them. Morrison made a dictionary for China, Carey for India, Hepburn for Japan, Judson for Burma, Bronson for Assam, Nathan Brown for the Telugus, but the list is too long to give. They have created their technical and general as well as religious literature.

And this does not take account of the moral and religious regeneration now going on in the mission fields.

Launching of the Oregon on the Congo

On the 28th day of July the new mission steamer, the "Oregon," was launched in the great Congo River at Kinshassa, Africa. The dedication of this fine, steel steamer was one of the most interesting events of the Pittsburgh Convention. The boat was built in that city, then dismantled, separated into small parts, and shipped to the Congo. After reaching Matadi on the lower Congo, it was necessary to reship it by rail around the great Stanley Falls. At Kinshassa, where the Baptist mission is located, it has been rebuilt. Missionaries R. S. Wilson and C. R. Moon, with the aid of native help, have reconstructed it. It is no easy task to rebuild such a ship on the equator, away from adequate ship yards and equipment. The Baptist mission has been extremely kind, and has helped in every way possible. The picture shows the mission steamer ready for launching. The decks were constructed and the machinery installed after the boat was in the water.

The last letter from Mr. Moon, dated August 28, stated that the Oregon would be ready for the first trip in about five or six weeks. No doubt while the hosts gather at the Topeka Convention, this new boat will be on its way to Bolenge. No one can measure the enthusiasm that will greet this gift of our Oregon churches. At Bolenge, at Longa and at far Monieka and Lotumbe, thousands will greet this new evangelistic traveler with shouts and songs of joy. This Gospel boat will enable our missionaries and evangelists to carry the Gospel to hundreds of thousands who have never heard of Christ. The Congo, the Basira and their mighty tributary streams will now become highways for our King.

HUMAN ELECTRICITY IN THE Cure of Uric Acid Diseases

The Electricity inherent in the Human Body is the only Solvent Power of Uric Acid.

An acid condition of the blood and [illegible] tion result in the formation of Uric Acid. This substance getting into the delicate capillaries clogs them up, thus impeding the circulation, interfering with the Life Processes going on in the tissues and producing Heart Trouble, High Blood Pressure, Diabetes, Kidney Disease, Uric Acid Headache, etc.

Cold is the great precipitant of Uric Acid. When the sufferer from an accumulation of this substance is exposed to cold and fatigue, it is precipitated (thrown down and out of the blood), entering the joints, serous cavities and tissues where it collects and hardens into crystals, causing the pain and swelling of Rheumatism, Arthritis, Neuritis, Neuralgia, Sciatica, etc.

Heat, certain drugs, hot baths and applied electricity soften up these deposits and the pain and stiffness of Rheumatism, etc., is relieved; but this relief is not permanent, Uric Acid is still in the blood and system ready to appear in some other form and place. This explains why an attack of Rheumatism, etc., relieved through these methods is almost invariably followed by Diabetes, Kidney and Heart Trouble, etc.

These Uric Acid diseases cannot be cured by drugs, hot baths or applied Electricity; neither can the system be freed from this substance by dieting. The great and only essential for its removal is the increase in the Electrical Production of the body and the bringing of the Blood into a highly Alkaline condition—when it attracts and neutralizes these acids—they are dissolved or "burned up" by the Electrical Power of the blood—carried to the Excretory organs and easily eliminated.

Andrew McConnell has discovered the simple Electrical laws of self-treatment, whereby the individual can draw into the stomach the Electricity which is scattered all over the body thus perfecting the digestion of the food and increasing the supply of Electricity to be circulated generally throughout the system for its full assimilation. You can easily understand these laws and learn how to keep the blood in a highly Alkaline state and re-energize the kidneys so that they eliminate all wastes of the body brought to them—when, fre from Uric Acid and Old Age conditions you are again strong and vital.

Send for the McConnell Researches in Organic Electricity, which prove that one can with the Electricity of his own body cure the various forms of disease.

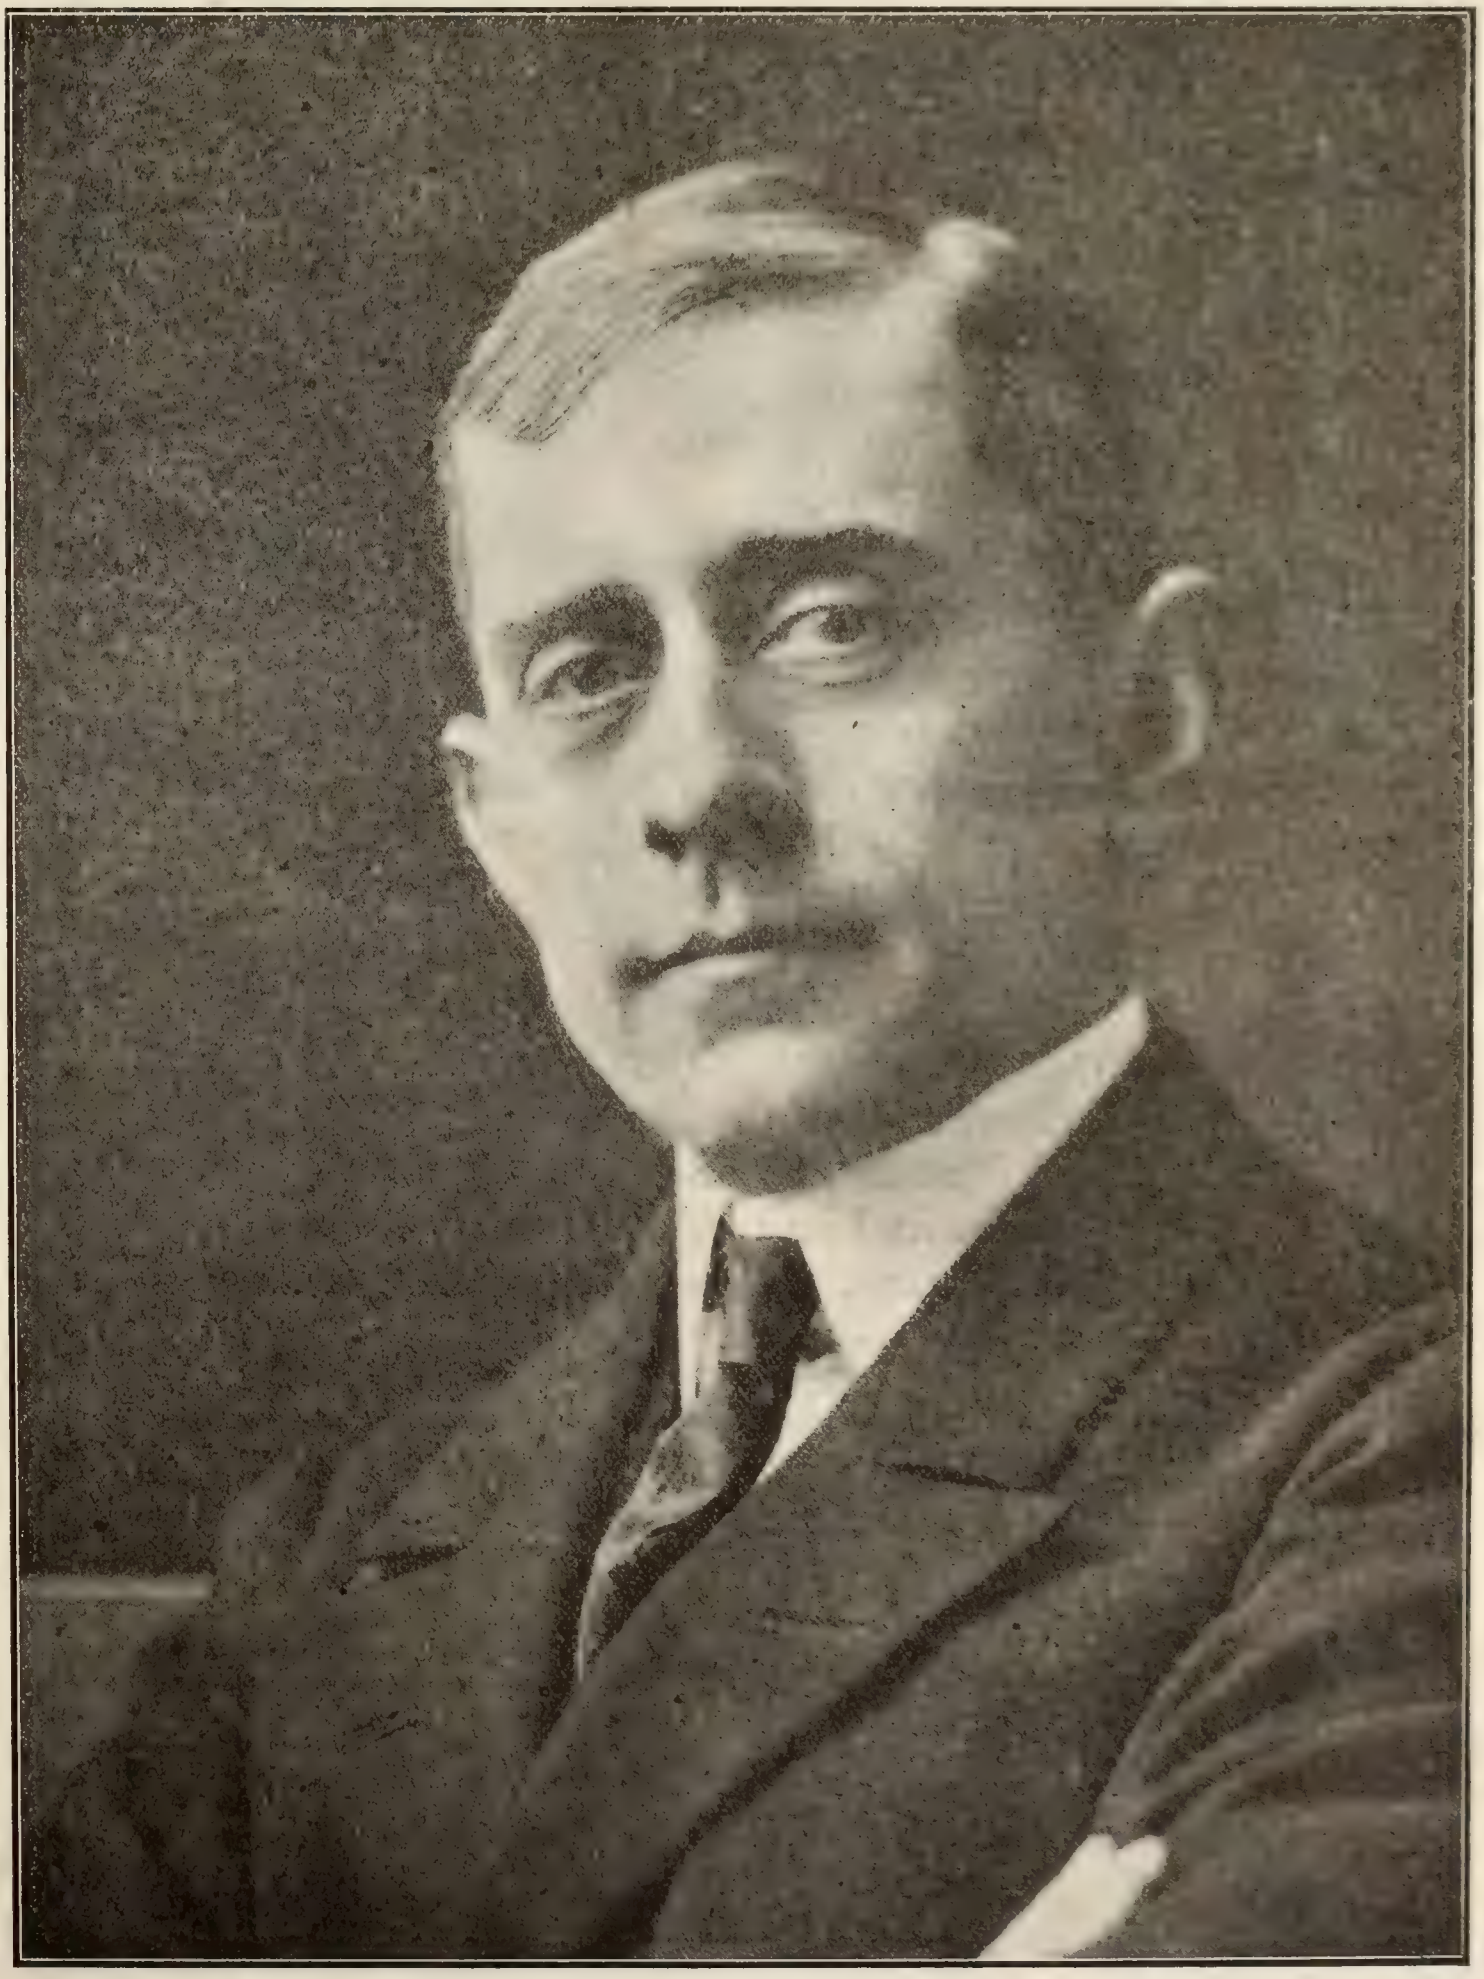
The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.



The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year. While these courses may be begun at any time, there is especial advantage in beginning at the beginning, October 1.

Strategic Problems of Religion

On this page last week we discussed a newspaper motto which set forth its editors' conception of the four strategic points of ultimate religion.

The specific criticisms of the four parts of this motto may be gathered under this general criticism, viz., that the whole motto deals with theoretical, academic, more or less fictitious, problems, not with vital religion at all.

The problem of inspiration is a speculative problem, treating of the manner in which the Bible was given but not affecting the contents or value of the word of God.

The problem of defining the metaphysical office of Christ is an academic problem of philosophy not a vital problem of faith.

The problem of the form of baptism is a problem of ecclesiastical ritual, related in but the remotest degree, if at all, to essential religion.

The problem of a united church, it was conceded, relates itself intimately with the character and destiny of Christianity, though the form in which the problem stands in the motto is obscure.

In short, the motto of the Christian-Evangelist is a motto of straw-problems. Not one of them, save the last, and that but vaguely, touches the great, warm, struggling life of our real human world.

Now the problems of religion are the problems of actual human experience. They may or may not be found in class-rooms and books, but we will certainly find them in the personal lives of living people, and in the social order of a human world.

And when we go to real people, to our own souls, to discover what religious problems loom big in our experience and strategically determine the curve and character of our lives, there is one that is so self-evidently vital and strategic that it seems an impertinence to mention any other in the same breath with it.

This strategic problem of religion is whether there is back of this world, supporting it and manifesting Himself in it, a God like Jesus Christ and like the God Jesus himself believed in.

The great problem of religion is God. And this is true in both the logic of religion and the experience of it. What the heart-hungers for is a living God The souls of men are restless until they find rest in Him.

What we need in the struggle for manhood and holiness is to know the kind of a God we may count on in this universe. If there is a God who fights for us we can be strong. If there is a God who cares for us we can be comforted. This is the ultimate need of our lives.

But by mere experience no man can be absolutely certain. We cannot see the final outcome of things, and, shut up as we are to the present, we see evil entrenched and often triumphant, we see goodness fail, we see good men suffer, we see bad men prosper. In a word, we see right and wrong woven together in the universe as the warp and woof are woven together in a fabric, and we cannot tell by simple observation whether God is good or not, or whether indeed there is a God at all.

It is this deepest and most baffling question of the soul which Jesus Christ answers. To accept his answer is to accept him, to be his disciple, to possess his life.

God is like me, Jesus says. He that hath seen me hath seen the Father. God cares for the things I care for and hates what I hate. He estimates the soul as I estimate it. He years for the outcast and the weary and the injured to forgive and revive and heal, as ye see me do. He is not a far-away God—no King-God ruling us men from above, nor a Philospher-God looking on impassive while we struggle and fail and die. He stands beside us in the conflict, refilling our quiver of arrows, binding up our wounds and noting the fall of the least of us. He is a human God, a working God, dust-covered, grime-stained, setting his mighty shoulder under our crushing load to carry it for us.

What I do in my three and thirty years, Jesus says, that God is doing in his milleniums. My Calvary, to which I hasten, a moment in history, is backed by the eternal heartache of God, "the lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

To make this faith that was in Jesus the faith of all men is the primary strategic problem of religion in this age or any age, in America and in all the world.

The strategic problem of religion next in importance is whether this human world of ours can be reconstructed so as to embody in its social order the principles and the spirit of Jesus.

In a religion whose basis is faith in the Christian character of God, the social order holds a strategic position. If Christ's kind of life cannot be made at home in the world, if his ideals, his unselfishness, his meekness are incapable of attainment in the social order, our faith that God is like Christ or that there is a God at all would be a mocking irony.

But if the social order may be made to conform itself to the principles and ideals of Christ, what other proof does one need that the God back of and in the world is like Christ, that his will is indeed one with the will of Christ?

If we accept Christ's answer to the heart's deep question concerning God we accept not a personal faith only, but a social task as well. The building of a Christian society is a religious enterprise, not a matter of "mere morality." Christ's great word was the Kingdom of God.

A strategic problem of religion is whether we shall have honest politics, clean and righteous business, just laws. The immigrant problem, the child-labor problem, the education problem, the prison reform problem—all are religious at the root.

Our materialistic age, pleasure-mad and money-mad; intoxicated with its machinery, its automobiles and its airships; smart with its schools and its science; sophisticated, clever, egotistic, irreverent; shameless in its wanton waste, its all but ineradicable graft in politics, its showy luxury, its child-labor, its drunkenness, its divorce, its lack of chivalry—our age needs God.

In face of today's vast slump of faith in God, in face of the babel confusion of the modern conscience, in sound of the tragic cry of the burned-out hearts of those who have sought life's ends in pleasure and in gold, in face of the disillusionment, the disenchantment, which is no less characteristic of our age than its shamelessness and pride, it is little less than wicked to divert the church's mind from its big task of proclaiming the Kingdom of God by calling the form of baptism and the doctrine of inspiration strategic points in the ultimate religion of America and the world!

Our whole social order needs to be shivered through and through with the thought of God, with the thought of a God who ever stands, as Christ stood, in the midst of the temple, smiting wrong in his wrath and calling the heavy laden to him for rest.

A third strategic problem in religion is whether the Christian people can be made one church through their possession of the one faith and their commitment to the one task.

The present denominational order is evil. It is a sin against Christ. It wastes divine resources. It constantly breeds an un-Christian spirit. It magnifies irrelevant considerations, such as creed and organization and ritual, into crucial points. It eclipses the really strategic task of Christianity.

None but a united church is equal to the high enterprise Christ committed to his disciples.

Can the sectarian order be overcome? Is it possible for Christians to be one as Christ prayed the Father to make them one? Is there a principle of unity which will transcend the creedal distinctions among Christ's people?

The Disciples of Christ, met this week in international convention, believe there is such a principle. They are striving to apply the principle in actually beginning the practice of Christian union. They have not gone all the way yet, in this practice. Not all the problems have been faced.

But they have set as their ideal to plead with all Christian people, not to join them, but to join with them, in the practice of Christian union.

And with this purpose they are working at all the strategic problems of religion in America and the world.

Where Words Divide, the Work Unites

The signs grow apace that the more we emphasize the work of the church the easier it is to unite for the doing of it. A paraphrase of the words of Jesus might be made by saying "If ye cannot unite for my words' sake, unite for my works' sake." When our creeds are submitted to the pragmatic test of "what result do they produce more than others?" division will begin to vanish. The interests of the Kingdom of God will become dominant over that of any denomination in the measure that a people devote themselves to the Master's task more than that of their own opinions.

In the Philippines the Methodists and Presbyterians had a seminary at Manila. There was so great a call for workers that they found it easy to unite the two schools and thus release some teachers for the pressing work of the field and at the same time, through the union, make a stronger appeal to young natives to join the cause of evangelizing their own people. In other words they concluded that ripened fields about them needed simply sicklers more than they needed the peculiar brands of Methodist and Presbyterian sicklers. Up in Iloilo the Presbyterians had a hospital. The Baptists were planning to build another to supply the needs of suffering humanity there. Their physician was called over to the sister church's hospital in an emergency and it was found that a Baptist medical missionary could cure bodies and help souls in a Presbyterian hospital and it suggested the idea that, as in union there is strength, it would be eminently Christian to unite forces and work together for the healing of the wounds of the Filipinos in the more efficient way. So the hospital is simply Christian and supported jointly by the two peoples to the immeasurable benefit of the mission and the glory of the cause. The creeds divide, the work unites.

The Way It Works in South Africa

South Africa is a new country, is a mission field and has proven a fruitful ground for the cause of actual Christian union. Moreover, it is demonstrating the feasibility of a plan for uniting Baptist and pedo-Baptist denominations. Negotiations have been proceeding for some time for a union of the Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Wesleyans and Baptists. The Wesleyans flunked out just as the culmination was about to be realized and the sectarian spirit that fights federation in the first instance, fell back upon mere federation in this case after the fact of a successful federation had wrought out its fruits in the promise of a next step toward organic union. But the other three bodies were not deterred and have arranged a satisfactory form of union, which it is confidently expected will be realized by the year 1912.

There are many details that cause trouble when questions of charters, property and forms of government come to be considered. These have to be dealt with in a large and statesmanlike manner, but the spirit will bring all to a successful issue if it is strong. In this case the matter of baptism might be thought to form an insuperable difficulty. But the Baptist churches have an English parentage and many of the English churches are not only open to Communionists but allow the form of baptism to be a matter of individual conscience, i. e., they do not sprinkle themselves but fellowship those who have been sprinkled in all good conscience, holding that their interpretation should not become a barrier to union between good and conscientious Christians. Thus these South African Baptists offered to enter the union on that basis. They will contiuue to follow their conscience in the matter of immersion but, recognizing others as equally good Christians with themselves, will join in the larger unity for the sake of evangelizing the great needy field about them.

Striking Contrast

In striking contrast to this action of the Baptists of South Africa is that of the Southern Baptists of the United States. Their last convention forbade its foreign missionary board to enter any relations of comity with other missionary bodies and ordered them to enter into no negotiations to prevent overlapping of territory on the mission field. It refuses to acknowledge that any other body of Christians has the saving truth of the gospel and even refuses to join with their Baptist co-denominationalists of the North in so slight a coöperation as that of the education of colored ministers. More, they put the Northern Baptists in the same category as other "sects" by establishing an association in Southern Illinois. They refused to recognize the International Graded Sunday-School Lessons and will not get out a denominational series of their own. It is not surprising to find the missionary offerings of the Southern Baptists are but one-fifth as much per capita as that of their Northern brethren.

It is a relief to turn to the action of the Free Baptists at their last conference. They voted by a four-fifths majority in favor of uniting with the regular Baptists of the North. Their missionary societies will immediately be merged with those of the larger body and the actual union will be left to the gradual action of the local, district and state organizations, to work out as conditions dictate. The transfer of all property was authorized and as eighty-four per cent of the membership of the Free Baptists have actually voted in favor of the union, it will doubtless be consummated within a short time. This will furnish excellent demonstration of the process by which two congregational bodies bring about organic union.

Progress in India

In South India four denominations have enjoyed a successful union for some two or three years. First, the Scotch-Presbyterian churches and the Dutch-Reformed united and the Congregational missions of the English and American boards did the same. Each was so pleased with the preliminary step that the larger union between them all was easy. Now a federation of all the missions and churches of the peninsular end of that empire is about to be consummated and it will doubtless prove but the second step toward a final organic union. They are demonstrating that Jesus cannot be preached by intellectual dissent nearly so well as by the union of heart and hand. Needless to say the native Christians are enthusiastic over the outlook. The union above noted brings one hundred and fifty thousand native Christians into fellowship that seems to them much more logical than does any difference in creedal forms of interpretation.

The greatest difficulty to overcome there was that of polity. First there is a difference between Scotch and American Presbyterianism. Then the synodical and congregational forms offer differences. It was satisfactorily adjusted by giving each congregation legislative powers for local government and endowing the councils with large advisory powers but no veto functions. The difficulties loom large until experience shows how easy it is for the spirit of union to dispel them when allowed an actual trial. "All things are possible with God."

In contrast to this is the caution of the United Presbyterians in the United States. They have had a committee of closer relation with other Presbyterian bodies and, since the union of the regular and the Cumberland Presbyterians, a strong sentiment has grown up in favor of following in the footsteps of their more evangelistic brethren and uniting with the greater body. To this however there is a strong faction of dissent who favor a union with other small presbyterial bodies instead. A compromise was reached by voting a continuance to the committee without recommending any definite steps toward actual union. Had this been on the mission field another union would have been consummated.

The Leaven of the Sunrise Kingdom

Japan has been pointed to as an instance of the slow progress of the work of Christian missions. John W. Foster, the American diplomat and authority on all matters of world-wide import has said: "If not a single conversion had been made in the past one hundred years, the reforms and blessings which Christian missions have produced would be an abundant reward for all the labors of the missionaries and the money contributed to their support." Recently the Kokumin, the official mouthpiece of the Japanese government, said editorially: "The development of Japan to a first-class power within the past fifty years is to a great extent attributable to the trouble taken by the missionaries who, either by establishing schools or by preaching the gospel of Christ in the churches, have cultivated the minds of the Japanese and enhanced the standard of their morals. It is to be hoped that the missionaries will redouble their energies and zeal in promoting the welfare and happiness of the Japanese." A delegation of prominent Japanese business men have recently made a tour of the world. Their leader was Baron Shibasawu, one of the most prominent business men of the Far East. He is not a member of the church himself but he made this statement: "Japan in the future must base her morality on religion. It must be a religion that does not rest on an empty or superstitious faith like that of some of the Buddhist sects in our land, but must be like the one that prevails in your own country, which manifests its power over men by filling them with good works." Forty years ago Count Ito voiced the mind of Nippon when he asked for our science and art but declared their own religion good enough. Before he died he has said essentially what the two above quotations declare, and said it many times.

The missionary began at the top in Japan and while there has been very satisfactory progress, and while there have been more rapid changes in the national life brought to pass by that method, it is doubtful if Christianity will ever reach any remarkable numerical success until it goes to the masses in earnest. One missionary turned from the upper to the low caste people in India and baptized fifteen thousand. Christianity has ever sought out the lowliest and built upon them.

The Marvel of the Conquest

There is no longer any question about the success of foreign missions. It remains only to marvel at their success. The Edinburgh Conference statistics bring to attention the unparalleled growth of the church in the lands beyond the seas. Every day of the year sees at least four hundred won to the gospel in the mission field and every week a great congregation of three thousand souls, a veritable Pentecost. Last year Christendom spent twenty-five million dollars in leavening the world beyond with its message. It is represented by nearly twenty thousand missionaries and they are helped by one hundred thousand native workers. There are five million in the native Christian communities, of which about one-half are actual communicants. It is safe to say it is not so easy to be a nominal Christian in the foreign field as at home and that if the missions adopted our manner of welcoming members in the churches much more than one-half would be on the rolls. There are thirty-six thousand places where the work is conducted and a million and a half are in the schools.

A decade and a half ago there were but ten thousand missionaries and forty thousand native helpers, the amount expended was but one-half as much and the number in the schools was likewise but one-half what it is now. The number of conversions were then but one-third what they are now. In the past five years there have been more than a half million converted to Christianity by the work of foreign missions. At the end of the first century of the Christian era there were but one-half million in the church. The foreign missionary brings twelve into the church each year while the average for the home pastor is but two. If success commands attention and brings both money and men to an enterprise, then the missionary cause ought to encompass the world within the next generation.

The Future of the Laymen's Movement

There has been a good deal of speculation as to what would be done by the Laymen's Missionary Movement this coming winter. Sec. White has been quite equal to the demand, or the emergency as many view it, and proposes to carry the enthusiasm and intelligence with which that missionary tidal wave was endowed last year, out into the smaller churches and country places. He would be glad to hear from any county that would like to organize or from the smaller cities that want rallies. There were many of the larger cities that were missed last winter and they will be in this winter's itinerary while there are great numbers of smaller cities that would vie with each other in attesting the fact that they are quite as much awake as the greater cities. The pastors and missionary committees of the cities where meetings were held last winter will be called together for conference and for the purpose of following up the interest awakened with substantial work to conserve and add to the gains made.

With the discussion now on as to what is to be done with the Men's Clubs, it is worth while considering this work as one of the avenues for substantial effort. It would be better to start a club with a dozen men in each church who would unite for the doing of the vital work of the church than to have a hundred at a supper once in three months with nothing to follow but an evaporation of enthusiasm. The Citizen's Congress in Chicago and the Laymen's Movement suggest two vital means for the united energies of the men in the churches. They can unite for civic uprightness at home and the spread of Christian benevolence around the world. Let a dozen men in a church of three hundred members so unite and let those from all the churches come together in earnest and with the spirit of the Lord upon them, and they will not only awaken the church at home until their numbers will mightily multiply, but they will awaken the ends of the earth with their generosity and stir the bats of corruption out of our civic life.

Editorial Table Talk

Already a Delegate Convention

While the Disciples have been discussing the question as to whether they wished a delegate and representative convention or preferred to continue the loose and unbusiness-like gatherings of the past, the president of the American Christian Missionary Society has taken the decisive step of requesting the churches to send regularly chosen delegates to the Topeka convention. This is the business-like way to meet the question. The Disciples will never be able to express any concerted and convincing judgment on any question until their conventions cease to be a mob of well disposed people and become an organized and representative gathering speaking in behalf of all the churches and not overborne by the preponderance of local attendance. There was a time when the conventions as we have known them in recent years were sufficient, but that time has passed. There is no adequate reason why we should not advance from chaos to order. Only those can fear the advent of representative conventions who apprehend peril to their pet views of things by the ability of the Disciples to voice their convictions and wishes in some definite manner. A number of the states are already organized on the delegate basis and the result has been of great advantage in every instance. Not less but greater would be the advantage in our national gathering. The new century upon which we have entered ought to be marked by the passing of inadequate methods and the adoption of those fitted to the new occasions.

A Chance to Educate Missionaries

The opening of the Missionary Training School at Indianapolis under the direction of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions is an event of great importance in the work of the Disciples. On foreign soil we have several educational institutions whose work is to train native helpers for missionary service. And in the United States our colleges are giving increasing attention to missionary education. But this is our first effort at formal and definite training for the work of a missionary in America and abroad. The choice of Prof. Charles T. Paul as the head of this institution is an assurance both of confidence in the organization of the curriculum and of enthusiasm in the work of the classes. This institution will not be a rival of any other school, for its field is a special one and it demands a college course as a prerequisite to its instruction. The courses cover the entire ground of the science and practice of missions, and conform in most regards to the recommendations of the special commission which reported at the Edinburgh Conference on the education of missionaries. The work of this institution ought to be brought to the attention of our churches. Suitable young people should be induced to devote their lives to missionary service and to take up the work of study in the school.

A Test for Spiritualism

"Good morning! Have you had a spirit message from Professor James?" If the number of persons claiming to have received communications from the lately deceased philospher continues to increase it is likely to become quite the popular fad to have a little conversation with spirit-land each morning before breakfast. Of those who have conversed with Professor James the one most talked about is a Unitarian preacher in New England. The distinguished psychologist declared his intention to communicate from the other world if possible. Of the alleged communications thus far received none are intelligible, however. In taking leave of earth the Harvard professor arranged a test, knowledge of which will greatly stimulate mediumistic people everywhere to receive "messages." As is well known Professor James had been for a number of years interested in the study of so-called spiritistic and other psychic phenomena. He was one of the distinguished members of the Society for Psychical Research. He said and wrote but little about it, however, believing that as yet no sure nor even tentative deductions could be drawn from the mass of unorganized data. Before his death he wrote out certain facts about his life which none but himself knew, and sealing these statements in an envelope, directed that it be given for safekeeping into the hands of certain members of the Society for Psychical Research. He promised that from the other side he would try to communicate the contents of this envelope to some one on this side. There will, no doubt, be many claimants for the glory of revealing the envelope's secret. It is regrettable, however, that the popular mind tends to identify Professor James more with the spiritualistic theory to which he never committed himself except as an open-minded investigator, than with the great problems of normal human life with which his name will be ever identified by informed persons in the world of scholarship.

Systematic Study of Vice

The Chicago Vice Commission which was appointed in the spring by the mayor has pursued its investigations during the summer and is holding frequent conferences and interviews with the different organizations of the city which are engaged in education, reform and the detection and punishment of crime. Careful investigations are being made by experts and these have already clearly proven the far-reaching nature of the social evil which requires the most painstaking and intelligent handling in order not to do more harm than good by reformatory efforts. The report of the commission promises to be an exceedingly interesting and impressive document. Already the indications point to some most important suggestions and efforts toward the removal of at least a part of the direful results of this great modern plague.

Shall the Pastor Do Religious Work?

"There really isn't any one to look after the spiritual life of our church—not even the preacher, he is too busy." This single luminous sentence is extracted from a long letter written by a subscriber whose heart has been humbled by reading our recent editorial on "What Can the Men Do?" He has been looking about him in his own church and finds that our description and interpretation of conditions fit precisely. His preacher is a "hustler." They have always bragged on him as being such. He works hard and faithfully. But the big business of the preacher, our correspondent sees, is not being done. The church counts its victories not in terms of spiritual life but of finances and accessions and increased property. Our correspondent does not blame his preacher; he feels for him; he blames himself and his brothers in the church for allowing their work to be done by the minister. The letter closes with a statement of some practical things he means to do to change conditions. Letters such as this revive the drooping spirits of an editor. If that Chicago pastor who recently resigned his pulpit that he might go into religious work, had had a few men in his church of the temper of our correspondent he might have been kept in the ministry.

Not Dogmatists But Disciples

The present tide of sentiment setting in toward union fills the Disciples of Christ with eager desire to render an especial service. The true temper in which they, as pleaders for Christian union, must approach the Christian denominations is well described in an article by Rev. P. J. Rice in The Christian Courier of Dallas, Texas. What can we do? Mr. Rice asks, and answers by saying in effect that we can lead all the rest of the Christian world in humbly sitting down at the Master's feet and studying the problem with open minds. "Our program of restoration," he says, "implies a continuous study of the Scriptures, that we may be able to bring forth out of this treasure-house things both new and old. If we were dogmatists we might say that we have completely restored New Testament Christianity, but since we are disciples and not dogmatists, we are bound to be students of the Word, and our message, therefore, while true to the old will ever be instinct with freshness and vitality." Mr. Rice strongly favors the distribution of literature on Christian union, but warns us against dogmatism and sectarian self-seeking in such a propaganda. "A literature that will really grip the mind of the church today must breathe the spirit of broad altruism. Any plea for union that looks in the direction of denominational advantage will have little weight. Every evidence that those who are making it are hopeful of some militant gains, or denominational prestige, or the vindication of some doctrinal holdings or formal practices, will by so much discount the effects of the plea itself. The mood of our times does not tolerate self-seeking on the part of any one, much less will it listen to a plea for union that does not manifest in every syllable of it the spirit of humility of discipleship and of service. Dr. Ecob, writing in the Homiletic Review recently, asks: 'Ought it not be understood from this time forth that any denomination which professes to give up nothing, and puts forth its own pet creed as a basis is therefore disqualified to sit in any body called to consider church union?' Our position may be ever so final, but if we put it forth as such we deprive it at the start of that candid consideration it should receive. . . . A literature that will be read and that will command general respect must be devoid of that tone which seems to say: 'Ours is the primitive, original, simonpure brand of the Christian religion,' it must be thoroughly purged of all those trite phrases which give the least prominence to the idea that our understanding of the Scriptures is perfect, absolute and final. It must be entirely free from everything that savors of pride even in our virtues. We must forget self in our passion for Christ and the ideals he has set before his church. The Disciples are not devoid of such literature, but the situation calls for more of it." The attitude described by Mr. Rice in his excellent article is, The Christian Century believes, in no sense inhibitive of a very positive and even militant advocacy of the Disciples' essential plea. For that plea does not assume to make any save a tentative statement of particular details in the basis of union; it undertakes to set forth the foundation principle of union. And that principle they must herald with the passion of crusaders.

Two Letters

The same mail brings to The Christian Century office two letters which have a more vital connection than the fact that they happened to lie together in the postman's hand. One is an invitation from an Illinois pastor asking the editor to spend a week with his church preaching two Sundays and every night between, and holding conferences with various departments of the church in the afternoons of the week days. The pastor in describing the work he wants done says he conceives this program as taking the place of the usual revival meeting held in his church annually. "My church needs spiritual quickening," he says, "we need to be enlightened from a wider and higher point of view than that taken by the average revivalist. I wish to get our official board and the Sunday-school teachers and other workers in the church to see some things that the revival does not show them." The other letter is from a layman who has been thinking about the condition of the church of which he is a member. It is a strong church. Its pastor is one of our princely men. But this layman has been doing some calculating and finds that only 20 per cent of the members come to the communion table, a service upon which the Disciples have laid the most solemn emphasis. Only 25 per cent are in attendance at either morning or evening service on Sundays. Not more than 33 per cent (counting gifts representative of families) give to support the church's work and not more than 30 per cent give to missions and benevolences. Only 3 per cent attend prayer meeting. This correspondent urges that we inaugurate a new evangelism whose purpose shall be to close the church's back door! Our revivalism is bringing converts in at the front door and doing little to keep them from slipping out at the back door. "An evangelist," says our correspondent, "can worry us into a perspiration over the unsaved outside the church, but our temperature doesn't vary a fifth of a degree throughout the year over the multitude of unsaved inside the church." These are vigorous but not ill-chosen words. The Christian Century does not claim to possess any magical solution of the problem stated by the correspondent last quoted and evidently felt by the one quoted first, but it does wish to point earnest men in the direction of the problem and to do its humble part in raising the spiritual standards of our church life.

Defending Denominationalism

Professor Shailer Mathews gives eight reasons, in a recent issue of The Congregationalist, in answer to the question, "Why I am a Denominationalist." It is well for those urging Christian union to have the opposite position set forth in as trenchant a way as it is done in this article. Some of the eight reasons are new, but most of them are the time-worn apologies for the sectarian order. Dr. Mathews calles the sect "a sort of an ecclesiastical safety-valve." "We are not ready yet for church unity. Of course I should be glad if ultimately everybody became a Baptist, but that does not seem to me at the time of writing highly probable, or indeed desirable, until the Baptists are less "Baptistic." And when they reach that stage they will become Congregationalists. I am not clear that there would be great gain in such a change. For my part, I would not abolish denominations if I could. It will be a long time before we get church unity along a common divisor of such Christian beliefs which everybody holds. We have that common divisor now, and it holds us together as Christians. But common divisors never breed enthusiasm. But we can get co-operation and federation which shall conserve the effectiveness born of denominational organizations." The article sounds like the utterance of an eccliastic not of a seer.

People Who Fit In

We are to consider people who fit into the plans of God. A man may fit into several places in this world without being of much value to society. The street loafer is at home with his group of loafers but his comfortable feeling strengthens neither public nor private morality. One who fits himself to the plans of a band of highway robbers is classed with the enemies of law and order. That a man is pleased with his neighbors and that they are pleased with him is not sufficient evidence that he has found his place in the plans of God. We must know something about his neighbors before we number any man among the saints on the ground that he is at peace with everybody.

Noah is presented to us as a man who measured his conduct by the divine standard. It is not stated that he was popular, that he had held all the offices he was legally qualified to hold. There are intimations that he could not have been elected dog catcher. He belonged to the new order; his neighbors had no vision and were content with things as they were. The man of vision must choose between stifling his conscience and enduring the ridicule of the blind. The greatest preacher of the age may be the most unpopular. Lack of popularity is no sign of greatness, neither is a crowd of followers. A mob often gathers without a leader. Only by looking over the way by which humanity has come and by looking forward to the goal is it possible for us to form a sound judgment of a man's value to society. If we busy ourselves with side issues, we shall be exalting to places of honor little fellows who count for nothing in the kingdom of God.

The leaders needed by the churches are men with capacity to guide a world movement. Christianity has come face to face with the non-Christian religions and philosophies. It is no time, therefore, to preach anything that is not an essential part of the gospel of Christ. Unfortunately certain provincial statements of the doctrines of Christianity are accepted by many as universal and final. The church that understands the commission with reference to India, China, Japan, Turkey, Africa, and the islands of the sea is better qualified to state what is the gospel of salvation than a provincial Greek, Latin, German, or English church. If the church of the present is fitting into the situation, it is vastly more interested in the redemption of the nations than it is in the dogmatic deliverances of the church fathers. So far as the writings of the fathers throw light upon present problems, they may be studied with profit. But the man who lives in accordance with the demands of today understands that it is not his main business to keep intact ancient traditions, at whatever cost, but to assist in giving the world a knowledge of the God, of our Lord Jesus Christ and in winning individuals and races to the practice of love in business and social relations. Christ is greater than he has been conceived to be by the makers of creeds. Those who rise to the greatness of the church's mission to all men will gain a deeper knowledge of his character and will increase the faith of the common man in his divinity.

Midweek Service, Oct. 19. II Pet. 2:3 4, 5.

Observations in Brief

Unrest In India.

Naorogi Cokhale, a leader of the Indian national party in this country says: "India is in a ferment. The population is on the eve of revolt and a general movement of insurgency, with a republic as the ultimate goal, is on the way." The custom of child marriages in India, although viewed with strong disapproval by the British authorities and not encouraged by enlightened Hindus themselves, proves to be too deep-rooted to be killed in one generation by mere western disapproval. A British blue book just issued contains some striking statistics on this much discussed Indian problem. Out of a total population of nearly 300,000,000 there are nearly 25,000,000 married under the age of 20. Of these more than 360,000 are under the age of 5.

Cholera In Naples.

Nearly 1,000 persons have died of Asiatic cholera in the Naples district since the scourge appeared there a month ago. The official fiction that the disease is only gastroenteritis is dispelled. Even in Naples bulletins are issued daily now by the health officials. One hundred thousand persons of the better classes have fled from Naples and its vicinity since August, it is reported. In that time official reports show 32,000 tickets out of Naples have been sold—an unexampled exodus.

A Stirring of Educational Dry Bones.

There seems to be a stirring of dry bones in the British educational world. It was a marvelous thing when Oxford University recently announced that hereafter less attention will be paid to Greek and Latin and more to science and practical things. Now comes the University of London with a call for an imperial conference on education, to be held in London in 1912, at which representatives of all the universities of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, South Africa and India will be in attendance. The call has the indorsement and backing of Oxford and Cambridge Universities, and of the older Scotch universities, but is issued in the name of the University of London, a younger institution, because it is located at the heart of the empire, and also because it is less conservative. The outcome of this conference will be watched with much interest by the friends of the cause of education, not in Great Britain only, but all over the world. One immediate result probably will be a unification and better coöperation of British educational interests; but there are likely to be other results of great importance to the educational world in general.

Cholera Costs 75,000 Lives.

From the reports received from the cholera-infected districts of Russia, the Public Health and Marine Hospital service attributes the outbreak of the scourge and its wide dissemination there to the fact that very few of the Russian cities have waterworks or drainage systems. The number of deaths since the outbreak in May was nearly 75,000 to and including Sept. 1.

Abolishing Public Drinking Cups.

Thus far seven states have taken measures for restricting disease by abolishing the public drinking cup. Forty state boards of health have by resolutions condemned the cup, and twelve of them have decided to abolish it in the near future. Thirteen others which cannot take such action without legislative authority will seek enabling acts as soon as possible. Many cities have taken individual action, including St. Louis, Mo.: Portland, Ore.; Boise, Ida.; Little Rock, Ark.; Wheeling W. Va.; Fargo, N. D.; Colorado Springs, Col.; Camden, S. C.; Elgin, Ill.; Childress, Tex.; New Rochelle, N. Y.; Georgetown, Pa.; Rutland, Vt., and Syracuse, N. Y. Educational campaign to enlighten the public regarding the dangers of public drinking vessels are being carried on at present in 32 states. Sixteen railroad companies now provide the opportunity for their passengers to purchase individual drinking cups at a nominal charge on board the cars of their passenger trains. The presidents of 27 other railroads agree with the attitude of the various state health boards in their opposition to the common cup. Municipal authorities in many cities other than those named are taking action to ablish the public drinking vessel in all public places including theatres and department stores.

Providing Work for Prisoners.

President Amos W. Butler, of the American Prison Association, in his annual address at Washington last week, touched upon several important phases of the work of the association and questions connected with it, but none more important than that of work for prisoners, especially those in county jails. On this point he said: "A convict's needs are the same as those of any other men, and the first and most important of these is work. There is one leisure class in this country—composed of the inmates of the county jails, and there more than anywhere in the prison system, is the most crying need of reform. In the penitentiaries this has been recognized, but no system of providing work for convicts is yet free from serious faults. A convict's work should be productive if it is to be of any future use to him. It is not enough merely to occupy him."

Progress of Initiative and Referendum.

The initiative and referendum is moving on. The Democrats made it an issue in their campaign for the election of delegates to the constitutional convention in Arizona. The Republicans opposed its adoption in the constitution, and the Democrats won. In Arkansas it also was an issue in the election of last week, and carried.

Results of the Lynching Evil.

The logical results of the lynching evil were never more clearly set forth than they were by Judge Stout, at Frankfort, Kentucky, in his talk to the grand jury about investigating an attempt at lynching: "If citizens are to be allowed to take the administration of justice into their own hands and decide who shall be punished and who shall not, it will not be long until all private affairs and business matters will be controlled by such methods and anarchy will reign. That means there will be no law and no redress for any citizen. There is no bravery or courage in any man who joins with a lot of other men to kill a poor, cowering, trembling prisoner who is already in the custody of the law."

The Salvation of the Minister's Soul

Searching Interpretation of the Preacher's Inner Peril

BY GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

The minister has a soul for which he must give an account. The doctor cannot violate with impunity the laws of health, no more can the minister violate the laws of the spirit and keep his soul whole. His profession is no guarantee of salvation. Intimacy with sacred words and institutions has its subtle dangers. Theology cannot promise religion. The office cannot speak for the man. Christianity is more than much speaking. Religion is not machinery. The soul cannot be derricked into salvation, for it is the most delicate and yet the strongest thing in the universe. It is the life of God thinking, and loving, in another. Salvation is incarnation. It is the truth that opens the eyes to the stars. Salvation is Christ. It cleanses, it brings openness of vision, it makes everything tingle with the Divine, it unites, it sheds the blood of self for the good of others, it sanctifies all thought and all work. To redeem, it descends into hell; to rejoice, it ascends to heaven. It consecrates money and time, thought and talk; it makes whole. Salvation is God at work.

Minister Saved by Becoming a Christian.

If, therefore, the minister's soul is to be saved it is not by theology, or institutions, or systems, or preaching—but by becoming a Christian. The minister's soul must not be clamped but must be free to hold, at all times, direct and holy communion with its Father creator. It must also love democratically. Having these two new-birth endowments, it will possess full salvation and the scarcely containable joy of being sure.

This doctrine I am enunciating is Protestant, though not Protestant practice. We obstruct our open vision by our priestly persons and institutions. Luther rebelled because the Pope got between him and God. He demanded freedom to the throne. Wesley labored to get unprofitable ceremony out of the way. He contended, and we all do, that the naked and individual soul is made for direct communion with the Divine. What is prayer but the assertion of this glorious Protestant faith?—and it's a tremendous faith! The very thought of prayer is daring and staggering. It makes the universe to hear the whisper of a babe. It makes "I pray the Lord my soul to keep" mightier than the law of gravitation; and "Give us this day our daily bread" mightier than the laws of astronomy—every soul in Christianity can pray. No intermediary priest is necessary.

No Priest May Get in the Way.

Our doctrine of prayer is more daring and dazzling than the flight of any airship—any soul is privileged to fly to God. The minister, to save his soul, must claim this privilege; he must not allow the priest to get in his way. The modern priest tempts us in the form of scholars, creeds, newspapers, etc. The minister's soul does not grow strong by leaning upon another. We are weaklings because we refuse to reverence the God within us. We must guard the sanctity, freedom and authority of the single soul. God is a democrat. He speaks to his Isaiah and to his hod-carrier; to his Mary and to his washerwoman. Forgetting God's ways we lean too heavily upon the priest of Greek, or logic, or criticism. We have already canonized Alexander Campbell. I think he compares favorably with the other saints, and they all can help us if we do not allow them to become our priests. Every soul must make its own sacrifice. Mister McGarvey's altar will not avail, nor will Mister Willett's (Mister is scarcely a priestly term). Neither of these worthies has fire enough for others. No one has. Each must kindle it on the altar of his own heart. Partyism and prejudice exist because of the undue exaltation of the priest. I believe in the scholar and the schools if they do not arrogate fields other than their own to themselves.

The ways of God are democratic. They are highways for the multitude. The lonely mother in Israel is often more versed in spiritual things than some who have long studied the psychology of God. The minister must not be affrighted by scholarship. Doctors of philosophy die and go to the judgment. They gaze and wonder at the flying machines like the rest of us. They are pleased when their wives make them a good bowl of soup. They are awfully human—and not one great question of life can they answer satisfactorily to themselves.

Literature a Means of Salvation.

If the minister's soul is to be saved he must choose well the literature he reads. Here, too, he must be democratic and universal. Literature of the right sort gives the expansion we all so much need. Writing of the wrong sort narrows, cramps and sectarianizes. The democratic literature is that which has stood the test of years and has appealed to the common life of humanity.

It gives vision and warms the heart to the race of men. The sorrow and the laughter in its books are those of the big brotherhood. Its faith is that of the great and good God. The minister who reads bad books, and by bad I mean little of soul, when there are so many good ones, will without the shadow of a doubt lose his soul in pitiable contraction. The religious newspaper may—if it is not guarded—prove a menace to the minister's soul. The note in it is often too ephemeral. Literature that builds strong must have the note of eternity. It must be deep calling unto deep. I would not say that Editor Morrison is too daring with his pen; but that he is not daring enough. He is not daring enough to believe the traditional—the faith of us all. The sweep of his pen often omits the truth that was before Darwin. I do not object that my friend, Editor Lappin, is too dogmatic; but that he is not dogmatic enough. He does not demand too much of faith; but far too little. I want him to believe in the unsectarian God that is mightily at work today, a God of wrath, if you please, who is going to surely shatter his enemies and firmly establish his kingdom of righteousness and of love. I want him to believe in the future, to see God in the deeper tendencies of today and to believe that there is yet light to break forth from his Christ's words. I want him to quarrel over the big wrongs, and there are plenty of them. Let's grow red in the face over the devil, not over one another.

Regulating the Editors.

I would have all editors true democrats, recognizing the sanctity of the single soul. They must not erect creeds as tests. The minister must be a free soul. He must not allow religious newspapers to become his priests. Editors may teach, but they must not be allowed to legislate or to offer our sacrifices. Seriously—all I am writing is serious—more seriously then, ministers should remember editors in their prayers—they are truly burdened. I wish that God would see his way clear to call them to be prophets.

We are a people of great conventions. We are red bloods. We love a crowd. We like addition and multiplication. Brass-band music is pleasant to our ears. All this is well. It speaks of youth and strength. We all worship at the shrine of our conventions. We bring to our great assemblies the offering of our statistics and orations. We do not always bring our meditations, our contritions, our sacrifices and our mighty deepening desires for the abiding things. I am pleading for the sanctity of the single soul. A missionary on a platform is quickening to an audience. But a soul in his closet forming the decision to be a missionary is what is inspiring to God. Anton Lang, on the stage, pleased thousands at Oberammergau. But it is Anton Lang at his daily task that we would like to know. Back of the show and glitter and crowds we would like to see his soul in the strength of the commonplace. Livingston surely must have felt what I am trying to express. His death must have been more glorious than his speeches or his triumphal tour. Dye in Africa is greater than Dye at home. The conventions therefore must not act as priests. Every soul must be his own priest. The minister's soul is not saved by great speeches but by the free communion with God, and the democratic service of man.

The Cup of Cold Water.

The cup of cold water, thank God, may be given by those who never attended a great convention.

The statistics of the Divine inflowing and outflowing never can be gathered. The most momentous event in our brotherhood this year may be the birth of a child—the child of some lonely mother's prayers. He may make and unmake conventions. I am not criticising conventions. They are fine. They are national church socials—and more. But I am pleading for the democracy of faith. The convention must not become priestly. The offering to its missionary altar must not be exalted in the minister's mind to at all compare with the offering upon his own heart altar. The minister must give an account of his deeds to a greater assize than our conventions. His offering must be more than money. God believes in his many ministers who are never called upon to make convention speeches, and these ministers must believe in Him.

A Minister Must Be Honest.

The minister to save his soul must be ruggedly honest. He must not make a careless offering to Jehovah. No blemished animal would the Lord accept. The sermon is the minister's weekly offering; it must be filled with the best blood of his soul; it must have upon it the sweat of work and the glory of vision. It too, must be democratic. It will contain tried truth. It comes not fresh from the seminary class room but fresh from the minister's soul and fresh from the ages. It is delivered for the first time, because it was born in the holy of holies of the minister's soul. The bare truth is old, but the story of the minister's soul is new. The minister in these days of the smattering-new and the rusty-old is in grave danger. The old that is repeated parrot-like and the new that is momentarily held, superficially examined and lightly proclaimed, are both damaging to the soul. The soul, not the mouth, must preach if either is to be saved. The minister may lose his soul in preaching either Franklin's sermons or Ames' "Psychology of Religious Experience." The truth in the minister is what is important. The sermon must be democratic, in that its content is of the people and for the people. Unsectarian truth is the preachable material. There is a depth in most men beneath the sectarian man. That depth is the preacher's field. There again the sermon must be for the many. In every church there is a small group of "cultured" people who are more or less cynical and snobbish, who are pleased with a sermon lacking religion. The preacher is frequently grievously tempted by this class. The lecture may be for the few, but the sermon is for the many.

The minister hears many voices today. There is no safety in their confusion. He must hear distinctly the eternal beneath them all. Balzac's surgeon scoffed at religion but went into the cathedral regularly to pray. The minister must know how to read the prayer beneath the scoffing. He is a doctor of souls; and must know well his art of spiritual diagnosis.

In every church there are people of great faith and spiritual discernment. The minister must possess his soul of the verities or these will go beyond him. The other day I was called to conduct the funeral of a child. How ugly death must be to a father and mother. The resurrection must be very real to them to rob death of its poignant sorrows. Funerals are common to us. Perhaps we grow perfunctory. After I had conducted the service the father of the child asked all present to kneel and he offered such a prayer as I had never heard. His faith was beautifully triumphant. His prayer will hearten me for many days. Even the undertaker was touched. Our faith is democratic, the faith of the people, and the true minister must observe God's stirrings among them. The people are emotional. The minister will do well not to become so "cultured" as to lose his deeper feelings—Browning is true to life when he so frequently puts in the mouth of imperfect common folk great sweeping and gripping truth. Every minister could well afford to make this quotation from "Paracelsus" a pastoral principle which if held to will lead him into salvation which is by love:

"To trace love's beginnings in mankind,
To know even hate is a mask of love's
To see a good in evil, and a hope
In ill success: to sympathize, be proud
Of man's half reasons, faint aspirings, dim
Struggles for truth, their poorest fallacies,
Their prejudice and fears and cares and doubts;
All with a touch of nobleness, despite
Their error, upward tending all, though weak,
Like plants in mines that never saw the sun,
But dream of him and guess where he may be,
And do their best to climb and get to him.
If I stoop
Into a dark tremendous sea of cloud
It is but for a time; I press God's lamp
Close to my breast; its spendor soon or late
Will pierce the gloom, I shall emerge one day."

To emerge is Salvation.

The Spirit—Not Yet!

A Sermon

BY G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D. D.

"The spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified."—John 7:39.

These words constitute the second part of the apostolic interpretation of the invitation which Jesus uttered on the last day of the great Feast of Tabernacles.

In many editions of the Authorized Version this verse is printed in parentheses. That was a very helpful arrangement, and we have lost something by the omission of those parentheses in the Revised Version, because the main story is taken up again at verse forty. Yet the verse is of supreme value, and of supreme value at that point of the narrative. These words were written long after Christ uttered the call in Jerusalem on the final day of that memorable feast of Tabernacles, and they constitute John's explanation of the meaning of what Christ there and then said.

John says of those words of Christ, "This spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed on him were to receive," that is, were about to receive, were presently to receive. Then he further explains the meaning of his own first declaration in the words of our text: "The Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified."

The Text Explained.

Tarrying for a moment longer with this technical examination of the placing of these words, and of the words themselves, I want to observe that the word "given" is an added word; it has no true place in the text; it is not to be found in any of the original manuscripts. I am not saying that it is inaccurate, for without it there would be a hiatus full of awkwardness. Some word is needed in order to make sense for the English reader. Yet as a matter of fact the statement as actually written by John is this, "The Spirit was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified"; or, if we may be a little more particular, "Spirit was not yet; because Jesus was not yet glorified," for there is no definite article before Spirit in the text itself. I am not saying that use of the article is inaccurate in translation. I am simply endeavoring to show the bluntness, and therefore the inclusiveness and remarkable forcefulness of this apostolic word of exposition. The whole force of the declaration is borne in upon our minds as we notice the repetition of the one phrase which at first hardly arrests our attention, "not yet." The Spirit not yet given; because Jesus not yet glorified. When we turn from the manuscripts to the translations we find that many words have been used by translators at that point. The Spirit was not yet bestowed, not yet outpoured, not yet manifest, not yet realized,

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN OF LONDON.

because Jesus was not yet glorified. All these really have underlying them the same thought, the same suggestion. That suggestion is that there was some sense in which the Spirit was not yet possessed, had not yet been received.

Emphasizes A Great Fact.

Among all these words I should personally retain the one we find in our translation, "The Spirit was not yet given." That emphasizes the fact that the age upon which men entered with the Pentecostal effusion, and in the midst of which we are living to-day, resulted from a gift of the Spirit made by God through the ministry of His Son. The word "received" would remind us rather of our relation thereto, a great and beautiful word, but I prefer that the emphasis should remain where it is placed by the use of this word "given." Thus the declaration is that there was a difference made, in the human experience of the Holy Spirit of God by Pentecost; that there is a difference most evidently between the relation of men to the Spirit of God before the mission of our Lord Jesus Christ and all these days that have followed thereupon. It is to that difference I desire to draw your attention in a brief meditation.

The Difference.

Let us begin with matters which do not seem to be related. I go back into the old economy, and there are three things stamped upon the pages; the fact of sin, the fact of sanctity, and the fact of service. I find the selfsame three things in the new economy; but mark the difference. In the Old Testament Scripture I find a cleansing from sin which is ceremonial, and prophetic, and full of hope. In the New Testament Scripture I find a cleansing from sin which is positive and dynamic and experimental; and the difference is the difference between the relation of the Spirit to the old age and the relation of the Spirit to the new age. I look back at the old dispensation and I see sanctity, the sanctification of a man, the sanctification of a nation, to the purposes of God; the setting apart of a people to his will. I find that sanctity in that old dispensation was the result of obedience to the Divine commandment; the words of the law were inscribed upon stone, external to humanity; upon which men might look, in order that they might endeavor to realize and obey. "The law was given by Moses." I come into the New Testament and I find sanctity no longer aimed at by the effort of individuals, but realized by the fellowship of those individuals in vital relationship with the Lord of all purity and all life, "grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." I am not now dealing with the question of eternal destiny; I am speaking of human experience in this world. Through all the past I see the highest, best, and holiest men having fellowship with the divine life; yet forevermore looking at the ideal external to themselves: and under the divine guidance attempting to obey, and wonderfully succeeding over and over again as well as disastrously failing.

The Fullness of the New.

I come into the new and find that there is no longer any need for ten words to be engraved on tables of stone that all may look at them, no need of any law outside, because men are brought into the experience of sanctity by fellowship with the indwelling Lord of law, the Master of purity; the incarnate one himself abiding in the life and producing the holiness after which he seeks. The difference is the difference between the dispensations with regard to the Spirit. I go back into the old economy and see men serving God, but the service is forevermore duty, every now and then the duty becoming transfigured with light and glory, and becoming a joy; but these are the mountain peaks of experience not often reached, and almost invariably reached when for some special purpose the Spirit of God had clothed himself with a man, for that is the word concerning Gideon, or clothed a man with himself—for that is the word concerning Joshua; for the Spirit of God did give men special wisdom for special work, "I have called by name Bezalel .. and I have filled him with the Spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship, to devise cunning works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass." There were mountain peaks when duty became delight, but the general impression of the service of the Old Testament is that of duty.

Duty Changed to Delight.

What is the general impression of the service of the New Testament? That it is no longer duty but delight. It is a very interesting thing that the New Testament has hardly anything to say about duty. How we glorify duty still and must for all such as lack the indwelling baptism of the Holy Spirit. When a man has found his way into this life he will say little of duty, he will say with his Lord and Master, "I delight to do Thy will, O my God." The service of the new economy is no longer the stern, honorable, beautiful path of duty at all cost; it is the path of perpetual joy and delight, a well-spring in the life bubbling up, laughing up into eternal life. The change is manifest if we take these broad outlooks.

Once again glance at this. The difference is that between an occasional coming and a perpetual residence. In the Old Testament the Spirit came to men occasionally, stayed for a period. According to the New Testament ideal, within the church of God the Spirit came to abide for ever. In the old dispensation the Spirit was granted to men for special ends, for the doing of particular work. In the new, the Spirit came to men for all life; not merely for the service of the first day of the week, this holy eucharist of worship, and joy of proclamation, but for all the days that run on after it, for which the forces of grace are most surely needed. The Spirit came to abide with men, that all their life might be made mighty, energized in his presence.

Said John, "The Spirit was not yet," and he did not mean that the Spirit was not yet known. It was known. I venture to suggest that we take the word which occurs at the end of the text, which may be applicable to both, and say: The Spirit was not yet glorified; because Jesus was not yet glorified. The Spirit was not yet glorified by being placed entirely, abidingly at the disposal of men, because Jesus was not yet glorified.

The Heart of the Consideration.

That brings us to the very heart of this consideration; and makes us inquire in what sense was it true that Jesus was not yet glorified, when he uttered that word? For Jesus was already glorified in some senses when He stood there in the midst of the multitudes. He was glorified as a Teacher. However much men were against him, the men of his own age did recognize the superiority, and in many cases the finality of his teaching. "Never man spake like this Man." Moreover, he was glorified as a Pattern. Men had already seen the exceeding beauty of his character, that character in which tenderness and thunder for ever merged, that character made up of all sweetness and all strength. He was glorified as a Teacher and as an Ideal, and therefore, in many cases, in the case of his own disciples known and unknown—and Christ had many secret disciples—in the case of all his disciples, he was glorified as Lord upon the basis of his perfect teaching, and his perfect pattern. Yet John says he was not yet glorified; there was yet incompleteness. He himself was straitened, and could not make himself understood even of his own disciples.

What happened then between the feast of Tabernacles when he said the words to which John is now referring, and that Feast of Pentecost when the rivers began to flow, and the light of the new day to shine and burn, and the throb and thrill of the new dynamic began to puisate through humanity.

Three Words.

The answer can be reverently given in three words which will convey all I need to say: The Cross, The Resurrection, The Ascension! The glorification of Jesus came by way of the Cross, and not by the Cross alone, but by the Cross as that which led to resurrection, and culminated in ascension. Glorify is the great word that John makes use of with reference to these final, mysterious, mighty facts in the mission of Jesus; the facts of the Cross, the Resurrection, and the Ascension. "The Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified."

The deduction becomes perfectly patent. The new age of the Spirit resulted from that work in the midst of the ages which we speak of as the Cross, the Resurrection and the Ascension of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. The Spirit came before, fitfully, occasionally for specific purposes, a visitor, a guest; he came beyond to abide; to abide in the church and in his people; and was poured out upon all flesh, to convict of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment. That greater age of the Spirit, the Pentecostal age, in which we were born, and in which we live, has resulted from the death and resurrection and ascension of our Lord.

Why Not Yet?

Now why is it that of very many it has to be said, Not yet? Because Jesus is not yet glorified in their life. That is the reason. By some he is wholly rejected. By others he is acknowledged King because of his ethical ideal and because of the beauty of his human life. So far have they come. So far had these disciples come before Pentecost. The attitude is intellectual, but not volitional; a sub-consciousness of the mind, but not a mastering passion. Not yet the Spirit, because not yet Jesus glorified.

How may we so glorify him as to enter into the fulness of the spiritual life? Nothing short of submission to his Cross and trust in his resurrection will ever bring men fulness of spiritual life. We may consent to the beauty of his ethic, we may admire the glory of his ideal and even may attempt to obey; but that which is the peculiar consciousness of Christian experience, the thrill and throb of inward certainty that laughs at all argument against the abiding knowledge of God and of his Son Jesus Christ; the glory transfiguring all the sackcloth, illuminating all the darkness, turning all the grey into purple, singing the anthem of the ages in the midst of the strife and turmoil of the little while, that never comes to a man save as he trusts in the Cross of the world's Redeemer and enters into life by way of the resurrection. Not yet the Spirit, because Jesus not yet glorified.

A Halted Process.

One further word. There are many who have seen this vision, who have been certain of their own deep consciousness of the abiding facts, who yet are saying, we have not yet the Spirit in fulness. Sin is forgiven, but it is dominant in our lives. We are sure we have been accepted, but we have no fellowship with God as the days go on. We are trying to work for God, but the work is drudgery, not delight. Such is the case of the preacher who sighs with relief when Sunday is over, and prays that the next may be postponed; such is the Sunday-school teacher who is always thankful when the afternoon is over, and feels it is hard work getting ready for the next. Thousands are speaking so, through lack of the fulness of the Spirit.

Where there is fulness of the Spirit, if a man is in the ministry of Christ and knows anything of the teaching of the Spirit, he would turn every day into a Sunday if he could only preach; he would linger on in the midst of the children for the very joy of speaking of eternal things.

Cancel the Word.

The last teaching of Jesus which Luke records is this, The Son of Man had to suffer, and die, and be raised. It was never until the disciples yielded to that, and in self-conscious weakness waited, at the end of their own wit and wisdom and power, until they were endued with power from on high.

Not yet the Spirit; then not yet is Jesus glorified. May God help us to cancel that last "Not yet"; and may he be glorified now by those who name his name, by those who have admired his teaching and pattern, but have never yet yielded in trustfulness to his Cross. Glorify him by crowning him there in the place of his Cross. We are not waiting for Pentecost. We are not waiting for the coming of the Spirit. To the river. Plunge in! Within the atmosphere. Breathe it! In the presence of the Host. Hand over all the keys to him!

A Prayer

Teach me, O Lord, thy holy way,
And give me an obedient mind;
That in thy service I may find
My soul's delight from day to day.

Help me, O Savivour, here to trace
The sacred footsteps thou hast trod;
And meekly walking with my God,
To grow in goodness, truth and grace.

Guard me, O Lord, that I may ne'er
Forsake the right, or do the wrong;
Against temptation make me strong,
And round me spread thy sheltering care.

Bless me in every task, O Lord,
Begun, continued, done for thee;
Fulfill thy perfect work in me;
And thine abounding grace afford.

—Wiliam T. Matson.

A rational imitation of Christ is not the conduct of a mimic or a puppet. It means what the imitation of other characters means —an influence of leadership, power, authority, example, applied to the conditions of one's own life. The traits in him which command appreciation are applied, not to suppress one's own character, but to enrich and enoble it.—Francis Greenwood Peabody.

The Practice of Christian Union

A Clean-cut, Earnest Message

BY CECIL J. ARMSTRONG.

[EDITORS NOTE: Something of a sensation was recently made in our brotherhood by the report that Rev. Cecil J. Armstrong had presented his resignation to his church in Troy, New York, where he had labored for five years, and accompanied it with a statement of certain progressive views which he held and which he felt his people ought frankly to be told. The feeling had been growing in Mr. Armstrong's soul, he told his congregation, that his own spiritual integrity demanded of him to express his convictions with greater freedom than he felt the continued pastoral relation there would allow. Since his resignation the assurances of the people he has served so ably have surprised him, great numbers begging him to remain as pastor and declaring that their hearts are needing just the kind of aggressive leadership he has resolved upon. Mr. Armstrong's acceptance of the call to the Union Church of Disciples and Baptists in Monroe, Wis., opens to him a field for the highest service. This church, like its new pastor, has a message to the community and to the Christian life of our time. We have asked Mr. Armstrong for an article on Christian Union and we are glad to give our readers his earnest and illuminating words.]

Ever since Paul protested against divisions in the Corinthian Church, efforts to heal the breaches in Christendom have been made. 'Tis true that apologists for a divided church have ever been to the front. But the seers and prophets of Christianity have labored, sacrificed and prayed for the fulfilment of Jesus' prayer. Especially in this age is it useless to argue the sin and waste of contending religious factions. That these are self-evident is proved by the trend of religious utterance, and most emphatically by the plea of the recent Edinburgh Conference.

Thus has Christian union long been preached. Today it is much nearer achievement than ever before. Still, it must be admitted, that Christian union has been more preached than practiced. We have all seen the beauty and power of a united church; most of us have hailed with joy any tokens of a growing nearness of Christian bodies; but comparatively few have had the courage to really practice Christian union. To practice Christian union means to surrender many a time-honored creed and tradition, and to sacrifice many an ecclesiastical form. It means to grip the essential and bid farewell to the non-essential. Comparatively few have had the courage to do that.

"Terms" of Unity.

The trouble has been the "terms" imposed as a condition of unity. The Pope of Rome extends his paternal arms to protestantism; "let us be one," says he; but his condition is that we all become Roman Catholics. The good Episcopal bishops cordially invite the churches to unite, but upon the recognition of "the historic episcopate"—in other words, that all become Episcopalians. There is not a denomination under heaven that does not advocate union, but each consciously or unconsciously, would compel uniformity to its creed.

Have the Disciples been any exception to this? More strenuously than others have they pleaded for Christian union. This has not been without effect. Now the day has come when Christian union is in the air. When asked for our proposed basis, what is the reply? "Upon the New Testament as the only rule of faith and practice." "Yes," replies the questioner, "we too stand for that. Let us unite." "No," we reply, "union can only be achieved by an acceptance of a certain interpretation of the New Testament." And the questioner goes away wondering why his interpretation is not as good as ours. Have not the Disciples demanded that all shall come to them? What else meaneth our terms of union? Have not the Disciples said: "We will not unite unless our interpretation of the New Testament is accepted by all." "But our interpretation is the correct one," cries an enthusiastic Disciple. Well, that is exactly the contention of every denomination. The church will remain divided so long as the Disciples, or any other denomination, conditions unity upon "our interpretation."

Futility of Dogma.

This shows the futility of dogma as a basis of unity. Churches will no more unite upon immersion-dogma than upon free-will or predestination. Greek lexicons, canons of interpretation, and proof texts will never heal the sundered parts of Christendom. To the end of time men will be free-willists, determinists, universalists and affusionists. Till Gabriel sounds his trumpet men will differ as to the best form of church government. There will be a united church, but it will be a unity with great diversity of doctrinal and ecclesiastical beliefs.

REV. CECIL J. ARMSTRONG.

But Christian union is and can be practiced. If the perpetuity of democracy depends upon a nation's practicing democracy, the achievement of unity depends upon the church's practicing of union. The first essential is to realize and recognize that the only basis for unity is devotion to the personal Christ and his ideals. All other bases are futile and vain—yea, are divisive. Herein lies the rock that might wreck the Disciples of Christ. A continued emphasis upon what we have been pleased to call "first principles" (although there is only one "first principle," namely, Christ) would cause us to degenerate into a mere sect—propagandists without a message to the age. We are pleading for a doctrinal basis. Such a plea becomes divisive.

Personal Devotion to Christ.

If personal devotion to the personal Christ and his ideals is made the basis of our plea then union is certain. That puts aside all doctrinal and creedal differences. It is the fulfiling of the motto: "In matters of faith unity, of opinion liberty, and in all things charity." It bids one and all "come." There is no pretension of superiority. It proclaims "all we are brethren—come, let us recognize our brotherhood."

In some communities churches have gone past federation and coöperation to real and lasting union. In how many places, think you, if the theologians would keep their hands off, would churches remain apart if such a basis were proposed to them? Just now it is customary for immersionist churches to unite. Yet the real standard around which intelligent immersionists gather is not immersion but devotion to Christ. The union of immersionists is but a step—the logic is irresistible. The next step (and it is at hand) is the union of immersionists and affusionists. The one is no more devoted to Jesus and his ideals than the other. Why should they not be one? If ever the universal church becomes immersionist it will not be because of argument or lexicon, nor because immersion was an apostolic practice. The history of the baptismal controversy proves that. It will be because the church finds immersion to be of more symbolic value than affusion. Such a result cannot be achieved until immersion is lifted out of the realm of controversy.

This presents to the Disciples their opportunity and responsibility. Let them put aside "our plea," "our interpretation," and present to their communities the one foundation, Jesus Christ and his ideals. What will be the result? In many cases the churches will not at first be prepared to answer the call. In a multitude of places the rank and file (theologians, of course, excepted) will gladly answer it and practice Christian union. Thus shall the Disciples fulfil their historic purpose. By the practice of Christian union shall we lose our life to find it in the lasting unity of the church universal.

Monroe, Wis. Union Church in Christ.

A movement to make the Protestant Episcopal church in the diocese of Milwaukee a recognized factor in future legislation on matters pertaining to civic welfare by constituting the new social service commission of the diocese a permanent body and authorizing it to examine, in behalf of the church, any bills prepared for presentation to the legislature wherein matters pertaining to the general welfare of society are involved, was inaugurated in the diocesan council last week by the presentation of resolutions embodying these points by the social service commission at the end of its annual report. The report sets forth that the first essential of the immediate future, from an economic standpoint, is the restoration of a due balance between income and the cost of living.

Our Readers' Opinions

"Interpretation Running Wild" Again

Editors Christian Century: Referring to the publication under the above heading of my criticism of your reply to Mr. Cleaver's question, I simply desire to say that I am quite content to leave to the readers of the Christian Century whether my interpretation of your statement actually runs wild, and if my conclusions, drawn from your utterance, are warranted. It is well known that the Disciples throughout their whole history have taught and practiced immersion only as baptism and have refused and do now refuse church membership except to the immersed. By "fullest fellowship," I supposed you meant church membership, as that was the only matter involved in Mr. Cleaver's question. If this is what you meant, and to refuse it is sectarian, then the Disciples are sectarian and "narrower in their basis of union than the Church of Christ."

The editorial note appended to my article is sufficiently "safe and sane" in so far as it relates to what the Christian Century believes. I had no intention of reading into your paragraph what it did not contain, nor do I believe that this has been done. My difficulty now is to reconcile your present position with that assumed in your answer to Mr. Cleaver's question. But we can afford to let that go. You have made a very good and very satisfying "confession!" For my life I cannot square what you say in your issue of October 6 with what you say in your issue of May 12, but the last word will be accepted as your more mature judgment—and so we are all in Topeka and all together!

What Can the Men Not Do

An editorial in The Christian Century for September 22, throws out a few sparks anent the Brotherhood. It begins with some slight strictures upon the good humor reigning around a certain banquet board. The lightness of the after-dinner speeches, following so hard upon some vigorous interchanges in the afternoon, seems to the editor to be out of keeping with the seriousness of the Brotherhood's great purpose and great future. Possibly the good natured speakers considered that a banquet furnished the scriptural opportune time for mirth. At any rate, they attempted to rouse a few risibilities, though some of the jokes were old enough to be serious, goodness knows!

However, lest a worse criticism befall us, one serious thing came out of it all. The editor was seriously impressed with the need of an objective in the Brotherhood. He has propounded a most weighty and pertinent question. He has also voiced the thoughts of many earnest ministers and laymen. Possibly, too, the leaders of the movement have spent several sleepless nights over the same problem. What is the Brotherhood for? What is it going to do? How is it going to put its members to work? All these are forms of the same insistent question.

To my mind, the editor has come to the heart of the Brotherhood's problem. He has stated it with clearness and vigor and has demanded the serious consideration of it. In all this he has done well and nobody will welcome what he has said more earnestly than the friends of the movement.

First, however, it ought to be noted that his strictures are no more criticisms upon the Brotherhood than upon the Disciple church, or any other church. The very fact that the question, "What shall be done with this body of men?" is asked at all is a commentary upon the institution founded first by men and whose business for the last two millenniums has been supposed to be to work out just this problem. It is just as pertinent to ask the whole church "What is the church going to do with its men?"

In fact it is a little more pertinent to the Disciple church. For it was the Disciple church, in convention assembled, which organized the Brotherhood and presumably for a purpose. If there was no purpose in the organization it certainly can be no more culpable in the Brotherhood than in any other being born without consultation. Its immediate adoption of a motto, "All the men at all the church's work" would seem to palliate its first prenatal offense, if there was any.

The statement of the purpose does not seem satisfactory. It does not express what so many seem anxious to have. The editor suggests a more definite programme. He thinks that, first, the church lacks spirituality; second, spiritual leadership; third, the men are to blame for this. It can be remedied by the men's doing the mechanical part of the church's activities and so making the minister the spiritual leader he ought to be.

Such a suggestion is in every way splendid. It is clear, clean-cut and appears practical. It will prove a boon to the movement, for it will reach many men who are thinking earnestly about the matter. It does The Christian Century credit to express it.

Several comments might be made upon it. First, it is in no wise the Brotherhood's fault that church conditions are as they are. The editor does not say it is, but taken out of connection, or in connection, with some previous remarks, some readers might hastily think it was. Second, the Brotherhood, through its special and regular secretaries, has made this programme its preachment par excellence. From Dan to Beersheeba, more than one orator has burnt out the firebrick lining of his throat crying the message of a redeemed and consecrated ministry. Some have gone through the fires of newspaper notoriety, and some have suffered even the keener torments of sisterly disaffection over this same plea. Therefore, the Brotherhood says the message of the editor is a brave message. It sounds good to the ear to have somebody else say it and say it better than it has been said before and to a larger audience.

Further, good as this message is as delivered from the flowing pen of the writer, it has its limitations. It offers but a partial and inadequate vision. It sounds as if the editor had something further to say. Possibly space forbade further elaboration. At any rate the Brotherhood has not only preached a fuller vision, but local Brotherhoods have actually put some phases of it into practice.

The Brotherhood early recognized that there is not enough work in the church to employ all the men the church now has. All the men cannot work at all the so-called church's work for there is not enough work to go round. That is, as the "church's work" is now conceived. Therefore, the wording of the motto was left open so as always to be large enough to encompass any expansion of the vision in the future. Therefore, when the Brotherhood at Elkhart, Indiana, appointed a committee to inspect politicians' pedigrees, it was looked upon as legitimate church work. When fifty deputy sheriffs from Brotherhoods carried out cases of liquor from illicit establishments, that was counted church work to the glory of God. Many other new deeds might be noted. So in the future, the motto will always be inclusive enough to furnish inspiration to any activities of men for the Kingdom of God.

The best answer to the question, "What shall the Brotherhood do with its men," may be tentatively accepted as the duty of teaching the church a new definition of its work: Release the minister from material worries. Build up the spirituality of the church. These are splendid objectives. But beyond these let the Brotherhood redefine the church's work in terms so great, so extensive, so progressive, so practical, so heroic that men will enlist in her enterprises everywhere. Begin with the babies. See that they are better born and better reared. Help the children. Put Christian men on school-boards. Eliminate the foolish and wasteful studies; put in the useful and enjoyable studies; equip school-houses with baths, gymnasium, manual training apparatus; the school-yards with play and nature study material. Elect Christian men to public office, clean the streets, tear down the shacks, open air spaces, build bath-houses and turn the city into a place fit for children to grow up in. Make mechanics more skilled, more sober, more thrifty; make clerks more independent; fathers more than money-supplying machines and mothers more in love with motherhood. Do these things as well as the things already so well done.

This has been the plea of the Brotherhood. The Christian Men gives incidents monthly of some steps toward it. The editor's notes did not seem to recognize this sufficiently, and therefore this is offered as supplementing the good things he said and offsetting some criticisms in the minds of some men who do not yet realize what has been said and done. ARTHUR HOLMES.

The Man Problem

Editors the Christian Century: Your recent editorial upon "What Can the Men Do?" touches the root of one of the most difficult problems given man to solve. Two facts stand in great clearness when moral welfare is under consideration. One that salvation depends upon work. The other that the work in hand shall be of the highest possible moment. That which imparts character to work is its aim. The justification of the angel's task of sweeping the street crossing is the justification of the task of the angel administering an empire, viz.: the working out of God's good will on the earth. God's will is that man shall be permanently happy. To achieve this state is the work both of men and of angels.

What services will minister to human happiness?

True education will so minister. Education of both heart and mind, of body and brain. Then how fine it would be if brotherhoods would take up various phases of such activities, inquiring as to what forms of education are good, promoting libraries and selections of good books, promoting reading rooms, promoting lecture courses, purifying places given over to moving pictures, recognizing what a fine instrument this is and what possibilities it contains.

Purity in political life will so minister. How fine then it would be and how worthy of a man's effort, if our brotherhood through proper committees would institute searching inquiries as to political conditions to know who are good men and who are evil and to scrutinize narrowly proposed legislation to know in whose interests it is being offered,

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

(Chapter XXI—Continued.)

"James Douglas is not a man to accuse even an enemy of wrong doing without sufficient cause. But you are right Jeanie. Mother, we must keep the contents of James' letter from everyone, even from Mr. Sinclair, till I get back from Oban. If I start at once—"

"It is useless my son, to start tonight. You will really lose little time by waiting for the first train in the morning."

"I can't wait mother. I must go on at once. As James says, I am suffocating with anxiety. It will be easier to bear when I find myself on the road. There is a train in half an hour."

"But James told you to bring the cheque, Donald. You can't get it till father comes. Oh, must the whole terrible thing be brought up again?" Jeanie scarcely knew what she was saying. Donald flew into a passion.

"I suppose you would rather see me lie under it Jeanie. It would be enough for you if you were his wife."

"Donald, Donald forgive me. I would do anything to clear you from suspicion. But I can't believe that Archie is guilty. He could not be so vile."

"Hush, my children, and be calm and patient. It will all come out. I knew it would from the first. A mother's prayers work more miracles than the world knows of. But God forbid we should lay an accusation on another, no matter who, without due proof. He is near of kin to all of us, my children."

"If James has got evidence against cousin Archie, we'll all be sorry mother," said Donald.

"But do you know I can never trust him since the accident. I am sure Mr. Sinclair blames him, too. He never even mentions his name. You know Jeanie, that you thought he wanted to injure Mr. Sinclair. You told me so at the time."

"I know it. I know it perfectly well. But Archie has declared so solemnly that it was a pure accident, and he has been so sorry about it, that I could not have the heart to doubt him."

"Don't distress your father by letting him know what James wants to see you about, Donald. He has enough to bother him. And I think uncertainty is more trying to us who are growing up in years, than you young people can understand. I am sore puzzled to know why he did not come to see me when he came back from John M'Kitridge, instead of going away again to the Manse."

Donald forgot his eagerness to be off to Oban. In quiet, steady tones he said slowly:

"I know why, mother."

"Tell us Donald. Was his mission a failure? Did the wretched man scorn his message and his proffered friendship?"

"No mother. That good woman's death has done what her life failed to do. It has softened his heart. He is anxious to make restitution for the wrongs he has done, especially to me and father."

"I know he hated your father for years, Donald. But you never offended him. And how could he injure you?"

"He tried to injure father through me, mother. He succeeded but too well—as Jeanie knows. Yes, Jeanie, John M'Kitridge was the man whom I told you of." She nodded, while her mother inquired anxiously.

"Are you going to tell me everything at last my son?"

He began at the beginning and left nothing untold. He reminded her of his desire to emigrate. It was simply to get away from the clutches of the man who, by false friendship had led him on to ruin. He would have told her and his father all the truth long ago, had he not feared that it would break their hearts to know how he had fallen into evil company even for a time. He told them how Elsie's mother had sent him home strong enough to make a clean breast of it. He told them of how he had met his father going to the man who had led him downward; how he had begged his father to hear his confession, and how he had told him to wait until he had first gone to be reconciled to his enemy. They listened in wonder as they heard how John M'Kitridge had broken down under his old master's kindness, and had confessed his own wrong doing. When Donald mentioned having been drugged, Mrs. Graeme threw her arms around him as she exclaimed joyously:

"My bairn, my bairn, I aye knew you were true at heart."

"Your faith in me and, and Elsie's, saved me from despair."

"Donald, I was hard on you. But I always feared you might have spent more than you told me of and thus been tempted."

"I don't blame you Jeanie. But if you had told me where you got the money for me, at least I would have been in a position to deny all knowledge of the forged cheque. All my hesitation and stammering was through fear that you had done it for me."

"I know now Donald. But I did not like to tell even you, that I went to Mr. Sinclair." The color suffused her face as she spoke.

"Well, Jeanie, you will be glad to know that we can both go to him this evening and thank him for his goodness. Look at this." And he placed the two fifty pound notes in her trembling hand.

CHAPTER XXII.

A Wounded Spirit.

The minister sat in his study chair wrapt in gloomy thought. Mrs. Johnston, his old housekeeper, turned on the gas, poked the fire and put on more coal, but he took no notice. She glanced at him hiddenly, out of her kindly blue eyes as she turned the gas-brackets to the angles he liked best for reading, but he gave no word of thanks, as was his custom. She lingered, for excuse, re-arranging books and papers on the table beside him. All her little devices were useless. He did not seem aware of her presence. She had been his faithful servant for ten years, and never had she seen before that hopeless look on his face. It was the first day since his return to the Manse that no one had called. Many a time during the past two weeks, Mrs. Johnston had grumbled to herself that his friends gave him no rest with their well meant visits. But now she longed for some one to come, who would rouse him from the dark brooding, which seemed to be crushing all the brightness out of his, so lately, happy spirit. At last, after waiting in vain for her master to speak, the kind old body ventured to say timidly:

"I'm just hame frae Brigend the noo, maister."

Mr. Sinclair moved wearily in his chair and his face lost none of its moodiness as he replied:

"Oh, were you in the village? A cold evening for you to go out, Mrs. Johnston."

"No sae cauld outside as it is inside, sir."

"What has gone wrong now, Mrs. Johnston?"

"Everything's wrang, sir, when the brightness has gone oot o' the meenister's face."

"Can you wonder that I'm bloomy betimes—thinking of this?" He looked at the empty sleeve.

"It's bad enough, maister, that you hae lost a guid airm. It would be waur if you forget that the airm o' the Almighty is not shortened."

"Thank you, thank you, Mrs. Johnston—that would be worse indeed. But I shall never forget that. The earthly joy that, perhaps, is lost to me can be made up in higher service. You are right—quite right. The minister's face should never lose its brightness." He smiled as he spoke with something of the old sweetness that had been his before the blow fell. The good soul beamed with delight to see her beloved master like himself once again. Encouraged by his words and manner, she ventured further counsel and information:

"An' you'll need your bright face, maister, if you're to bring the light o' hope into the life o' some o' your freends—I'm sair feart there's something wrang at Hopefield. Maister Donald awa efter Jamie Douglas to Oban, an' Miss Jeanie's going aboot the hoose as white as a sheet—so Sarah telt me when I was in awhile syne." Mr. Sinclair leaned forward eagerly in his chair.

"Donald gone to Oban? I hope James is not ill again."

"Jamie's not ill, sir. A letter frae him says he's getting on fine, an' he'll soon be back at his wark. An' seeing Jamie's no needing him, I think Maister Donald might ha' stayed at hame. It's fair cruel tae leave Miss Jeanie sae muckle alone as she is." The light died out of her listener's eyes.

"Is Miss Jeanie ill, Mrs. Johnston?"

"Ill enough, sir, when she's breaking her hert aboot something—be it what it will."

He smiled. "I'm afraid Sarah's a bit of a gossip."

"An' I'm no one tae listen tae gossip, maister. But I hae eyes in my ain heid. The bonnie lassie's jist a ghaist o' what she was and the eyes o' her wad break your hert."

Mrs. Johnston mixed the Highland tongue of her childhood with the Lowland of the rest of her life very pathetically. Mr. Sinclair remained silent for a few moments. Then he said gravely:

"Think of the months of weariness they had, sick-nursing—James Douglas and me—it was quite enough to wear her to a shadow."

"Bodily fatigue slithers over a lassie o' nineteen like water frae a duck's back. But when the hert's sair it's a different maitter. She's no' been hersel' since—since the accident, maister."

His face crimsoned—

"It was a terrible shock to all my friends, Mrs. Johnston."

"Nae doubt. But there's another thing Sarah has telt me—Mr.—God forgie me, I canna bring mysel' to mention his name—the man wi' the motor car has na once been in Brigend since the accident. Surely Miss Jeanie wud na be grievin' hersel' about the likes o' him? He's naething but a diel-may-care wastrel!" Mr. Sinclair leaned back in his deep armchair wearily. He lifted his thin, white hand to shade his eyes from the glow of the gas light. He paused before answering the old woman's wrathful words. Then with a half-suppressed sigh, he replied:

Never gettin' any rest,
  Allus on the run!
Have to keep in trainin'
  For a promenade
From something less than zero
  To a hundred in the shade!
You're one of those companions
  Who think it's up to you

The Boys and the Bees

Many, many years ago the people in Germany lived in little towns with high walls around them. They built walls around their towns because they had quarrels with other towns. The walls protected them against their enemies.

Sometimes people kept beehives on the high walls. The bees would fly away into the fields outside and gather honey. There were not many flowers inside the city to get honey from.

One morning two baker boys were hungry. They had to get up very early. Some fine rolls had just been taken from the oven. The boys thought it would be fine to have some rolls and honey.

Let us go up on the walls and get some honey out of one of the hives," said John.

"But the bees will sting us," answered James. "Besides, the watchman on the walls might see us. Then we would be in trouble of another kind."

John, however, persuaded James to go. The two boys stole out of the shop, and ran across the street.

In a few minutes they were creeping up the stairs that led to the top of the wall.

There was no watchman to be seen. He had gotten sleepy probably, and had gone somewhere to sleep. But there was a noise coming from somewhere.

The boys listened, but all was quiet again. They made their way quietly along the wall till they came to the hives.

Then they covered their faces and got ready to rob the bees of their treasure. John was just lifting the top from one of the hives, when he heard another strange noise. He dropped the hive hurriedly.

The noise seemed to come from outside of the wall. The boys looked over, and saw a small army. It was the people of Linz, who had come to attack the town.

Both boys were terribly frightened at first. They saw, however, that something must be done to save the town.

"James," said John, "you run yonder and ring the bell. I will tumble the beehives down on their heads."

James did as he was told. John pushed a hive over the wall It fell on the leader's head, and went to pieces The bees were angry at being disturbed in this way. They flew at the men and stung their hands and faces, so that they were glad to run away.

Another beehive came tumbling down and then another. And the angry bees put the whole army to flight.

By this time the bell had called the people out to defend the town. But the army had already departed. The two boys and the bees had saved the town.

The boys were not punished. Instead, the people praised them for their wise acts. It was decided to erect a monument in their honor.

One of the boys afterward became mayor of the city. The other was long known as the most famous baker of his time.—A Rhine Legend, from "Child Lore."

Dot's World

BY L. M. MONTGOMERY.

"Oh, dear me!" said Dot, crossly, "this is a horrid old world. It's the very worst world ever was!"

Aunt Meg smiled.

"I've been thinking it was a real nice world, Dot. What is the matter with it?"

"It rained all the morning," said Dot, "and I couldn't go down to play with Nellie; and I've nuffin to do, and I'm tired of all my books and games. Nobody pays any 'tention to me, and it's a horrid old world."

Aunt Meg laid down her work and looked seriously at seven-year-old Dot. Dot liked to have people look seriously at her; it made her feel so nice and grown up.

"I don't really think it's a horrid world, Dot," she said. "It is just the kind of world we make it. Would you like a recipe for making it a nice world?"

"'Course I would," said Dot, promptly.

"Then," said Aunt Meg, decidedly, "you must go and do things for other people."

"What things?" asked Dot, opening her eyes.

"Oh, I can't tell you that. You must find out what things for yourself."

"Are you in earnest?" demanded Dot.

"Indeed I am. Just try my recipe. You'll see that it will change your opinion about the world."

Privately Dot didn't believe that it would. She wasn't at all sure she knew just what Aunt Meg meant, but she thought it over carefully as she went downstairs.

In the sitting room she saw grandma getting ready to wind a skein of yarn over two chairs. Dot knew it made grandma's arms and rheumatic fingers ache to wind yarn; but Dot didn't like it either, and she was just slipping out when she thought of what Aunt Meg had said. Was this what she meant!

"Grandma, I'll wind your yarn for you," she said.

And wind it she did. When it was done grandma gave her a kiss and a pineapple drop.

"I'm ever so much obliged to you, dearie. You're a thoughtful girl."

Dot slipped out to the kitchen, and there was Nora getting ready to bake a cake.

"Can't I seed those raisins for you, Nora?" she said.

"Shure, and it's meself that'll be obliged to yez if yez will," said Nora, heartily. "I've got forty other things to do. If ye'll seed the raisins for me, I'll bake yez two little pattypans out of the cake fer your doll house."

"Where is Ethel?" said mamma, coming into the kitchen when the raisins were done. "I want her to amuse Bobby while I stitch up her shirt waist."

"Ethel is busy doing arithmetic for Monday," said Dot. "I'll play with Bobby, mamma."

So for an hour Dot played woolly bear and building house with two-year-old Bobby.

"That's my little woman," said mamma.

When Bobby fell asleep, six-year-old Teddy strayed in with tears on his face.

"I tan't learn my letters," he sobbed.

"Oh, yes, you can," said Dot, brightly. "I'll help you. Come along we'll go up to the hall window seat and find out all about them."

In half an hour's time Teddy had got his alphabet so well straightened out that he knew every letter in it. Then Dot ran down to the Corners and did an errand for Ethel, for the rain had stopped and the sun was shining gloriously. The flowers in Dot's garden plot were all wide open and fresh when she came back.

"I b'lieve I'll pick a bunch and take them down to old Mrs. Brown," said Dot to herself. "I know she likes flowers, and she hasn't any."

"Bless your little heart, dearie!" said Mrs. Brown, as she took the big, sweet bouquet of blossoms. "It's a sweet thing of you to think of bringing me such lovely flowers. I've been wishing for some all day. And you're like a flower yourself, pet."

That evening Aunt Meg came into the little white bed room where Dot had just gone to bed.

"Well, Dot, what do you think of the world now?" she asked, merrily.

"It's a nice, splendid world," said Dot. "I'm ever so much obliged to you for your recipe, Aunt Meg, and I'm going to use it every day."—Zion's Herald.

The Baby

He is so little to be so loved!
He came unbooted, ungarbed, ungloved,
  Naked and shameless,
  Beggared and blameless,
And for all he could tell us, even nameless,
Yet every one in the house bows down
As if the mendicant wore a crown.

He is so little to be so loud!
Oh, I own I should be wondrous proud
  If I had a tongue
  All swiveled and swung,
With a double-back action twin-screw lung
Which brought me victual and keep and care,
Whenever I shook the surrounding air.

He is so little to be so large!
Why, a train of cars or a whaleback barge
  Couldn't carry freight
  Of the monstrous weight
Of all his qualities good and great.
And, though one view is as good as another,
Don't take my word for it—ask his mother.

Theme for the Day—Love's Endurance.

Scripture—Love never faileth, 1 Cor. 13:8. And now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; and the greatest of these is love, 1 Cor. 13:13.

There is a life that remains ever young
All through the day, all through the day,
Singing at evening the song it has sung
All through the length of the day;
Love is the glory that never grows old,
Telling the story a hundred times told,
Keeping it light where the shadows have rolled,
All through the length of the day.
—George Matheson ("What Never Grows Old").

Prayer—Our heavenly Father, out of the hatreds and suspicions of the past our Saviour has brought us the news of the love that never fails. We rejoice in that message of his, and we covet for ourselves the spirit of good will and love which shall not be defeated by misfortune nor overthrown by any form of difficulty. We thank Thee for this holy day and the privileges of Thy house. May we worship as those who have tasted of the good things of the kingdom of God and the powers of the world to come. Grant us thy blessing for our Saviour's sake. Amen.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 17.

Theme for the Day—Water from the Eternal Rock.

Scripture—The Lord thy God . . . who brought thee forth water out of the rock of flint. Deut. 8:14, 15.

For they drank of a spiritual rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ, 2 Cor. 10:4.

O living will that shalt endure
When all that seems shall suffer shock,
Rise in the spiritual rock,
Flow through our deeds and make them pure.
—Alfred Tennyson ("In Memoriam").

Prayer—Our Father, we are often thirsty in a dry and barren land where no water is. All our springs are in Thee. Thou hast been to us in days gone by as rivers of water in a dry place and as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. Lead us to the rock that is higher than we. May the streams of refreshment and renewal flow out for our thirsty souls. May we look to the Christ, our Master and Savior, for comfort and guidance, and may we find at length rest and contentment in the holy place of God, toward which we make our journey. Amen.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 18.

Theme for the Day—The Vision of Paradise Regained.

Scripture—And he placed at the east of the garden of Eden the Cherubim, and the flame of a sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life, Gen. 3:24.

And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel, Gen. 3:15.

Still before Eden waves the fiery sword,
Her Tree of Life unransomed: whose sad Tree
Of Knowledge yet to growth of Calvary
Must yield its Tempter,—Hell the earliest dead
Of Earth resign,—and yet, O Son and Lord,
The seed o' the woman bruise the serpent's head.
—D. G. Rosetti ("The Holy Family").

Prayer—Gracious God, we praise Thee that out of the disaster which has been wrought in the world by selfish and willful deeds Thou hast caused the light to shine from the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. We praise Thee for the wonders of that victory which righteousness is slowly gaining over the forces of evil. Teach us, we pray Thee, that the blessing of Thy presence can only be worthily obtained through struggle and cleansing. Aid us to accomplish in the strength of our Master the conquest of evil, that in us afresh the seed of the woman may bruise the serpent's head. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 19.

Theme for the Day—Master and Servant.

Scripture—A disciple is not above his master, nor a servant above his lord. It is enough for the disciple that he be as his master, and the servant as his lord. If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them of his household, Matt. 10:24, 25.

Yet it was well, and Thou hast said in season
"As is the master shall the servant be":
Let me not subtly slide into the treason,
Seeking an honour which they gave not Thee;

Never at even, pillowed on a pleasure,
Sleep with the wings of aspiration furled,
Hide the last mite of the forbidden treasure,
Keep for my joys a world within the world.
—F. W. H. Myers ("Saint Paul").

Prayer—Father of mercies, we adore Thee for the fulness of Thy love manifested in the life and death of Jesus. We would not pass through the estate of disciples without the spirit which enables us to bear hardship as those who are called by his name. May we covet no easy and profitless life, but rather one of good service for Him whom we follow. Save us, we pray Thee, from low ambitions and easily fulfilled desires. Make us to be content only with that which is best, and so may we attain the place of children of God, through the grace of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 20.

Theme for the Day—The Heavenly Life and the Birth of the Spirit.

Scripture—To depart and be with Christ, Phil. 1:23.

The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the voice thereof, but knowest not whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit, John 3:8.

Dead, and no note in heaven,
Nor a gleam of white wings given,
To mark her way!
And my heart went up in the cry,
"How did the swift soul fly?
What life inherit?"
Then the wind blew sweet and was gone,
And a voice said, "So is one Born of the Spirit."
—Edna Dean Proctor ("Born of the Spirit").

Prayer—Dear Father, we thank Thee for the confidence that comes to us through the gospel of Christ that those whom we have loved and lost awhile have entered into the life that is life indeed. Their departure has filled us with longing and bereavement, yet we do not count them as lost. Rather would we be confident that they have been born into the new and larger estate of the redeemed in Thy presence. In them the mystery of spiritual birth has been revealed. Help us, we beseech Thee, to claim for ourselves this confident faith, and the hope that we ere long may enter with them into life. We pray in the name of Christ. Amen.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 21.

Theme for the Day—The Deepening of Autumn.

Scripture—And the clouds return after the rain, Ecc. 12:2.

These are the days when the birds come back,
A very few, a bird or two,
To take a backward look.
These are the days when skies put on
The old, old sophistries of June,
A blue and gold mistake.
—Emily Dickinson ("Indian Summer").

Prayer—O Thou, who hast given us this fair world in which to dwell, we bless Thee for its beauty and its adaptation to our needs. We thank Thee for the maturing season with its fruits, which speak of the blessings of God. Teach us the lesson, our Father, that all the experiences of the year are necessary to the welfare of mankind, and that not less needful are the various incidents of joy and sorrow that befall us on the highway of our lives. Help us in gratitude and good courage to persevere to the end. In the name of Christ Jesus, our Lord. Amen.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22.

Theme for the Day—Increasing Day.

Scripture—Moreover, the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven days, in the day that Jehovah bindeth up the hurt of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound, Isa. 30:26.

It's wiser being good than bad;
It's safer being meek than fierce:
It's fitter being sane than mad.
My own hope is, a sun will pierce
The thickest cloud earth ever stretched:
That, after Last, returns the First,
Though a wide compass round be fetched;
That what began best, can't end worst,
Nor what God blessed once, prove accurst.
—Robert Browning ("Apparent Failure").

Prayer—Our Father in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Through another week Thou hast brought us in safety, and we acknowledge before Thee our gratitude for all Thy goodness. Give to us faith in the future. Help us to believe that the best of life is yet to be. Say we see Thy purposes in all events. May the lessons of the past bring to us wisdom and assurance, and may our lives become increasingly useful and happy under Thy gracious blessing. We pray in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

You will fine the greatest possible help in studying the character of Christ—not your own. I believe that is when we are most occupied with Christ that we are most useful to others, however unconscious we may be of it and however conscious of our unlikeness to him.—A. L. Newton.

AT THE CHURCH

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

Closing Days*

The review lessons of the present year come at somewhat irregular intervals. The one which covered the lessons of the spring was really Number 2 of the summer series, and now the one which reviews the lessons of the summer and early autumn is Lesson 4 of the final quarter.

It is perhaps possible to divide the lessons of this quarter into three somewhat irregular sections: those which deal with the important events of the final month, those which relate the parables of this period, and those in which some of the minor, though interesting, incidents of Jesus' ministry are considered.

The Great Events.

There are four events that stand out much more prominently than the others in this series of lessons. They are Peter's Confession, The Transfiguration, The Entry Into Jerusalem, and The Day of the Great Controversies. These are lessons 3, 4, 9, and 12 of the present series.

Peter's Confession marked the culminating point of the teaching of Jesus. It was a sort of examination at the end of the course through which he had brought the disciples. It was to determine whether or not they understood sufficiently the nature of his life and message to be trusted after his departure. The assurance which Peter gave left no doubt that they understood. The outspoken utterance of this practical disciple made it clear that if he comprehended, surely the others would not fail to see the meaning of Christ's life. And the joy of the Saviour at this discovery voiced itself in its words of blessing.

The Transfiguration was a sort of sequel to Peter's Confession, for that public utterance had been almost immediately followed by our Lord's warning to the disciples that he was presently to terminate his work at Jerusalem amid suffering that seemed wholly inconsistent with their idea of his dignity and power. When Jesus thus set himself to the ministry of humiliation and sacrifice, his glory could not be longer obscured. The disciples then saw him manifested in a new splendor. Hitherto they had beheld in him their friend and leader. Now, on the lonely mountain sides of Hermon, they saw him as the self-devoted Master becoming a servant, and thus revealing all the glory of that divine life which it was his task to interpret. Though they did not understand at the time, later years brought to their minds the real significance of the transfiguration scene, and they were sure that they had not followed cunningly devised fables when they made known the power and the presence of the Lord eJsus Christ (2 Peter 1:16-18.)

The Triumphal Entry.

The third event of striking interest is the entry of Jesus into the Holy City. It was the one moment in his busy and self-denying life when he gave himself with perfect good will to the rejoicing enthusiasm of the people. There was in this act the double purpose of responding, if even but a moment, to the desire of his friends that he should act the part of their much desired and long awaited King. But there was as well the purpose on his part to disabuse their minds of any such false conception of his real nature by the fact that when all things were actually within his grasp, he turned aside from this political and worldly ambition to face humiliation, death, and apparent failure. The fact that Jesus should have allowed himself to be escorted into the Holy City in this manner is not without its perplexities in view of his habitual retirement and unworldliness, but perhaps the easiest explanation is that which has been indicated.

The final scene of importance in this series of lessons is that which took place on the day of the great controversies when, by repeated attacks upon his authority and efforts to discredit him with the multitude, the ruling classes in Jerusalem attempted that form of attack which no period hitherto had justified. They were desperate over his increasing influence. At enmity among themselves, they joined forces to discredit him with the crowd. Our narratives show the calm masterfulness of Jesus in the presence of this hostile demonstration. He silenced them by disconcerting answers, or by counter-questions.

The Parables.

The second division of these studies is by far the most extensive, including, as it does, the many parables that Jesus uttered for the purpose of instructing the disciples, and perhaps in part, of baffling his enemies. Lesson 5 is occupied with the story of the unjust steward, which points the lesson of the great forgiveness which the friends of Jesus received from the Father, and the consequent need of manifesting the same forgiving spirit to one another. Lesson 7 deals with the laborers in the vineyard, and the fact that all received the same reward, though some had worked much longer than others. Jesus had no desire to commit his followers to so unequal a basis of industry, but he did wish to point out the fact that those who received the gifts of the kingdom might well spend lives of arduous service in securing them, while the generous nature of the divine love showered abundant riches upon even the last comers into the labors of the day.

Lesson 10 deals with the story of the husbandmen to whom had been committed the estate of a wealthy man. But these keepers grew unfaithful and refused to make accounting of their trust. Their rejection as servants and the choice of other and better men was the inevitable consequence. Lesson 11 gives the story of the marriage feast to which a great company had been invited, only to fail in their response to the invitation when the dinner was about to be served. The anger of the royal host and the hasty summons to the chance guests of the wayside made compensation for the rejected invitation. Perhaps the little story at the close of this parable, of the man who had no appropriate wedding garment, was a fragment from some other teaching of Jesus that attached itself to this parable because of similar theme. In its present position, while true to the laws of spiritual opportunity, it diverts attention from the main theme.

Warning.

The first three lessons of the fourth quarter are the familiar parables of the virgins, the talents, and the judgment scene. These are all intended for the inner circle of the disciples rather than for the public to which he had previously spoken. They all emphasized the necessity for alertness, intelligent study of the times, boldness in the great adventure of bringing in the kingdom, and recognition of the decisive and determining character of every day in the great business before them. It will be noticed that the familiar title, "The Last Judgment," nowhere appears in the text. The principles stated hold true of all pronouncements upon human life, not only that which may be conceived as coming in the distant future, but that which is the daily and hourly verdict upon conduct.

The third section deals with a few scattered incidents in the life of Jesus. Lesson 6 relates his blessing the children and his interview with the rich young man, and Lesson 8 tells of the request for place made by James and John, and the healing of the blind men at Jericho.

Lesson 13 is the quarterly temperance study, whose theme is Paul's discussion of the works of flesh and spirit in his epistles to the churches of Galatia.

*International Sunday-school Lesson for October 23, 1910. Review. Golden Text: "And it came to pass when the days were well nigh come that he should be received up, he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem, and sent messengers to go before his face," Luke 9:51.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES

Topic October 23: The Chances We Miss
Gal 6:1-10.

Probably we do not know of more than half the chances we miss. Only those which we discover afterwards enable us to realize that we do miss many chances in which we might have been of a real service to ourselves or to some one else had we appreciated the opportunity. But we can never know of the many chances which have passed by unobserved at the time or indeed at a later time.

We do well to realize in the beginning that it is our fault that we miss so many chances. We need to open our eyes to things all about us. If we are observant we will see how those who count for most in life spend their time both with respect to themselves and others. Again there is constant need all about us. The poor both in body and spirit are always present. The weak and halting morally and spiritually quite as much as physically must be constantly helped and borne up. Besides we always have about us those who in their unselfish service are carrying burdens far beyond their strength. These we should ever assist and encourage by lending a hand. Moreover every man who counts for much in life makes frequent inventories of his own life and measures himself by accepted and worthy ideals. People who thus go about with awareness, see opportunities of service, and if their hearts are right, improve them.

We must not be selfish, but some of the greatest chances we miss have to do directly with ourselves. In these days of great churches, graded Sunday-schools, and the Christian Endeavor, all splendid agencies of soul-culture, of life enrichment, the young man or woman who treats them lightly, or ignores them entirely is missing his greatest chance, he is deceiving himself, yea he is mocking God. In these institutions his ideals are clarified, and elevated, his purpose deepened, his noble impulses are sustained, his life enriched. Such a one becomes a veritable dynamo of spiritual and benevolent power. He not only will look for chances, but he will have the disposition and the equipment to improve them. But should one overlook these duties which he has to himself, he not only will not observe chances for services and help, he will also be practically helpless in rendering the needed assistance even though he might have the desire to do so.

Especially are the young in danger of being, "overtaken in a trespass." Not only do they come upon temptation, but the fowler is constantly seeking to ensnare them. Life is sweet, the heart is gay, all is inviting, and the wonder is that not more are overtaken. It is for the spiritually minded to speak words not of censure but encouragement. Condemn the wrong but forgive the faulter and restore him to his spiritual standing. Help him. These are in every community. Besides there are the poor and needy whom we should help. People ought not to be poor. It would be entirely unnecessary if the Good Father's will prevailed, but the world is sinful and men seek to accumulate at the expense of others. These are chances which are also obligations which all true Endeavorers seek to improve.

The Book World

—STOIC AND EPICUREAN, by R. D. Hicks, M. A. This is the fourth in a series on The Epochs of Philosophy," edited by John Hibben of Princeton University. The series aims "to present the significant features of philosophical thought in the chief periods of its development," and to interpret the characteristic contributions which each age may have made to the permanent store of philosophical knowledge." The author of this volume gives, from a broad, independent study of the sources, an admirable presentation of the doctrines of Stoicism, Epicureanism, and contemporary Scepticism and Eclecticism. The founders and great lights of each of these schools are placed in historical order in the environment of their day and are seen producing their contributions in the conflicts and questions of real life. The Stoic and Epicurean sought to help mankind to realize its highest good. Acordingly the Stoic finds the realization of virtue the chief form of life. All action subordinates itself to this one aim. "Virtue consists in shaping the whole of conduct in conformity to right reason or—which comes to the same thing—with God's will." "Sin is misery and carries its own punishment." The author points out that the general conception of Epicureanism as a doctrine of unbridled pleasure is unfair. "Philosophy was defined by Epicurus as 'a daily business of speech and thought to secure a happy life.' Here is struck the note of intense earnestness, characteristic alike of Epicurus and his age. Philosophy is a practical concern; it deals with the health of the soul. It is life and not merely a doctrine. It holds out the promise of well-being and happiness." A splendid feature of the book is its extended quotations from the original sources, thus enabling the reader to draw his own conculsions. A select bibliography and full index adds value to the book. The author writes with strength and the presentation is very stimulating. By presenting the struggles and conflicts in the growth of the ideals of the former age, the author enables us to appreciate more fully the struggles of our own (New York; Charles Scribner's Sons, Pp 412).

MODERN LIGHT ON IMMORTALITY, by Henry Frank. This is the most presumptuous book we have read for a long time. It proposes to traverse the whole course of thought and feeling and to gather together the data of scientific research concerning immortality. It proposes to do this absolutely unfettered by any racial or traditional connections. In his preface the author asserts, "he had wholly freed himself from whatever traditional and superstitious disposition toward the subject he might have inherited from ancestral and hereditary influences," and warns us that this original investigation into truth will result in his setting down whatever truth will reveal. As if afraid that we might not share in his over-confidence on this point he repeats it a time or two throughout his accumulated pages. The book is an undergraduate treatment of great questions. It abounds in long quotations from the works and articles of such men as Huxley, Beale and Haeckel. Under the dogma of evolution and historical criticism we are asked to believe that the world has been duped on one of its greatest moral forces and to substitute for the eternity which God has put in the heart the will-o-the-wisp prescription of a solitary and unqualified mind. In his closing paragraph our author with somewhat weakened confidence says, "But we are only too well aware that what is known as the authoritative scientific world will in all probability reject the fine fabric of logic which with possibly too much conceit we may have attempted to weave." We suspect the author is correct in this statement. (Boston: Sherman French & Co. Pp. 467. $1.85.)

—IN THE SHADOW OF GOD, by Guy Arthur Jamieson. The story is one of a young man who has forced upon him by his parents the feeling that he ought to preach, while his natural abilities run in another direction. He yields to the solicitations of parents and friends, and after his theological course assumes charge of a small church in the grazing regions of the West. The description of the work here is most interesting giving as it does an opportunity for interpreting the attitude of the rough man of the plains toward organized religion, and the failure of the people of the conventional church to meet the situation. But these people have true hearts, and the hero is true hearted. He therefore finds a more appreciative hearing among these rough men without the church than among some of the misdirected people of the congregation. But at last the young man goes from the ministry to painting where he achieves highest success, and in this finds opportunity for expressing his life. The book closes with these words upon the hero's lips: "It seems to me the world still gropes in the shadow of God—I'd lead it into His sunlight." (R. F. Fenno and Co., N. Y., $1.00, net.)

THE GREAT ISSUES, By Robert F. Horton. The author is one of the best essayists of today. He brings to his work a clear brain, a warm heart and a deft hand. It is with delight that we open a new book of his. In this last volume he treats such subjects as Myths, Religion, Socialism, Science, Theology and a dozen more. His treatment of every one holds the reader. One need of our day is to re-enthrone the essayist in literature. Such books, if read widely, would soon wean away from the doggerel, many are exclusively reading. (The Mac-millan Co. Price, $1.50 net.)

THE LOST ART OF CONVERSATION, By Horatio S. Krans. The author has assembled nine notable essays on conversation. Such names as Francis Bacon, De-Quincy, Swift, Hazlett and Stevenson, stand guarantee for the merit of the book.

When one stops to think how large a place conversation has in life it is strange that more attention is not paid to it. Perhaps conversation is not a lost art; but certainly it will bear much more attention than is given to it. The masters in this volume try to disclose to us their secrets. It is a most excellent book to possess. (Sturgis & Walton.

DO IT TO A FINISH, by Orison Swett Marden. The author is editor of "Success," and this little book of nine chapters is born out of the same atmosphere as that of the magazine. It is a protest against carelessness and ignorance in work, and a plea for the best. It abounds with telling illustrations. Thoroughness, the author is careful to point out, has not only a commercial value but a character value as well. This is a most excellent book for young readers. It would cause them to go forth to their daily work determined to be better and truer workmen. It would tone them up morally. (Thomas Y. Crowell & Company, publishers. Price, 30 cents, postage 5 cents.)

PERSONAL POWER, OR COUNSELS TO COLLEGE MEN, by William Jewett Tucker. A series of sermons or addresses delivered largely to the students of Dartmouth College. Dr. Tucker has in mind the graduates and under-graduates of the American college everywhere. The style is vigorous and scholarly. Emphasis is given the theme, "Personal Power," throughout, as the one thing the college ought and must develop in men. The book will bear a careful reading and study. (Boston: Houghton Miffin Company. Pp. 284. $1.50 net.)

RICH IN YESTERDAYS: A MESSAGE TO THE AGED, by Henry Ostrom. The little book contains the "substance of the "weeda." Mr. Redhorn certainly affords great amusement by his sensitiveness and timidity. He is always afraid of becoming a "monstrosity" or a "comicality" to the villagers. But he is a good honest soul and every little while he gives his apprentice good advice to put into practice after he outgrows "the days of his youth." (Fleming H. Revell Company, Chicago; 60 cents net.)

HISTORY OF FORESTRY IN EUROPE, THE UNITED STATES AND OTHER COUNTRIES, by Bernard E. Fernow, LL.D. The subject of forestry is now a live and pressing one. This brief history is a very thorough treatise. The author is the dean of the faculty of forestry in the University of Toronto. (University Press, Toronto.)

Church Life

Work has begun on the new church at Eugene, Oregon.

A. E. Kemp has been appointed pastor of First Church, Spencerville, Ohio.

Charles H. Bloom is conducting a series of meetings at Second Church, Danville, Ill.

T. Adams is now fully settled in his work at Lyon Street Church, Grand Rapids, Mich.

G. W. Thompson, recently of Cincinnati, Ohio, has been called to the work at Temple, Arizona.

The pastorate at Plainview, Tex., is vacant, owing to the resignation of Mr. Howard.

John Maer, for some time pastor at North Vernon, Ind., has entered the evangelistic field.

J. W. Mitchell, pastor at Bardwell, Ky., has accepted the charge at Tucson, Ariz., and is now at work there.

A successful rally day service was held Sept. 25 at Kankakee, Ill., nearly two hundred children being in attendance.

A series of meetings are being held at Watseka, Ill., there having been a number of additions to the membership.

Reports from many Kansas towns tell of the large delegations that are planning to attend the Topeka convention.

The cornerstone of the new church at Antioch, Ill., was laid recently, N. S. Haynes of Decatur, delivering the address.

John T. Stivers and Miss Lucile May Parks are in an evangelistic meeting at Arcola, Ill. Miss Parks is also conducting a teacher training class.

The new pipe organ recently installed in First Church, Topeka, Kan., was dedicated by an organ recital, given by Edward Kreiser of Kansas City.

At the Sunday-school rally at Massillon, Ohio, 522 were present, with a collection of over $50. There was an attendance of 102 in the men's class, alone.

W. C. Lessley, formerly of Lincoln, Neb, has accepted the unanimous call of the church at Tecumseh, Neb., the pastor. O. H. Loomis, having resigned to engage in other work.

First Church, Fort Worth, Tex., J. E. Dinger, minister, reports twenty additions on a recent Sunday, and an average congregation of 500 for the past eighteen months.

The Twentieth Anniversary services of the Walnut Street Church, Canton, Ill., were held recently. S. H. Zendt, of Bloomington, Ill., a former pastor, gave an address at one of the services.

Central Church, Dayton, Ohio, issued post-card announcements to a rally day service, with the aim of securing an attendance of 500, but the record breaking mark of 812 was reached, many being unable to get in.

Roy Brown and Charles E. McVay have closed a meeting at Owosso, Mich. They were assisted by the pastor, C. M. Keene, and forty were added to the membership. Mr. McVay is now in a meeting at Terre Haute, Ind.

On Sunday, Oct. 2, Rev. W. H. Bagby, pastor of the church at Missoula, Mont., preached an illuminating sermon from the text, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto myself," touching on the sinlessness, unselfishness, and Godlikeness of Jesus.

The church at Morristown, Ind., N. D. Webber, pastor, observed rally day with an attendance of 160.. At the regular preaching service there were fourteen additions. Mr. Webber began an evangelistic meeting at Shiloh Church, Oct. 9.

H. O. Breeden dedicated the South Street Church, Springfield, Mo., Oct. 2. This is a handsome edifice costing $50,000, including grounds. The pastor, F. L. Moffett, writes that the debt remaining was $16,000 and $19,000 was subscribed.

The members of the congregation at Herington, Kans., who expect to attend the Topeka convention, have solved the problem of entertainment by chartering three Pullman cars. These will be parked in the railroad yards and the Herington people will make their headquarters there.

At a recent rally day service, the Sunday-school at Central Church, Rockford, Ill., Wm. B. Clemmer, minister, had as their aim 350 present and $35..00 in offerings. This was exceeded in both attendance and offerings, and the teachers and officers are much encouraged in this beginning of the season's work.

In a general meeting of the Kansas City Brotherhood held in Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City, Mo., recent movements of the liquor interests were discussed and the Brotherhood pledged to help the prohibition movement.

The young people of the church at Mishawaka, Ind., maintain a concrete interest in missions by supporting an orphan boy in India. They have also arranged to give a lecture course this winter, thus widening their interests both at home and abroad.

On a recent Sunday evening at Third Church, Bloomington, Ill., the program was given by the children of the Sunday-school, and the importance of this growing branch of the church work was emphasized, particularly the need of graded schools, and trained and consecrated teachers.

The dedicatory services of the rebuilt church at Junction City, Kan., were held recently and the congregation is rejoicing that an amount of money over and above the required sum was raised. J. E. Rains, who has served the congregation for the past year, has accepted a call to Garnett, Kan.

On Sunday, Sept. 25, Alexander C. Gray of Eureka College, preached at Centennial Church, Bloomington, at which service, Milo Atkinson, the newly appointed minister was with his wife, received into full membership in the church. The sermon subjects were: "The Authority of Jesus," and "The Test of Character."

At Lawton, Okla., a large chorus choir has been organized and systematic drill in choral music is being secured. It is planned to make music one of the features of the services, at the same time enlisting the interest of the younger members of the congregation in this elevating and stimulating recreation.

Having purchased their ground, the congregation of South Lawrence Avenue Church, Wichita, Kans., will soon begin a subscription campaign for its new building. While C. C. Sinclair, pastor of the church, says that nothing definite has been decided about the architectural features of the church, the Sunday-school and class rooms will be the feature most to be considered.

A joint reception was held recently at Centennial Church, Bloomington, Ill. the occasion being a farewell to J. H. Gilliland, the former minister, and a welcome to Milo Atkinson, of Covington, Ky., who assumes the pastorate. The First and Second churches were included in the invitations and addresses were given by Edgar DeWitt Jones. S. H. Zendt, and other ministers of the city.

T. L. Noblitt, for three years the pastor of First Church, Guthrie, Okla., has resigned his charge and will resume the practice of medicine, which profession he had engaged in before his entrance in to the ministry, having also held the chair of zoology at Christian College, Enid, Okla. Dr. Noblitt's pastorate has been a successful one, about three hundred being added to the membership.

Frank Thompson, pastor of the First Christian Church, Cairo, Ill., announced to his congregation last night that he would occupy the pulpit of the church until the first of January. Mr. Thompson had sent in his resignation some time ago, but it was not accepted by the members of the church, and they have been trying to get him to reconsider his decision to leave Cairo.

One of the classes if the Second Church Sunday-school, Bloomington, Ill., has assumed the responsibility for the conduct of the work of the home department. The work has been divided into districts, and volunteers from the class will push the work systematically. This class has also pledged itself to help meet the expenses of the evangelistic services to be held this month.

L. W. Barclay, a graduate of Bethany, and Director of Boys' Work in Doctor Parkhurst's church, has been engaged to take charge of the Bible-school, in First Church, New York, and aggressive work along this line will be prosecuted in the neighborhood. With this moving into a new building and the Centennial Celebration, every indication points to a larger and richer and more fruitful life to this, the first congregation of Disciples in this country.

Among the many Sunday-schools holding rally day services, was that at Lincoln, Ill. Some time before the date of the service, teachers, officers and pupils were busy inviting absentees and newcomers alike, with the result that the attendance reached closely to the 500 mark. Special effort will be made to keep the attendance near this mark during the coming months, and if the plans of the teachers are carried out, it will become one of the best schools in the state.

Newell L. Sims severed his ten months' pastorate with the Mt. Healthy, Ohio, church, Sunday, September 25, to return to Columbia University, where he will take the degree of doctor of philosophy. His last sermon was on "The Spirit of the Age in America," in which he decried the dominant spirit of commercialism, but prophesied that higher ideals would rule when the amalgamation of the races which make up the country had been fully made.

As a result of a three weeks' meeting at Macomb, Ill., twenty-six members were added to the church, and the pastor, A. M. Hale, looks forward to an awakened interest in its affairs by the whole membership. A class has just been graduated in teacher training work, having completed a two years' course. Services will be held hereafter in the newly dedicated church, after a year of interrupted work during the erection of the new building.

An all-day program marked the dedication of First Church, South Bend, Ind., on Sunday, Oct. 2. This included a Sunday-school rally, and union fellowship and communion services. The dedicatory services were in Charles Reign Scoville, assisted by his corps of workers, who will remain there for a series of evangelistic services. The building, which has been in process of construction for some time, is a handsome one, and well fitted to the needs of the congregation, one of the best pipe organs in the city having been installed.

A Sunday-school convention was held recently in Central Church, Toledo, Ohio, one of the addresses being given by G. W. Speer, pastor of the church. The task of teacher training was widely discussed, in the light of the fact that the Sunday-school is now looked upon as the vantage-ground for progressive work. One of the speakers made the radical statement that if the missionaries were to devote ten years to children and leave the adults alone, we could conquer in a generation.

George W. Muckley, representative of the Church Extension Society, held three special services for the members of the three churches of Wichita, recently. One was held in the morning at the Central Christian Church, another at the Third Christian Church in the afternoon and another at the South Lawrence Church in the evening. Collections were taken at these meetings to extend the building interests of the church. About $500 being raised with much more promised. More money will be immediately raised the most of which will be used in Wichita in improving church property.

Arthur Long, pastor of the First Church, at Burlington, Iowa, for the past nine and one-half years, has tendered his resignation to take effect January 1, 1910. Mr. Long intends entering the evangelistic field, stating in his letter of resignation that he feels he can do more good in that capacity than as a resident minister. When Mr. Long came to the First Church the congregation numbered about forty members. It now has a membership of 450 and is growing all the time. In addition to the spiritual work accomplished by the pastor, he has built up the church property.

The Sunday-school of Central Church, Wichita, Kan., planned and worked for several months previous to its rally day services, October 2, with a view to surpassing all its former efforts. Ex-Governor W. E. Hanley, for many years an active Sunday-school worker, delivered the principal address.

One of the strongest village churches in Illinois is that at Dana, twenty-five miles from Eureka. With a membership of less than twenty, it built and paid for its present edifice at a cost of between $7,000 and $8,000. Many members have since been added, and the Sunday-school numbers twice as many as is on the church roll. The church expects to call a pastor soon, and the work will move along rapidly.

Vaughan Dabney closed his first year's work at Douglas Park Church, Chicago, Sunday, Oct. 2, and was called by the congregation for another year. Mr. Dabney's pastorate has been markedly successful, thirty having been added to the membership and an old debt of $1,600 cancelled. A men's Brotherhood has been organized, and all the activities of the church have increased. Instead of the usual service on such occasions, the people met together for a simple service of praise and observation of the communion. The prospects are bright for next year's work.

The congregation of the Capitol Hill Church, Des Moines, Ia., held a rally and jubilee service to commemorate the fourth anniversary of the pastorate of H. E. Van-Horn. During his short ministry there have been nearly 1,000 accessions to the church membership, 579 of this number by confession. Financially the church has been unusually successful. The congregation has raised the pastor's salary $400, remodeled the interior of the church, paid for paving and incidentals, gave large gifts to benevolent and mission departments of the church and closed the year with 576 in Sunday-school.

With simple ceremony, the cornerstone of the new Central Church, Terre Haute, Ind., was laid on October 2. The service was conducted by the pastor, S. D. Dutcher, assisted by the other ministers of the city. The growth of Central Church during the pastorate of Mr. Dutcher has resulted in the plans for this handsome structure, which is to be erected at a cost of $60,000. At the begenning of his service here, the church was heavily in debt. This has been paid and the church is today in excellent condition, with a membership of twelve hundred. The congregation expects to occupy the new building early next spring.

A. D. Brown, who has held the pastorate at Leroy, Ill., for the past year, has been called by the congregation for another year. Mr. Brown's work here has been very successful, and the members are now erecting a new church to be dedicated about Jan. 1. This is to be a handsome structure of brick and Bedford stone, built in library style at a cost of about $25,000. This church was organized in 1890 with a membership of twenty which has increased to about four hundred. A number of the charter members are still residents of Leroy, and look forward to the completion and dedication of the new structure.

One of the most noticeable improvements in the University district, Champaign, Ill., is the rebuilding of University Place Church. There will be two distinct auditoriums, which can be thrown into one, by sliding doors, giving a seating capacity of about 100, or about twice what it formerly was. The balcony is unique in that it has about thirty Sunday-school apartments, one reason for the rearrangement of the church being to give more room for this department of work. Another novel feature is a cosy basement flat of four rooms, fitted with modern equipment, for the occupancy of a resident janitor. An intercommunicating system will also be installed in the building, and rooms will be fitted up for general social purposes. It is expected that the church will be ready for occupancy about January 1.

The announcement made in our paper some time since that H. O. Breeden had accepted the call of the West Side Church, San Francisco, was an error. Dr. Breeden will remain in the evangelistic field where he finds great satisfaction and where he is accomplishing a high order of service to the Disciples of Christ. He just closed a two weeks' meeting in Missoula, Mont., adding a goodly number to the church and leading the congregation in paying a $2,700 debt. E. B. Bagby is the pastor there, whom Dr. Breeden characterizes as "a rare soul, a strong, scholarly mind." The two months of the past summer in which Dr. Breeden supplied the pulpit of the San Francisco Church were fruitful in greatly increasing the regular congregation and adding many capable people to the membership.

The Chicago Disciples' Ministerial Association believes that a number of ministers within a radius of one hundred miles or so of this city would enjoy occasional attendance upon the Monday meetings. An especial program has been provided by the committee for the last Monday of each month to which the attention of such ministers is called. The program will consist of a Round Table on various aspects of the practical work of church and minister. The October Round Table on Church Finance will be conducted by O. F. Jordan; November, The Prayer Meeting and the Devotional Life, George A. Campbell; December (third Monday) The Sunday School and Religious Education, E. S. Ames; January, Evangelism, C. G. Kindred; February, The Minister as Pastor, W. D. Endres; March, The Minister as Preacher, H. L. Willett; April, Relating the Church to Civic Life, Austin Hunter. These meetings will be of great interest and profit. It is not the plan for the leader simply to read a paper, but to state the problem, and after offering his own suggestions, organize the meeting into a round table for the testimony and contributions of all.

"How to Avoid the Summer Slump" has been a problem discussed in all Sunday-school conventions for decades. Recently some schools have thought to show that it was not unavoidable and that people would go if the school kept up its work and enthusiasm. This year through the summer months the great school in the First Church at Canton, O., gave the Sunday-school world a most decided thrill by rolling up an average for the worst month in the year, August, of over 2,400 attendance and exceeding through the whole summer quarter their highest average of any previous three months. On a lesser scale the Christian Sunday-school at Nelsonville, O., has demonstrated the same fact. During this last quarter the school reached its high water mark in attendance, having on the first Sunday in September 1,208 in attendance. The average collection for this same quarter was $22.70. The method used to accomplish this was a friendly contest on attendance and offering with the Sunday-school of the High St. Church of Akron. The contest ran through eleven Sundays and the result was a victory for the Akron school, the margin, however, being very close. Its Berean class is now in a contest with the largest class in the world at Rochester, N. Y. Stephen J. Corey, of Cincinnati, addressed them recently.

An evangelistic service is in progress at Fairland, Ind. This church is at present without a pastor.

The Sunday-school at Augusta, Ill., celebrated its rally day by an attendance of nearly two hundred.

The Christian Endeavor Union of Lincoln, Neb., held its fall rally at First Church, October 14.

Grant Speer, of Toledo, addressed the congregation at Adrian, Mich., recently, the occasion being the reopening of the church after remodeling its interior.

R. L. Beshers, formerly of El Paso, Ill., has taken charge at Freeport, Ill., and will assist in a series of evangelistic meetings to be held there.

A contest is in progress between the East Side congregation, Topeka, Kan., and the Presbyterian church, prayer-meeting attendance being the point of the contest.

Mrs. Princess Long of Long Beach, Cal., gave a recital at First Church, Hutchinson, Kan., recently, on her way to attend the Topeka convention.

A successful rally day service was held by the Sunday-school of First Church, Galesburg, on October 2. Graduating exercises were held for the four grades.

I. N. McCash occupied his former pulpit, University Place Church, Des Moines, Iowa, on October 9. He was a guest of his son, Buel McCash, who is a student at Drake University.

The dedicatory services of the new church at Estherville, Ia., were conducted by the pastor, E. J. Emmons, on October 2. The structure is in mission style and was built at a cost of about $10,000.

E. E. Francis, for some time the assistant of W. A. Moore, of the First Church, Tacoma, Wash., is rapidly getting hold of the work at Selah. Audiences are good and interest increasing.

Jos. D. Armstead, the new minister at Walla Walla, Wash., began his labors in that field, September 25. This is a fine church and the outlook is very encouraging to both pastor and people.

The East Washington State Board now has about forty pledges of $25 each to establish the work at Cheney, where the State Normal is located. They are trying to get 100 such pledges, and it is thought they will succeed.

The church at Palouse, Washington, is making extensive improvements in their house of worship. The improvements will cost between $5,000 and $6,000. They have arranged for an evangelistic meeting early in the new year.

The church at Chanute, Kan., has called as its pastor, W. M. Berkeley, who has been at McPherson, Kan., for the past four years. During his pastorate the Sunday-school and young people's societies have been especially active and progressive in their work.

Chesterfield Church, Des Moines, was destroyed by fire. The faithfulness and heroism of the members was shown by opening services next morning in Odd Fellows Hall, with an increased attendance in the Sunday-school.

On October 2, the corner stone of the new church at Pleasant Hill, Ohio, was laid. This event was of unusual interest, as this is one of the oldest churches in the state, having been organized in 1816. The pastorate of the present minister, A. M. Kerr, has been very successful.

At a banquet given by the Brotherhood of First Church, Vincennes, Ind., recently, Dr. Robert J. Aley, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, gave an address on "The Manhood of Christ." The Brotherhood has arranged to have a prominent worker along its lines, address their monthly meetings.

Probably the largest Sunday-school in the world is at Monieka, Africa. It has two thousand in attendance. Moneika is on the Bosirs River, 250 miles from the famous mission station at Bolenge. As yet there is no resident missionary in Moneika, and a native black man is leader for this great work.

The Bible College of Missouri at Columbia reports an increase of forty per cent in its enrollment this term. Professors Sharpe, Taylor and Underwood are busy in enrolling new students in their classes. Especially gratifying is the fact that more than ever the university students are electing the courses offered in the Bible College.

Richard W. Wallace, pastor of First Church, Valdosta, Ga., is preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on the Parables. At a recent service, Mr. Wallace exchanged pulpits with the minister of the Presbyterian church, in order that the congregations might become better acquainted and the feeling of good fellowship promoted.

On Sunday, October 2, First Church, Fort Smith, Ark., celebrated its anniversary day with a home-coming service. Edward B. Bagby, formerly of Washington, D. C., has served as minister for the past two years. During his pastorate, more than two hundred and fifty have been added to the membership, and the finances show a healthy and prosperous condition.

A growth from a wooden shed to a $40,000 edifice is certainly progressive work for three years, but this is what has been accomplished by the Roanoke congregation of Kansas City, Mo. The church is a handsome one of white limestone, was dedicated October 9. The auditorium has a seating capacity for 500, which can be increased by the addition of sixteen Sunday-school rooms. Later, institutional features will be provided.

An addition has been made to the faculty of Texas Christian University in the person of Prof. Harry Trumbell Sutton, Bible reader, and teacher of oratory, who is well known throughout the middle western states. Professor Sutton was elected to a place in the faculty in the early spring, but when misfortune, in the shape of the destruction of the main building by fire, overtook the school, he generously offered to be released from his contract, as it was naturally supposed that the attendance would be decreased the ensuing year. On the contrary, however, it was found that the Christian people of Texas and Fort Worth had rallied to T. C. U. in a remarkable way.

The Twenty-second Annual Report of the Board of Church Extension

The receipts this year from all sources through the corresponding secretary are $77,548.22. This is a gain over the Centennial Year of $5,872.06. We thank the Giver of All for this increase in our first year of the new century.

There were 221 contributing churches less than last year and the churches as churches sent only $21,823.49. This was $11,351.36 less than last year. It is a matter of humiliation that only 1,097 churches sent offerings this year. There were 115 loans made aggregating $197,190. This is the greatest year's work the board has ever done. This makes 1,376 churches that the board has helped to build in loans aggregating $1,512,261.

The board has promised 112 loans aggregating $292,025. There are thirty applications on hand aggregating $81,850. This means that no loans can be promised for some time unless the churches send in the offerings.

Seventy-eight loans were returned this year in full, making 786 that have paid in full since the beginning. Four new Name Gunds have been added of $5,000 each and twenty-seven gifts have been made to our Annuity Fund this year amounting to $39,500. In this day when our people have a mind to build as never before, we must encourage them with helpful loans from our Church Extension Fund. To this end we ask the contributions of all our churches.

Front Rank Statement

The are now 226 Bible-schools holding Front Rank Certificates. Kentucky and Kansas are neck and neck in the race for first place. No one can tell which one will be the winner as both states have more schools promised. Several states have a number of deficient applications to their credit and all the schools have been urged to make up the deficiency. There are twenty-one such applications in the national office. The Recognition Service on Saturday, the 15th at Topeka, promises to be an intensely interesting one. The final announcement of the standing of the states will be made on that day.

Our Readers' Opinion

but yet more, to do some construction work by proposing good legislation and creating sentiments in its behalf.

Beauty will so minister. Then how fine if brotherhoods would make war upon that which is ugly, upon ugly streets, ugly alleys, ugly buildings, ugly signs, cleaning up the streets, producing fine public buildings, creating public parks, summoning nature to lavish her beauty upon public resorts.

Love will so minister. Then how fine if brotherhoods would seek out needy, poor, discouraged people, people who are striving hard and need encouragement, people shut up between narrow walls, and make them the objects of their care. How fine, how very fine if they would seek out gifted or competent youths, boys and girls, who might and would shine if at critical times a little help could be given, and send them where their genius might develop.

Life will so minister. How fine it would be if brotherhoods as brotherhoods would by recognition of some sort, quicken the energies of men engaged in hard places and performing difficult duties well. How fine it would be to keep in vital touch with noble souls the world over to whom they might minister in those countless ways which the good will is so able to suggest.

Justice will so minister. Then how fine if brotherhoods would set to work to know who are workers of evil and what their deeds, and bring to an end their nefarious designs.

Banquets or feasts or fine speeches are well if means to ends. Wonderfully significant is the great fact that honest service multiplies opportunities. The will to do God's will yields knowledge not only of the doctrines but of the task. That which is necessary to keep the will strong, zeal from excess, enthusiasm from self-destruction, is that work to be done shall be selected for its intrinsic worth. The principle of all brotherhoods erected upon a Christian basis should be to work under limits imposed by reason.

No lines should be drawn as to color, faith, conditions of life or work. No man should be rejected unless God would reject him, and He rejects no man.

Man alone creates the chasm between himself and God.

The ends of moral action are found in connection with human welfare and nowhere else and this because the soul of man is infinite in the scope and possibilities of blessed service. F. TREUDLEY.

Hiram College.

Hiram College opened the year's work auspiciously. More than 300 students enrolled the first week, the largest number in many years. The enrollment in the college proper is the largest in the history of the institution. It is encouraging to note the large number of ministerial students. The dormitory reserved for them is already filled to its capacity and many have secured rooms elsewehere.

Five new instructors have been added and with these additions to the already strong faculty and the increased attendance President Bates is confident that this year will surpass all former years in every particular.

Foreign Mission Notes

The record of the year closing September 30 exceeds anything in the history of the society. There were 1,841 baptisms in the different fields, a gain of about 19 per cent. The number of native workers has grown to 752, a gain of 118. The medical missionaries treated 182,768 patients, which was 50,998 more than during the year before. The Sunday-schools report an attendance of 12,338 as against 9,657 last year, and there is an increase of 588 in attendance at the colleges and schools. Two hundred and twenty-nine young men are studying for the ministry, which is one for every fifty of the membership of our churches in heathen lands. Not only has the work on the fields gone far ahead of any other year, but the receipts also show an increase of $10,000 over the Centennial year. The Centennial year was a record breaker, with an increase of $76,000 over the year before. It was realized that it would be hard to reach this year the amounts attained at Pittsburgh. It is with thankful hearts, therefore, that we report this substantial gain over the Centennial year.

A good friend in Beatrice, Nebraska, gives $6,000 to build the Bible School at Nankin, China. This school is under the direction of A. E. Cory. HUMAN ELECTRICITY
In the Cure of Disease
A scientist has discovered that the various forms of weakness and disease can be cured by the invalid by knowing how to increase the electrical production of his own body.
"Mr. Andrew McConnell has for some months past startled New York and Boston with his theories in regard to healing of disease and maintenance of health. In great church assemblies and public mass meetings, as well as before medical associations and clubs, he has aroused intense enthusiasm. His theory is that human life is sustained by electricity—that the vital organs of the body are voltaic batteries controlled by the individual, which makes a cure for invalidism possible and provides a scientific way of prolonging life."
Send for "Organic Electricity," a booklet which proves and explains why one can, by learning to regulate the electrical production of his own body, regain health and greater mental power.

It took the great and brilliant Marconi to translate the electricity in the air into wireless telegraphy. We have all known there is electricity in the body. God, I believe, has called Mr. McConnell, as he called Marconi, to interpret electricity in the human body. Mr. McConnell has made a tremendous discovery which I think is bound to revolutionize science. Its possibilities are infinite. It may even result in lengthening the human life.

teaching the common branches of Western learning to the Chinese. While the Bible and the elements of the Christian religion are taught to these students each day, yet our young men who are preparing for the ministry are all trained in the Bible College. This splendid gift will make possible the building and equipment of a good school for this purpose. The Union University will have nearly 500 in attendance this year and our mission will, therefore, have more students available for the Bible College than ever before.

Secretary E. W. Allen of Kansas City, reports a visit to Elliott, Ia., in behalf of the foreign work and states that the church becomes a Living-link in the Foreign Society. This is a fine record for Elliott.

News comes that ninety-nine were recently baptized at Monieka, Africa. This station has never had a regular missionary. Timothy Iso, the native evangelist, is in charge. Monieka is 250 miles from Bolenge.

The "Oregon" mission steamer was launched in the Congo on July 29th. R. S. Wilson and E. R. Moon, who have been building the boat, say that it was a most successful launching. The people gathered on deck after the boat was floated and sang, "Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow."

Miss Mamie Longan reports that every department of the work in Manila is prospering as never before.

James Ware, Shanghai, China, says that the hope of our China mission is in the Bible College. His trust is that the Society will support Abram E. Cory in this work and give him a first-class equipment. He regrets that he did not have this Bible School ten or twenty years ago.

W. R. Hunt reports that Alexander Paul is down with typhoid fever. He asks the prayers of the brethren everywhere that he may be restored to health in good time.

D. E. Dannenberg and wife of Chu Cheo, China, are coming home a little before their time for furlough. Mrs. Dannenberg needs a surgical operation. His eyes need treatment. For three years he has not been able to read.

Miss Bertha Glawson left San Francisco on the 4th of October for her work in Tokio. She will receive a cordial welcome from her associates on her arrival.

Dr. Drummond of Harda, India, reports a busy month. In the month he treated 1,524 sick people. The total attendance at the dispensary was 2,552, an average of ninety-four a day. Nearly all the cases of cholera which he treated recovered. The reports of the India evangelists at the regular monthly meetings were very encouraging. The cholera has diminished the attendance at the school some as people are afraid to send their children, but the attendance at the last report was increasing.

H. C. Saum reports that the work at Damoh, India, in the church and in the schools, is doing very well.

B. F. Clay has been engaged by the Society to solicit gifts for its treasury. Brother Clay is well known to our people. He is a man of character and experience, and it is hoped that his services will greatly increase the receipts of the Society. He will probably be located at Indianapolis.

Dedication at South Bend

The new First Christian Church, at South Bend, Indiana, was dedicated, Lord's Day, Oct. 2. Chas. Reign Scoville, of Chicago, was the chief speaker of the day. Over $12,000 was raised, and this amount will be greatly increased by the canvass of chosen committees. The entire property is valued at $65,000. The building is of Gothic architecture and is built of Bedford stone. It has a beautiful open vestibule which is by far the most inviting in the city. The auditorium and the Bible-school room can be thrown together, giving a seating capacity of about 1,200. The church is provided with a baptistry and robing rooms on a very unusual and convenient plan. Just back of the baptistry pool is a beautiful illuminated art glass picture of the baptism of Jesus in the Jordan, a silent and impressive sermon to all who behold.

In the basement is a dining room and social room and completely arranged kitchen. The rear of the basement is a large room which will be fitted up for special work with boys.

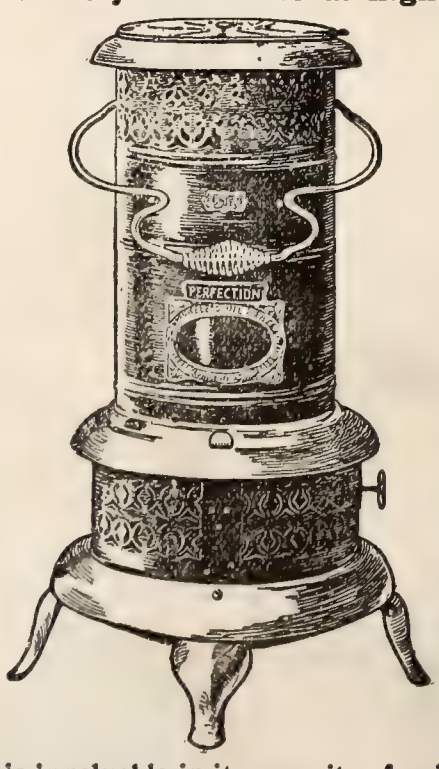
The church is equipped with a large and beautiful pipe organ built by Hillgreen and Lane, of Alliance, Ohio.

The interior finish of the church is mahogany and the pews are of ecclesiastical design.

The mural tintings are of a delicate and artistic design and lend to the interior of the church a rich and harmonious effect.

No church in Indiana has a more commodious and beautiful house of worship than this, and considering that South Bend is such a strong center of Roman Catholicism it is a great thing for those who plead for the union of all Christians to have a church building which in appearance and equipment will put the Disciples on a par with the best. The whole of Northern Indiana will be stimulated and strengthened by this evidence of progress in the First Church, South Bend.

Doctor Scoville manifested his usual enthusiasm in the dedicatory service and in the evangelistic meeting coming in the evening. He and his five helpers are continuing in a series of evangelistic meetings. Twenty-four were added to the church on dedication Sunday, and the prospects are very encouraging for a large ingathering. Meetings will continue for only one week, after which Doctor Scoville and his helpers go to the general convention at Topeka, Kans., and then to a great meeting with J. H. O. Smith, at Oklahoma City, Okla. Geo. W. Hemry, Pastor.



Dedication and Centennial Festivities in New York City

"The First Church of the Disciples of Christ," in the City of New York, has removed from West Fifty-sixth street to 142 West Eighty-first street.

The first service, in the new home of this historic church, was conducted Lord's day morning, October 7, 1910. The congregation was large, intelligent, reverent, sympathetic, attentive. This new place of abode was formerly a synagogue, in which Rabbi Wise ministered. At the afternoon meeting, our dedication day, the genial Rabbi was present and delivered an interesting, and appropriate, fraternal address. Some of the speakers confessed to an inadequate knowledge of the Disciples of Christ. In the proper place, in his remarks, for a telling effect on the audience, the Rabbi remarked that it seemed strange that Christians did not know Disciples of Christ when they saw them! The pastors in the neighborhood were more than kind in the remarks which they made in the afternoon meeting, the pastor of the Church of the Divine Paternity, Doctor Chapin's old congregation, Doctor Hall; the pastor of the Dutch Reformed Church, in this part of the city, the Rev. Mr. Cobb; Dr. Henry L. Stimson, of the Manhattan Congregational

Temporary Heat Quickly

Did you ever stop to think of the many ways in which a perfect oil heater is of value? If you want to sleep with your window open in winter, you can get sufficient heat from an oil heater while you undress at night, and then turn it off. Apply a match in the morning, when you get out of bed, and you have heat while you dress.

Those who have to eat an early breakfast before the stove is radiating heat can get immediate warmth from an oil heater, and then turn it off.

The girl who practices on the piano in a cold room in the morning can have warmth from an oil heater while she plays, and then turn it off.

The member of the family who has to walk the floor on a cold winter's night with a restless baby can get temporary heat with an oil heater, and then turn it off. The is invaluable in its capacity of quickly giving heat. Apply a match and it is immediately at work. It will burn for nine hours without refilling. It is safe, smokeless and odorless. It has a damper top and a cool handle. An indicator always shows the amount of oil in the font.

It has an automatic-locking flame spreader which prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back so that the wick can be cleaned in an instant.

The burner body or gallery cannot become wedged, and can be quickly unscrewed for rewicking. Finished in japan or nickel, strong, durable, well-made, built for service, and yet light and ornamental.

Church; the Rev. Mr. Echert, of St. Paul's Methodist Church, spoke words of greeting, appreciation, and cordial welcome. The afternoon service was an experience to be remembered. William Bayard Craig voiced the sentiments of the Disciples of Christ—a gem of an address. Brother Craig is the happy pastor of the Lenox Avenue congregation of Disciples. J. H. Garrison preached in the evening on "Certain Features of Christianity Which Fit it to Be a Universal Religion"—a religion for all peoples, times, places, and conditions. An appropriate title for the sermon would be, "The Catholicity of Christianity." To characterize this discourse as great would not be an exaggeration. At the time, in the place, on the occasion, and to the audience to which it was addressed, it was a really great sermon.

The Christian religion has to fight for its life in this modern Babylon. There is here a veritable struggle for existence even on the part of churches that are famous. I am thinking of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian, the Calvary Baptist, the St. Thomas Protestant Episcopal, and other churches of their grade. Do not think for a moment that a struggle on the part of the Disciples of Christ, in New York, is peculiar.

To be present at this feast of dedication was, to me, a season of the heartiest interest, the greatest joy, and an inestimable privilege.

More than forty-two years have passed since my first sermon to the Disciples in New York.

Twenty-seven years ago, the first day of October, I arrived in New York to begin a pastorate extending through thirteen years. The dedication of this new place of worship was on the twenty-seventh anniversary of the beginning of this pastorate—the longest in the history of this church.

During this period of time the Disciples have made progress in New York and Brooklyn, in the number of adherents, in the number of congregations and churches, in the character of the people, and in equipment.

"The First Church of Disciples of Christ" has now a better location than at any previous period. It is better housed. It is better known and understood. It understands itself, and its mission, more correctly and more fully. The environment is more favorable, the possibilities of worthy achievement in this new field are great. The pastor, William L. Fisher, is an accomplished, and consecrated, young man. In scholastic equipment, he is in advance of his predecessors. He is supported by a united, earnest, enthusiastic, courageous, determined, confident company of men and women. There is no incubus of debt. The history of the church is honorable. The outlook is promising.

One hundred years ago the "First Church of the Disciples of Christ" began its career in New York. It never was in as good condition to render effective and acceptable service as at the present time.

In connection with the services of dedication a fitting Centennial celebration was arranged. Prof. H. L. Willett and President Miner Lee Bates, a former pastor, will deliver addresses and preach sermons, the latter part of this week and on the Lord's day. The Centennial festivities will come to a close Sunday evening October 9.

This Tuesday evening, October 4, Robert Christie, the senior elder of the church, will read a history of the church. For a half century brother Christie has been an active member of this church. He is a good man. His brethren believe in and love him. The paper that he will read this evening will be a valuable production, it will be worthy of a place in The Christian Century.

For the present this is sufficient.

Bethany Graded
Sunday School Lessons
INTERNATIONAL COURSE - - - INTERDENOMINATIONAL HELPS

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

The new graded Sunday-school lessons provided by the International Lesson Committee constitute the

in a half century of Sunday-school progress. The Bethany Graded Lesson Helps for teachers and pupils are the acme of excellence in Sunday-school supplies. The Teacher's Helps are planned so that no one need fear to undertake the teaching of the lesson because of lack of special training.

The publishing houses of sixteen denominations have united to produce a non-sectarian and scientific system of religious instruction. About $200,000 was spent last year in producing these lessons. No such elaborate and artistic helps have ever been offered to the Sunday-schools as this Interdenominational series.

The writers of these lessons are the most expert in the Sunday-school world. They are not chosen because of their denominational connection, but because they are specialists in the teaching of the word of God and possess the fine art of inspiring other teachers. The literature is fascinating to teacher and pupil.

The Bethany Lessons afford the Sunday-schools of the Disciples a signal opportunity for

PROMOTING CHRISTIAN UNION

Both as an expression of unity and as a factor making for deeper unity this enterprise is more significant than any other event in recent church history. The lessons are not prepared in a sectarian spirit, nor for a sectarian purpose, yet the editor is perfectly free to assert his convictions in any point of doctrine vital to him or his constituency. Ample provision is made for teaching the history and plea of the Disciples and for telling the story of Disciple missionary heroes. Certain of the courses will be written by Disciple authors.

YOU CANNOT BE AMONG THE FIRST

To exchange the Uniform for the Graded Lessons, for already thousands of schools are ahead of you—8,000 in the Methodist Church alone, 4,000 in the Presbyterian, and many thousands more, in the sixteen denominations that have made the forward step, with Disciples' Schools in rapidly increasing numbers.

BUT DO NOT BE AMONG THE LAST!

These Lessons may be begun at any time. October 2 is the beginning of the year. Send immediately for samples, prices and order blank.

The Tides of the Spirit

Religion is the expression of the soul's desire for the infinite life. It rests upon the capacity of man to know God and to achieve character. It is not a deposit from above, nor a discovery in the environment, but it is the result of a developing life, aspiring after fuller realization of friendship with God and with man.

All religion has had the same essential elements. The soul's thirst for God is universal, though not always expressed in the same terms. "Show us the Father and it sufficeth us," has been the appeal of humanity in every land and throughout the generations.

It is the misfortune of religion that too frequently men try to confine it in methods of expression which are inadequate to its development. Organizations, ritual, doctrines and these have been devised to shape, express, curb or direct the religious life.

But inevitably after a period of careful construction of these channels and barriers, the tides of the spirit rise, the channels are overflown, the embankments are swept away and the pure waters rush out to enrich the thirsty ground.

The Hebrew faith was no exception to this give and take of the opposing forces of conservation and freedom. When priestly interest secured the adoption of laws and rules that seemed too binding and valueless to be borne, the prophets arose with insistent demand for a more vital religion and a truer friendship with God.

No doubt the forms and ritual of Old Testament religion were valuable as vehicles for the expression of the higher life. But sometimes they became substitutes for it, and then the prophets hurled themselves against the whole system of dogma and form with passion.

Precisely similar was the task of Jesus in opposition to the current Judaism of his day. Against the priestly conservation of the Scribes and Pharisees he voiced afresh the spirit of the prophets. He was the great protestant of the day. Traditions that seemed immutable and binding he swept to one side, even as he drove the money changers from the temple of God.

The apostle Paul was not less a disturber of the peace. His proclamation of the liberty that Christianity had brought into the world seemed nothing less than the destruction of all that was ancient and sacred in the eyes of Jewish apologists in his day. No one of reformers has been more bitterly opposed on the ground of innovation and sacrilege than were our Lord and his chief interpreter.

Yet the appeal for freedom in the Christian life is not a demand for the abolition of restraint or the invasion of the domain of order with license. Jesus did not invite men to liberty as an end, but only to freedom from the binding and galling tyrannies under which they groaned.

He asked them to take his yoke, which implied subjection to his leadership. He wanted them to carry the burden which he imposed. Yet he insisted that his yoke was easy and his burden light.

Indeed he pointed his disciples to liberty through the truth. By the truth he did not mean a set of doctrines nor a group of forms and ordinances, nor a method of procedure. He meant the right proportion of things, the proper emphasis upon the essentials of religion, as over against its passing modes and methods.

John Stuart Mill declared that the religion of Israel reached its high effectiveness in the classic period of the Old Testament, in virtue of the constant antagonism between the priest and the prophet, the conservative and the radical. In the end, unhappily, the priest triumphed and the prophet went to martyrdom. As the result the Hebrew institution ceased to have vitality. It was revived for a time, to be sure, in the intense spirit of Judaism, but that too became an obedience to forms and doctrines and lost its life.

The fact that Christianity, the later and greater faith, has survived so many crises in its history is due to the tides of the spirit which have overflowed the channels of churchly organization, of doctrinal statement and of liturgical practice, and have found freedom and brought new life to the children of God.

The church is always passing through some such changes as these. Conservatism is busy re-erecting its barriers of dogma and cultus, or else is standing in grim and indignant defense while the spiritual tides of a more vital religious life are playing havoc with established usage.

It is this constant change which is the best proof of the living character of our faith. Nothing is more hopeful than the fact that definitions cease to be convincing and doctrines pass away. The realities that lie beneath these passing statements are in no danger. Rather are they destined to be better understood and utilized in virtue of the change.

The conception of God as a larger man, a king enthroned on high, a sovereign governing the world by manates, and implicit in the order of the universe only as its creator in times past and its watchful ruler, is passing away. Men are simply unable to understand such a conception. It seems so little congruous with what Jesus said of the Father that they are either perplexed or irritated when such a view is taught.

The old discussions regarding the nature of Christ are losing their significance for modern men. The dualism that attempted to draw the line between the human and the divine in Christ is meaningless today. The arguments for the divinity of our Lord based upon the virgin birth and the miracles have ceased to interest men who are concerned with the great human tasks that Jesus undertook to accomplish.

The conception of the Bible as possessed of some magical quality in virtue of divine authorship is unconvincing and useless. It requires more effort to prove such dogmas than to persuade men to accept the ideals and program of Jesus.

Men want to know God today as never before. They do not care to hear about a king, but they want a Father. They are intensely interested in Jesus, not as a worker of magic, nor as a being of another-worldly character, but as their elder Brother, the first-born of the Sons of God, and the satisfying interpreter of the higher life.

They want the Bible, not as a collection of supernatural books, nor as a volume supposed to possess some kind of arbitary authority, but as the supreme religious literature of the world, the record of human experiences which have most fully disclosed the activities of the divine spirit in the human heart. Such a book is its own vindicator and needs no labored apologetic to prove that the breath of God breathes through it.

Men want the religious life, not as it is expressed a creed, but as it is manifested in loyalty and love to the supreme leadership of Jesus. Nor do they for one moment concede that loyalty is to be tested merely by correctness of opinion or conformity to any external rite. Such a test would make religion trivial and superficial.

Men believe in the Christian life and want it, because it is the life of friendship with God and man. They have little interest in the methods by which it is to be acknowledged, but they want the joy of its possession.

There are still many people around us who are strongly convinced that Christianity is dependent upon particular modes of definition and forms of obedience. A man who is persuaded that the monarchical conception of God is essential, that Jesus is to be explained only in the terms of supernaturalism, that the Bible is verbally inspired, and that the Christian life expresses itself in dogma, ordinance and organization, will of course fight hard to maintain these outworn ideas. He would be doing less than his duty if he failed in this regard. When the tides of the spirit rise and sweep away the familiar landmarks of his system, it is natural for him to feel that the foundations are giving way, and all the windows of Heaven are opened for the final catastrophe.

But his struggle to maintain the fixed conception of religion is futile. The tides of the spirit cannot be confined. The freedom to which Christ invites his people cannot be long denied them. Partial truths give way and useless forms vanish in the progress of the kingdom of God to its complete mastery of the minds and ministries of men.

The Blight of Party Fealty

"A political party begins to die as soon as its machinery becomes more important than the ideals on which it was founded," said the late Goldwin Smith. The party slogan is not for principle but for the spoils of office. Men cling to their party in spite of their consciences and, like sheep, listen for the tinkle of the bell of the bell-wether. Occasionally a leader arises who demands that principles be adhered to for party sake—rarely does one arise who is willing to risk the party itself for the sake of principle. Those who think there is no salvation for the country outside of their particular party have been in the majority in both parties but the day is fast waning. The coming of the independent, the muck-raker, the popular magazine and the quick and easy transmission of popular intelligence is making for a democracy by reason rather than by prejudice.

A party exists for the promulgation of a principle. There is no reason why it should continue to exist for any other purpose. It is a piece of machinery and should pass away when its work is done or a better machine is devised. Senator Dolliver has been making his political confession as an insurgent. He says time was when he was for everything his party was for and voted for every one his party nominated because the worst thing his party could do was better than the best thing any other party would do. But now he confesses his conversion to independence. He says he will not sell his conscience for an office and that he sees as he once did not see, that his party has been used by special interests against the principles for which he joined it. He throws the challenge down squarely by saying that he believes in majorities but that he will do his best to see that the majority knows the truth, even though it does reflect upon the record of the party he once extolled for everything done.

It is the blight of party fealty that has given our cities over to corruption, for men have preferred the party with its Crokers and Coxes to any principle involved and special interest knows the psychology of the crowd just well enough to unite with and contribute to that party which can produce the blind votes in any given case.

Progress by Party Schism

It is dangerous for any party to be long in power unless there is a minority so strong that its majority is constantly threatened. It was the long hold on national affairs that brought the Democratic party to the days of James Buchanan and it was the same thing that brought the Republican party to the days of Mark Hanna. In both cases the dominance of special interests was undeniable. What the slave and cotton power was in the fifties, the trust and railroad power was in the nineties.

But history does not always repeat itself. To be sure it may yet do so but the indications now are that party schism will effect the change. In the sixties the rise of the new Republican party drew the insurgent elements together and through the election of Lincoln overthrew the dominance of special interests. In 1896 Mr. Bryan led an insurgent movement in the Democratic party that cut the lines clearly and made of it a new party in all but name. His platform was too radical and the issue lacked that sectional division that rallied great numbers through geographical alignment. His big issue of the people versus special privilege was unfortunately obscured behind the single plank of more money through a very special bimetallic arrangement.

Today we are in the midst of a party schism within the dominant party. Senator La Follette was the pioneer and was read out of the national convention in 1904 because of his irregularity. Today he is portentously in the lead. He advocates the same essential things that Bryan does and is opposed by the same type of minds within his party that the Nebraskan has fought within his own ranks for the past fourteen years. It is not germane to hark back to 16 to 1, or any particular issue; the big underlying thing is the protest against special privileges and monopoly over against the rights of the people. Minor issues may show some differences but major issues show none. As Gifford Pinchot says, "Morality has broken into politics" and the "Servants of the interests are as strong in one party as in the other." It is not a question of silver or gold or of a certain tariff rate but of the People or Privilege.

Independence Against Bipartisanship

Special interests know no party. Havemeyer, of the Sugar Trust, freely confessed that they contributed to whichever party promised most in any particular state or congressional district. The saloon does the same in all cases. Corruption knows no party fealty except the kind that wins in spite of the clear majority of clean voters. It was through this godless and treasonable bipartisanship that Lorimer could buy his way into the senate in Illinois and it was through it that Cannon was sustained in the House of Representatives last winter. There is no variety among buzzards when the carcass falls.

On the other hand, most of the victories for progress have been by the votes of the independents. Cummins, La Follette, Bristow and Poindexter have won by the help of the independents. In Maine it is the independent Republicans that turn historic majorities over to defeat, and in Kentucky it was independent Democrats that defeated the intrenched machine of their party. It is the independent voters in Democratic ranks that have joined hands with the unsuborned opposition in Tennessee to defeat a party machine as bad as that of Pennsylvania, while in that last named and most sodden state in this union, the Keystone independents are offering terms to the minority if they will come over and help them clean things up, in the name of political decency.

The primary has done more than any other device to make all this possible. It has enabled the people of one party or the other to get up a clean man and it has enabled the people of each party to fight the good fight against the bipartisan gangs. In California both parties won for the people against the Southern Pacific bipartisan interests. In Iowa and Wisconsin, there is no doubt that thousands of independent Democrats changed parties and voted for Cummins and La Follette because it offered the thing they valued more than a historic fealty. In the South, where no second party is possible on account of race solidarity, the primary made two factions within the party and, beginning with South Carolina in the days of Populism, has marched straight to victory slowly but surely and has little more to clean up but Bailey, of Texas, and a certain senator from Louisiana.

A Prophet Not Without Honor

All this is demonstrating La Follette as it is no other man in the forefront. Every power that the interests could command was used in Wisconsin to defeat him and every power the independents could command was used to nominate him. All the prominent insurgent leaders fought for him and, as before said, many independent Democrats have definitely aligned themselves with his battle line host. He polled 141,000 votes to his opponent's 41,000. La Follette has been read out of the party, denied party patronage from the White House, suffered the displeasure of Theodore Roosevelt because he was going too fast, been browbeaten in the senate, and maligned by the press. Last winter he had the pleasure of pointing his ancient enemies a moral by introducing to them the insurgent host that had risen to join him in the senate. Next winter he will be in the clear ascendency unless the promises fail. But to a man like La Follette, personal victory is a small thing compared to the larger victory of his principles.

He began "calling the roll" at Chautauqua some years ago. It was the sensation of the season, but "Little Bob" was found to always have the records behind his assertions. That action was an electric flash whose reverberation will resound with increasing force until after November. He has continued this "roll call" in his paper with unexampled courage. It has been a terror to the Servants of the System, and done more than any other one power to unhorse them. Aldrich, Hale, Burrows, Flint, Long and others have been read out in court. Silence would have served their political fortunes better and none of them will be in the next Congress to scorn the Napoleon of this campaign. Dalzell was barely renominated, where heretofore, he has had overwhelming majorities. Hull was defeated after years of victory over his party opponents in the Des Moines district. Tawney went down in Minnesota and Adam Bede in Michigan. In Kansas it was almost a clean sweep and Illinois contributed Boutell to the general slaughter. Two of the three Democrats who supported Cannon in a rather notorious fashion are left behind and altogether there is no doubt but that the insurgents of the two parties can carry anything in the next House with a strong probability that there may be a Democratic speaker. If ever a man was vindicated and given a victory that promised the complete dominance of his principles, that man is Senator La Follette.

Death Bed Conversions

No sooner does a cause become a winning one than death bed conversions begin to put in an appearance. Every anti-saloon campaign conducted by the local-option forces reveal a number of these. Legislators or candidates for legislative honors begin to repent and hasten into the kingdom of temperance as soon as the majorities in their districts become threatening. It has led the Anti-Saloon League into some extreme difficulties. By voting right on the temperance measures and wrong on everything else these gentry demand League endorsement and to pay the debt and insure a vote for the next forward step, the League has been led to indorse men whom that same clean-minded folk who stand for temperance ought to oppose because other issues are quite as moral as that of liquor and the record is being covered up by a decoy vote on temperance because it is most to the forefront as a moral issue. The League leaders can hardly be excused for indorsing men that good government Leagues blacklist. Temperance will be dearly won if at the price of such narrow considerations of policy.

Insurgency is now being burdened with such death-bed conversions. After Bryan's nomination in 1896, there were hosts of Bourbon Democrats who were converted to everything he stood for. When two defeats convinced them there were to be no loaves and fishes to divide they faced their dauntless prophet with "We want to win" and laughed to scorn his quick reply that "He alone wins who fights for the right." So they boldly put reaction to the fore and went down in the worst defeat the party ever suffered. That defeat ought to have buried "stand-patism" forever, but Bourbonism dies hard and special privilege has everything to lose and nothing to gain by a surrender before death. Now that La Follette and Cummins are in the ascendant and Cannonism is doomed the cries of repentance are arising all over the land. Enough faithful Cannon supporters have already declared their determination to desert the doughty old "iron duke" to make his election to the speakership impossible under any probable circumstances. After November, if indeed not before, there will be hosts ready to desert the flag of stand-patism for the newer colors of the insurgent host. Bryan said to welcome them, but let them go to the ranks and prove themselves, and now La Follette and his compeers are extending the same terms of penitence.

The New Daniel of This Judgment

The new Daniel that has arisen in this judgment is Gifford Pinchot. It was his dismissal from the forestry service that brought the whole issue spectacularly to the front. It aroused the rank and file as nothing else has done for here was a conspicuous case of a public servant that was more than efficient, one indeed who had shown the power of a statesman in the highest degree and a devotion to the public good that was remarkable in its originality and energetic application, yet he was discharged because he would not put his department under call to a notorious demand of privilege. True, the technical reason was different, but the public believed it was a sacrifice to the old system of private profit from public domain.

Pinchot has proven himself in even a more masterly way since he was discharged. He has entered the larger service of insurgency in its effort to conserve all the public interests from private greed. No man on the platform today has said more fearless, independent, or nonpartisan things than has Pinchot. He has attacked Privilege with a weapon that has been sharpened in the white heat of actual contact with the monster. Listen to some of his thrusts: "When the objects of political parties ceases to be everybody's welfare and becomes somebody's profit, it is time to change the leaders;" "Differences of belief between the parties today is vastly less than it is within the parties. The vital separation is between partisans of government by money for profit and the believers in government for human welfare;" "The man in the street no longer asks, 'is it Republican or is it Democratic doctrine, but is it honest and means what it says, will it promote public interest and weaken special privilege and help to give every man a chance;'" "The tariff, under the policy of protection, was originally a means to raise wages; it has been made a tool to increase the cost of living;" "The alliance between business and politics is the most dangerous thing in our public life;" "The special interests must get out of politics or the American people will put them out of business;" "The back shadow of party regularity as the supreme test in public affairs has passed away from the public mind;" "Political leaders, trust-bred and trust-fed, find it harder to conceal their actual character." Pinchot is presidential size.

Taft at the Political Game

Whatever Mr. Taft may be as president, he has made a bad muss as a politician. He was Mr. Roosevelt's personal selection as his successor. He was nominated because Mr. Roosevelt was for him and but for that reason would have stood the most forlorn sort of a chance. He seemed to conceive the idea that he must weld the party together and proceeded to take the very elements that were antagonizing the Roosevelt policies into his inner cabinet. He doubtless thought they were ready to treat and would meet him half way. He found that, independent of his good intentions, the people would not trust them, and later found also that if these gentry entered a compact they would have as much out of the bond as the other party. He filled his cabinet with corporation lawyers and aroused the suspicions of all who were aroused over the matter of corporation control. The people did not trust the process of amending a wrong in the house of its friends. They surmised that they would get a candid compromise to still their appetites.

Next came the boycott of the insurgents because they would not join in the compromise. Thinking people had forsaken partisanship for the larger interest and Mr. Taft talked altogether too much about his office as Leader of the Party. Then he discharged Pinchot and withdrew patronage from the insurgents. But that proved poor politics, for the people would not take his word for Ballingerism in the face of the frank evidence of Glavis and Pinchot, and he found the insurgents were not in the business for the sake of patronage. Then he defended the Payne-Aldrich tariff and the people condemned him for one of reactionaries because the man who runs may read glaring gloss that bill put over the plain promises of the party's Chicago platform. He sent a message to the rump convention called in Wisconsin to defeat La Follette, went to make a speech for Tawney while he was the conspicuous mark for insurgency, did all he could to help defeat Poindexter in Washington, spoke a good word for Uncle Joe on numerous occasions, defended Aldrich in vigorous terms, and finally, in a fit of special weakness, wrote a public letter, restoring patronage to the insurgents. Every move here recorded, ran counter to the mind of the aroused electorate and branded the president as one who has no conception of the public mind, and, let us be charitable enough to hope, one who has been badly and all too easily advised by his friends.

There is nothing like putting the shine on another's face to put the shine on our own. Nine tenths of all loneliness, sensitiveness, despondency, moroseness, are connected with personal interests. Turn more of these selfish interests into unselfish ones, and by so much we change opportunities for disheartenment into their opposite.—W. C. Gannett.

There's not a flower of spring
That tints at last the universal heart,
By issue and symbol, by significance
And correspondence, to that spirit world,
Outside the limits of our space and time,
Whereto we are bound.

— Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

The world has nothing to expect from preachers who are so perplexed and confused by new knowledge and new ideas of things that they do not feel sure about anything. The English bishop when told that there was no special prayer for theological students in the Anglican prayer book wittily suggested the use of the "prayer for those at sea." But no one ought to stand in a Christian pulpit until he can raise a genuine cry of, "Land." The first and supreme qualification of one who shall make others believe is that he shall himself believe. It was Lord Macaulay I think, who once said that he never cared to attend the religious service of a preacher who believed less than himself, and if, as I have no doubt, the great historian had in mind, not so much the quantity as the quality of belief, not believing formally and professedly in many things and making unhesitatingly, assertions about them, but believing much and deeply in the central things, then, he was surely right.—Dr John Hunter.

She hath not shrunk from evils of this life,
But hath gone calmly forth into the strife,
And all its sins and sorrows hath withstood
With lofty strength of patient womanhood.

—James Russell Lowell.

Memory, Character, Happiness

It is a fine trait of friendship that avoids reference to the past errors and sins of its object and lays stress upon what is excellent. For this reason friendship it the best aid to memory, for it keeps before the mind the qualities ot character that are worthy of consideration. The professed friend who is continually reminding us of the mistakes we have made is doing all he can to ruin us by keeping our minds fixed on evil.

When it does become necessary for a friend to refer to past failures, character is at stake. The effects of evil conduct cannot be wiped out by mere wishing. Even if no one speaks a word to us concerning the cowardice we displayed in the presence of the enemies of righteousness, the sense of humiliation remains with us. But, however shameful the deed may have been, brooding over it is a serious mistake. We need to remember it for the sake of future actions, that these may be better.

The rich man of the parable remembered a life of selfishness. A priest asked a dying man if there was anything in his life which he regretted, and the man replied: "No, I think not. I do not remember that I ever missed an opportunity to have a good time." For a man of this kind, life is a joke. Seriousness is no part of his character. The rich man to whom Abraham speaks may not have been quite so frivolous, but he seems to have fixed all his thoughts on the good things of the moment. At the end of his life on earth he had nothing of value to carry with him. In the hurry of this world men may not realize that they are meanly selfish. It appears that in the next world they will have a chance to see themselves as they are and then will come the torments of memory.

It is the privilege and joy of the Christian teacher to bring to the memory of his fellow disciples the teachings of the Lord. And it is a joy to recall those whose goodly walk impressed upon our hearts the beauty and strength of holiness. If the later years open our eyes to the temptations they endured and the victories they won, we have the greater delight in recalling the very words in which they conveyed to us knowledge of their faith and hope. The first disciples had the added joy of remembering the persecutions which their teachers suffered for the sak of the gospel.

Both character and happiness depend upon our remembering the good in the conduct of our acquaintances. It is a sign of a perverted mind if an injury is remembered while a kindness is forgotten. We magnify the faults of others by overlooking their goodness. We convert error of judgment into a vicious disposition. The wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove will keep us from being the dupes of designing rascals and from the moral scepticism which constant attention to the sins of friend and foe is certain to create. It is better to have a bad memory for insult and injury and to be called "easy" than it is to have no good word for anybody. The hottest part of hell is in the heart of the cynic.

Is there any cure for a memory overburdened with sins of omission and of commission? Christianity answers that there is. The cure is found in redemptive work. One who sees suffering which he has caused, sin which he has led others to commit, and despair for which he is responsible, has no other way of escape than that of joining himself to those who are laboring for the world's salvation. There is no magic in the death of Christ to cover the sin of man. Immoral men try to discover a way of salvation which does not require the sacrifice of their pleasures. They have sometimes put their immorality into formal statements of Christian doctrine. But Jesus promises relief for those and those only who become his co-workers in building the city of God, the city of perfect justice and perfect love. The penitence which displays itself in bodily mutilations and in neglect of human society may betoken sincerity; it does not relieve the soul of its bitterness. Honest effort to make amends for wrong doing fills the mind with memories which give one a sense of his own worth and the assurance of God's forgiveness.

Editorial Correspondence

DEAR READERS OF THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY: We who are in Topeka attending the opening convention of the new century of the Disciples of Christ are wishing earnestly that every one of you might be with us. It is in every way a great convention and it would hearten you mightily to have a part in it.

Three thousand people are registered up to this (Thursday) morning. There are likely two thousand others in the city who have not yet registered. Delegates are continually coming in. There is the promise of a special delegation from Kansas City, sixty miles away, for Saturday and Sunday, of one thousand persons. The total attendance will reach six or seven thousand.

Topeka is a beautiful convention city. What impresses us at the moment of entering is the broad spaciousness of the streets and the clear sunshine. It is a wide-open town—but there isn't a saloon in it. The feeling of stuffiness one gets in visiting most eastern cities is entirely absent here. The winds of the prairies have ample chance to play through these streets and spacious lawns. The registration committee, to whom all new arrivals are guided when they get off the train is located in the capitol building. There is an augustness about the reception one gets under the noble dome of this three million dollar state house.

Hotel accommodations are not extensive here. But nobody regrets it. The committee has provided entertainment for ten thousand people in private homes. The city is given up to us for these days. There seems to be a concert of kindness on the part of business men and housewives. Topeka's welcome is characteristically western.

Convention services are held in a superb auditorium. A picture of it was shown in these pages two weeks ago. If Pittsburg had been able to give the Centennial convention such an auditorium last year there would have been a different feeling about that gathering. Close to 5,000 people can be seated in Topeka's auditorium. The speakers with fairly strong voices can be heard in its every part. It is a bit too large for most of the women's voices, however. Mrs. Atwater is a notable and grateful exception to this last statement. In all quarters many comments are heard on the masterful way in which the president of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions directs the sessions of that body. Mrs. Atwater is growing each year in graciousness and grasp of her large responsibilities. The mantle of Mrs. Moses rests upon her, and an equal portion of the spirit of that great leader.

The C. W. B. M. services have been packing the auditorium. The addresses have been of a high order, as they always are. Reports from the field are encouraging. Last evening Professor F. L. Jewett, of the Bible Chair in the University of Texas, spoke an illuminating message on the Bible chair idea. Mrs. Ida Harrison captivated every hearer with her report of the Edinburgh World Missionary Conference. Mrs. Atwater's presidential address was a statesmanlike and thrilling document.

The Tuesday night session was rich with variety. Six missionaries and a college president made two minute talks. Addresses of welcome were made by various representatives of Topeka and the state. It was a disappointment that Governor Stubbs could not be present, but the Assistant Attorney General took his place and welcomed the convention, warning us to beware, however, "for those upon whom the spirit of Kansas breathes often lose all desire to return from whence they came!"

At that opening session the convention sermon was preached by Rev. Harry D. Smith, of Hopkinsville, Ky. Mr. Smith has a message. He appealed to the conscience of the Disciples, searching whether our religious neighbors saw in us those virtues and excellences which would commend our plea for union to them. Do they find us possessed of an exceptional degree of the missionary spirit? Of the educational spirit? Of the Christian union spirit? These were the three questions he raised in his address. He answered them discerningly. He contended that in these three points Disciples should not be content to be as virtuous as others, but to lead others.

Yesterday, Wednesday, will be historic. It will be recalled by our readers that some six or seven months ago Peter Ainslie, president of the American Society, announced through these pages that he meant to bring up to this convention certain subjects for the treatment of which our present form of organization afforded no place. Among these questions he named that of the delegate convention, the change of date, the publication society, the further practice of Christian union, etc.

To make good in his announcement Mr. Ainslie called a meeting of fifty representative men. They gathered yesterday morning in the First Christian Church. In the afternoon they met again with an attendance increased to something like one hundred. Adjourning at 3 o'clock, they met again at 4:30 with the church packed—floor and galleries. Only once in our recent history has this sort of an extra-convention session been held—at Omaha when the Federation question was debated. The most democratic and free discussion obtained yesterday. The president offered his proposal for the further practice of Christian union, at the morning conference. He suggested three things: First, that the Disciples provide means for propagating our plea for union throughout Christendom by the distribution of tracts on the subject. Second, that they establish a monthly magazine which shall be a clearing-house of thought—our own thought and that of other thinkers—discussing the problem of union. Third, that the time has come for the Disciples to change their attitude toward our brethren of the denominations, henceforth regarding them as fellow Christians and treating them as such, instead of as rivals or foes as in some quarters, sad to say, they have been regarded.

The proposal called out a great discussion. Action was deferred to an adjourned meeting set at 4:30 in the afternoon. That meeting was held, as indicated above. It was an historic hour and a half that we spent together. No more important session will be held this week. The discussion of the delegate convention proposal, important as that will be on Friday, cannot be so pregnant with future meaning as this meeting of yesterday afternoon, because the delegate convention problem, delicate and urgent though it be is not comparable in significance to the question of what the Disciples are going to do about practicing Christian union.

I am not going to tell the story of yesterday in this week's issue. Space and other duties tell me I must close. Next week a fuller report will be given together with the interpretation of the spirit of this convention. It must suffice now to say that there is a mighty forward movement now on foot among us. The day of small deeds and sectarian ideas is past. It looks as if the century plant is about to bloom, as if its first hundred years of stalk-hardening had been God's way of preparing us for bearing to the world the fine flower of Christian unity of which Thomas Campbell's holy impulse was the root.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

Observations in Brief

Russian Property.

Russia is said to have a surplus of $103,000,000 over the estimated revenue this year and has no intention of raising any foreign or international loan. The remarkable success of Russia's flying men at the St. Petersburg aviation meeting aroused the enthusiasm of the masses, who never expected to see anything successful done by the men in uniform. Over 100,000 persons were present when Lieut. Rudneff flew for an hour and three-quarters and landed accurately inside a twelve meter crease which had been marked for him.

The Germans and Gambling.

A remarkable proof of the increasing diffusion of wealth in Germany may be found in the latest statistics of the Casino of Monte Carlo, which indicate that the German can now afford to lose his money in the grand manner. The accounts of the bank at Monte Carlo show net profits of $14,000,000 annually. Of this $8,000,000 is German and Austrian money, Americans and English lose $3,200,000, Frenchmen $1,400,000, Russians $1,000,000, and the rest is contributed by various other nationalities. It is hoped that some time not far distant the lid will go on for good at this place which has caused so much misery.

The Hague Palace of Peace.

The "Palace of Peace" building that is now in course of construction at The Hague is to be of goodly proportions. It is about 260 feet square. There is a half basement containing press rooms, a telegraph and other offices, a heating and lighting plant with fourteen boilers, offices for the working staff, and a large restaurant. At one corner rises a square tower about 260 feet high. The main hall is about 70 feet long, 40 feet wide and 33 feet high. On one side of the hall are three large windows, on the other, three galleries. At one end is a fourth large window, at the other, a dias for the tribunal. On the upper floor, approached by a magnifi cent staircase projecting into the central courtyard, are the rooms of the administrative council and other officials of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, and a library capable of containing 200,000 volumes, with a book lift to the reading rooms below. The center of the building is occupied by a courtyard 144 feet long and 111 feet wide with a fountain in the center where the air to be breathed in the building will be washed before being filtered and otherwise dealt with by the ventilating apparatus. The cornerstone of the palace was laid July 30, 1907. Two hundred men are now at work on the building. It is to be finished in 1913.

Good Chances in Australia.

There is a chance for young men to go to Australia and grow up with the country. A railway company which owns millions of acres in western Australia is so anxious to attract immigrants that it offers with its 300-acre farms a fence around the whole, with one hundred acres further fenced, be sides the clearing, plowing and otherwise making the land ready for cultivation. The company will also erect a three, four or five roomed house, according to the requirements of the settler, with the necessary sheds and outbuildings for stock, and provide water either by the sinking of wells or by the pro vision of dams and air motors. The terms for purchase are the deposit in cash of ten per cent. of the purchase money, the balance to be paid by equal annual instalments extending over twenty years, bearing interest at the rate of five and one-half per cent.

A Turkish Exposition.

Turkey is going to have a great international exposition in 1913. This will give the Ottoman empire an opportunity to set before the world, as never before, a display of its art, industries and latent wealth, and at the same time give to the Eastern people who will be drawn thither a view of the products of the West such as they never have had a chance to see. It is a sign of the times, full of promise and indicating how thoroughly the Young Turk is entering into the stream of the world movement.

The Mexican War Veterans.

There was something pathetic about the assembling of the Mexican War Veterans at Indianapolis recently. There were only twenty survivors present, all told, and none of the delegates was under seventy-nine years old. More than sixty years have pas sed since the Mexican war closed. Texas, the issue at stake in the war, is now the empire state of the South. Very few people are now living who took part in the war, and comparatively few who were living at the time of its beginning. It was felt that the surviving members of the association were too few and too feeble to continue the organization. So at the close of the proceedings the presiding officer arose and said, "It now becomes my sacred duty to adjourn the National Association of Mexican War Veterans, to meet again on that 'beautiful shore.' I ask you to rise and declare the national association adjourned for ever."

Farmers and Automobiles.

The statement that thousands of farmers in the United States have mortgaged their farms in order to raise money to buy automobiles appears to have been considerably exaggerated. The editor of The Horseless Age reports that he sent out letters to 24,000 bankers in the country, asking them to report as to people they knew had mortgaged their homes or borrowed money to purchase automobiles. Answers received from 4,630 men reported on 198,216 motors in their vicinity, of which not more than 1,254 were purchased by placing mortgages, while 7,475 have borrowed the necessary money without a mortgage. So it is not so bad as reported—which is creditable to the farmers.

Employers' Liability Laws.

Employers' liability laws in the United States have been behind those of most other countries. In some states it is next to impossible to force an employer to do justice to one who is injured or to the relatives of one who is killed while in his employ. As proving this, an investigation made in New York state some time since showed that of 151 fatal cases, 56 got nothing, 61 got less than $500. In non-fatal accidents the victims fared even worse. Another shameful feature was, that of $192,536 dollars expended for accidents, $104,542 went to the injured, and the balance to the lawyers and for expenses. But New York now has a new em ployers' liability law, which went into ef fect September 1. Under this new law the burden of proof is on the employer, and the law is very simple. Unless the employer can prove that an accident is clearly due to the negligence of the wounded, or killed, he must pay 1,200 times the man's daily wage for a fatality, not to exceed $3,000, and pro portionately for lesser accidents, or he can go to the courts and let the jury determine the penalty. A few employers consider the law drastic, but most believe it substantially right.

Reno Divorces No Good in New York.

The divorce industry of Reno, Nevada, has received a blow which, if repeated often, may prove a serious detriment. An unsentimental judge in New York state has decided that a divorce procured by a New York couple in Reno does not "go" with him. There ought to be a lot of other decisions like this, in all the states. The divorce evil would be greatly lessened in this country if uniform divorce laws were enacted in all the states.

A Visit To Ballymena, Ireland

The Birth-Place of Alexander Campbell

BY ERRETT GATES.

One of the important objects of my summer's sojourn in Scotland was to study the early religious environment of the Campbells in Scotland and Ireland, and to look for any memorials of their life and work that might still exist here. To this end I made a trip to Counties Auterin, Down and Armagh, in the northwestern part of Ireland, the scene of their early life.

Thomas Campbell was born near Newry, County Down, where he spent his boyhood and early manhood, until he began his work as school teacher in Connaught, and his study in the University of Glasgow. While a student at Glasgow he seems to have taught school during vacations near Ballymena, County Antrim. Here he was married and lived until his first child, Alexander, was born in 1788.

I left Edinburgh on Tuesday morning for Glasgow, where I spent the day at the University, completing some inquiries concerning the student life and work of the Campbells, which I had begun on a previous visit there and of which I shall write in a subsequent letter. On Wednesday I left Glasgow by rail for Ardrossan, where I took boat at ten o'clock for Partrush on the northern coast of Ireland, in County Antrim, about six miles from the far-famed Giant's Causeway. Excursions to Partrush, a favorite seaside resort for Ireland, are of daily occurence, not only from all parts of Ireland but from Scotland as well. Daily excursion trips can be made from Edinburgh to Partrush and back again, giving the excursionist two hours' stay at Partrush, scarcely enough time, however, to visit properly the marvelous freak of nature at the Giant's Causeway.

The causeway is for Ireland what Niagara Falls is for America, her most interesting, single, natural wonder. A ride of forty-five minutes on a narrow-guage, electric tramway, past Bush Mills, the ancestral home of President McKinley's forebears, and past the ruins of Dunluce Castle, which stands on a precipitous rock projecting out into the sea from the coast, brings one to the entrance to the Causeway preserves. Leaving the train, one goes quite freely (except as he is obstructed by pestiferous boatmen) until he arrives in sight of the pillaried causeway that projects in a declining series into the sea. Then his way is suddenly barred by a high iron fence through which he is permitted to pass to the closer inspection of the giant's handiwork, only after the payment of a very small fee. This part of the coast is fenced off from the rest and let out to a company that makes it a means for exploiting the tourist (principally American).

Besides the causeway, with its various fantastic imagery, such as the giant's ribs, the giant's organ, the chimneys, are the two canes, truly wonderful openings into the solid rock of the coast from the sea, twenty feet wide, thirty to forty feet high and three hundred feet long. They are entered by rowboat from the sea, when the weather permits, as it did the afternoon I was there.

From the causeway I went to Londonderry, a place of 30,000 inhabitants, the principal sea port on the north coast of Ireland. From here one can make weekly sailings to Montreal, Boston and New York, and to the principal ports of South America, as well as Scotland, England, Europe, Africa and Asia. It is distinguished as the only walled city in Ireland. The old wall, built hurriedly in 1600 out of the materials of the ancient Cathedreal of St. Columba and his monastic buildings, still stands, broad enough on top for two teams to pass, with room to spare—the same walls and batteries that Alexander Campbell saw when he visited the city in 1808 to procure passage on ship for himself and his father's family to America, and from which he sailed in October, the same year, to be ship-wrecked on the coast of Scotland. It was this misfortune that gave him his year of study at the University of Glasgow.

From Londonderry I passed on my pilgrimage to the first sacred spot, Ballymena, the birth-place of Alexander Campbell. My heart was a-quiver with interest and expectancy as I alighted from the train and passed up the street past two or three blocks of modern houses to the old town, with its typical winding streets and low white-washed houses. Could it be that after a hundred and twenty-five years any one lived here who could tell me anything about Thomas Campbell, or any memorial remained to assure me that in any particular place Thomas lived? The fragmentary biography of Thomas which Dr. Robert Richardson gives in the early part of the Memoirs of his son Alexander, only states that Alexander was born September 12, 1788, where they then resided, near Ballymena, in the parish of Braughshane, and about one mile from the sight of the ancient and once beautiful Shane's Castle.

Nothing is more definite in identifying the place of the residence of Thomas, than "near Ballymena, about one mile from Shane's Castle." So, then, it was not in Ballymena at all that Alexander was born, but somewhere in the vicinity. Here was a task worthy of some expert geographer, or archeological explorer.

I wanted to find the house in which Alexander was born three generations ago. What could be more interesting than to identify the house, take a photograph of it, and write back to American Disciples that I had found that sacred spot. We know where Luther was born, and Erasmus, and Shakespeare, and Robert Burns, and many other great men; why would it not be as interesting and important thing to know where Alexander Campbell was born. My interest in the expedition I was making and my energies were sustained by all these considerations. But the data I had to work on were very meagre, and the further I examined it the more uncertain it became.

I discovered, first of all, that Shane's Castle was not in Braugshane Parish at all, but in the opposite direction; one was north and east of Ballymena, the other south. If the house in which he was born was "one mile" from Shane's Castle, then it was fully nine miles from Ballymena, and nearer the town of Antrim. This was the first disturbance of my confidence in Richardson's accuracy. Other disturbances were to follow.

Then I thought, perhaps there is a church still standing in which Thomas Campbell preached. But I did not warm up much to this quest after reading in Richardson's Memoirs (p. 27) that "it was prior to his engaging in these labors (preaching) and while passing to and fro to attend his studies in Scotland, and while, during vacations, he occupied himself in teaching," that he became acquainted with Jane Corneigle, his future wife. The probability is that Thomas period of his marriage and residence there. His name appears in the list of theological students at Whitburn, under Dr. A. Bruce, did not preach in or near Ballymena at the in 1792, five years after his marriage.

If this was the first year of his theological study, and if he passed from the university to the Divinity Hall at Whitburn without any break, that would put the year of his entrance into the University of Glasgow for a three years' course in 1789, two years after his marriage and one year after the birth of Alexander near Ballymena. It is not at all likely that he preached any before entering the university, or before finishing his five yearly sessions of theological study in 1797.

In brief, the conclusion of my investigation is that Thomas Campbell studied in the University of Glasgow from 1788-9 to 1791-2, and in the theological school at Whitburn during the summer sessions from 1792-1797, and that he did no preaching until he was licensed as a probationer at the close of his theological study in 1797. In 1798 he was called as pastor of Ahaney.

All this has very interesting bearing upon another inquiry. While in London at the Anglo-American conference on Christian union, Dr. J. H. Garrison told me that he had visited Ballymena and had seen a tablet in the vestibule of a Presbyterian church which bore the name of T. Campbell as one of its ministers. When I arrived in Ballymena I went in search of the tablet. I found it in the High Kirk, the second oldest Presbyterian church in Ballymena, which had grown out of a Seceder church in the country nearby. Here is a part of the inscription on the tablet: "Second Presbyterian Church, High Kirk, Ballymena. The Old Secession congregation of the parish of Kirkinriola. The earliest name connected with Kirkinriola is that of the Rev. T. Campbell from Glasgow in 1769. The Rev. W. Smyth succeeded him. In 1781 the Rev. Peter McMullen was ordained and labored conjointly in Ahoghill and Kirkinriola.

Thomas Campbell was born in 1763. He was therefore six years old in 1769, when a certain "T. Campbell from Glasgow" was connected with the church. The record has nothing more to say of "T. Campbell." Who he was or whence he came nobody seems to know. But by 1781 the record becomes more definite and complete, and the succession is unbroken. After an entire day spent in Ballymena searching in the records of the church along with its pastor, the Rev. J. M. McQuitty, the conclusion is that the "T. Campbell from Glasgow" is not Thomas, the father of Alexander, but some other person, of whom nothing more is known. It becomes all but certain that he was not the Campbell I was looking for, in the light of his student career in Glasgow, which fell after the time of his residence in Ballymena.

The present town of Ballymena is much larger than it was in Thomas Campbell's time. It numbers about 12,000 inhabitants. It is on the direct line of railroad from Londonderry to Belfast. It is a modern town in many respects and a very prosperous one. The linen industry has completely changed it from an agricultural into a manufacturing center. Next to Belfast it is the most important center of linen spinning and weaving. There is one large spinning mill employing 1,100 operatives. It was my privilege under the guidance of the Rev. Mr. McQuitty, to be taken through the mill. Much of the flax that is used is grown in northern Ireland, but much is also imported in the rough state from Russia and Belgium. The best comes from Belgium.

After visiting the spinning mill, I visited one of the various factories, of which there are three in Ballymena. Here the yarn that comes from the spinning mill in various sizes and grades, is woven into the plain, unbleached cloths, for the bleachers and manufacturers who make it into the various articles of use, such as tablecloths and handkerchiefs. This final treatment of the linen is principally carried on in Belfast, the commercial metropolis of the island and the center of the linen trade.

I had no sooner arrived in Ballymena than I was made aware of the tragic death that befell a former minister of the place, and his wife a few days before in a hotel in Belfast. The Rev. W. J. McCaughan, pastor for nine years of the Third Presbyterian Church of Chicago, left Chicago three years ago to take up a pastorate in Belfast. On the morning of July 26, a fire broke out in the Kelvin hotel, Belfast, in which Mr. and Mrs. McCaughan were temporarily stopping. Before they could make their escape from the building the stairways were in flames, and they were forced to go out by way of the upper windows. Mrs. McCaughan leaped to the sidewalk and her husband then tried to let himself down from the second story, but fell, striking on his head. Both died within a week from the injuries. He had been pastor of the Wellington Presbyterian Church in Ballymena before going to Toronto, whence he went to Chicago. He was held in very high esteem in northern Ireland. His photograph was displayed in many windows both in Ballymena and Belfast, as a token of the widespread public regard in which he was held.

If I Were A Preacher Again

BY A LAYMAN.

I am a superannuated minister—among the Disciples, therefore without pension. Another reason no pension is received is because I am still able bodied. I spent a half decade in the ministry, preaching both in small towns and large cities. I resigned all my pastorates when, so far as I know, I could have been unanimously requested to remain. My professional career was also terminated from choice and with expressed regret from the congregation to which I was ministering. No one regretted, however, the circumstances occasioning my cessation of the ministry so much as myself. I loved my work. Without egotism, I felt myself becoming a shepherd and no shepherd of old ever called his sheep by name and led them out to pasture with more delight than I found in shepherding the company over which I had become a pastor. I knew their homes, their poverty, their sorrows, their failings. I loved them for letting me know these things and for their effort to believe in God and be true to him. It was no trial to go to the house of grief for prayer, and the midnight call to wait on some dying soul was a sacred honor which I cherished. I had genuine emotion over the evidences of increasing spiritual perception and manifestations of the grace of God in my people.

Some years have passed beyond that professional career, but its appeal to my heart is no less today than when I was engaged in its most active and enticing duties.

Sometimes I dream myself back and am making or delivering sermons, revisiting the sick, burying again the dead or saying those mystic words which symbolize the union of two lives. And while I live those years over certain outstanding mistakes occur which I would not allow again in my ministry were that profession to be resumed.

First, I would not be a boy preacher again. I began riding on a clergyman's half fare permit when sixteen years old. I was young, I looked young—even younger than I was. As the conductor collected the fare he invariably paused to discover the deceit I was perpetrating. He looked for traces of age. He could find none. My face was innocent and boyish. He engaged me in conversation to test my voice and vocabulary. They both indicated the boy. I was conscious he was suspicious of fraud. Like most boys of tender years I blushed readily. Occasions like this brought the blood to my cheeks, not only because fraud was suspected by the conductor, but also because in my heart of hearts I felt this I was following was actually a fraudulent thing. I was a mere boy—not "old for my age." I had no intellectual training, no religious experience, no knowledge of men or realization of the Gospel's profound significance, and yet I had undertaken to preach it. At best the sermons possible to me were those heard from others, or read from the Homiletic Review, or sifted out of church papers by omniverous and scrappy reading, none of which could have any reality in my own experience.

Immaturity may be pardoned anywhere except in the pulpit. The state sets a minimum age for granting certificates to its public school teachers. Interpreting God to a community is certainly not of less importance than the cultivation of mind.

The dignity of preaching and of religion are not enhanced by youthful preachers. It is the uniqueness or novelty of the boy preacher that draws the congregation and interests them while assembled. It cannot be logic, or vision, or understanding of men and their needs, or profound conception of the Gospel realities. Novelties are the stock-in-trade of the vaudeville. That church is wise that sacredly guards its pulpit against mere novelties or spectacular stunts. A mere stunt-producing preacher or choir will not advance the kingdom of God to any perceptible degree, even with a house full at every service. The soprano who braces herself on the last phrase of the anthem, takes a deep breath, jerks her head and ascends to "high C" adds no fervor to the prayer which follows.

Being a boy preacher is difficult to overcome. Like everything else persisted in it becomes a habit. A much advertised minister of sixty is still known as the "boy preacher" and always so introduced. His vocabulary has grown more manly, his ideas may not have changed much. It sets an unjustifiable premium on one's set of immature ideas and barricades the door against new and worthier ones. The dogmatic habit is easily acquired, for conviction is demanded in the pulpit, and what the boy is capable of thinking he must be convinced is truth if he is to preach it. It can be of no consequence to him that he has no intellectual ability or opportunity to learn the opposing view.

Furthermore, one looking back on his career as a boy preacher, must be painfully conscious of many ill-timed and erroneous utterances which were delivered with all the unction at his command. If these were taken seriously they remained in the hearers' minds a hindrance to the truth uttered later by the successor of more mature years. To lead people into a fallacious religious faith by preaching error may be quite as serious as to unsettle faith by "preaching doubt."

Second—I should not allow the newspaper reporter's estimate of results to determine my evolution of them. He is seeking news while I am trying to bring in Jesus' kingdom which "Cometh not with observation." He can discern things connected only with the church—the agent of the kingdom, I must be concerned with the kingdom itself. Mathematically and statistically he may be very correct, but his figures may be entirely meaningless. The progress of God's kingdom cannot be computed on an adding machine. Devices can be utilized to produce rapid results and demand attention which have no spiritual significance or permanency. Such results will only react for injury on the kingdom and the church.

I have in mind an experience where 108 additions resulted in an exciting revival. It was the talk of the town. Night after night the house was packed. Not only the converts but the entire congregation also was intoxicated, and their quiet-working minister, a splendid, experienced pastor, was compelled to withdraw from the pastorate very soon after because he could not keep up the stimulation. The business of the church could no longer be maintained in a normal atmosphere. Moral and spiritual activity required an exciting stimulus from without. Character in the old or new members was not sufficient to compel attendance on the services of worship or the Lord's table. There was no foundation or sanction for moral and spiritual living developed in the lives of these converts, and one year after, not more than a dozen could be discovered at the church. They had been intoxicated.

They had confessed Christ in a moment of weakness. They were not themselves. The normal inhibitions of their life were gone. Their usual resolution had left them. It was no time to be making a profound decision. They needed for this the moments of their greatest strength and power, those moments when they were most themselves. Had they at this time with all its fever and excitement, been persuaded to sell their farm or mortgage their home, when they came into the cool and quiet to consider it sanely, they could easily yield themselves to remorse, if not to litigation for recovery.

How difficult is it becoming for us to recognize the value of an individual. It is hard to estimate properly one man when a thousand are being converted. We are saving men in herds. I wonder if Philip would go after the eunuch today unless he happened to be holding a revival and had already ninety-nine converts.

After the revival is over we have an interest in "holding the converts" but are not anxious for the individual convert. A man can slip away from the church today without his name being mentioned in official board meetings, or a single Christian going to discover the reason. To help in converting a multitude when the revival is on, we send people out to buttonhole the prospective candidate, but once in he discovers the church's back door has no guard and he slips out unobserved and with no comment relative to his absence. Does this indicate a possible greater interest in the revival than in the salvation of men? In the spectacular exhibition than in the quiet functions where duty ought to call imperatively?

I should not be proud of the large membership of my church, but humbled by the indifference and dereliction of my people. Large numbers read well in church papers, but may not be legitimately used by a minister as prima facia evidence of his greatness. It may be a confession of weakness. When my address on the program was failing miserably it was not a little comfort to keep in the front of my consciousness the hope that extra significance would attach to the things I was saying, because of my reputation as pastor of no mean congregation. It is not difficult to recall with what assurance I rested on my auditor's knowing how large and important was my parish. I dared not say it to myself then, but now I know and confess, what I thought and used as an evidence of strength was convincing proof of weakness.

Then, too, church statistics are not reliable. We have churches today of a half thousand or more that are only nominally self-supporting; where prayer meetings are attended by scarcely enough to constitute a quartette choir; where congregations on Sunday are no larger than when the membership was 30 per cent of what it is today; where missions and current expenses were as liberally supported when the membership was not more than one-third as large as now. Three times as many people are required to do the same work done by this congregation only a few years ago. Increasing in numbers it has declined in spiritual efficiency. The only feature of the church larger now than formerly is its directory. This contains 60 per cent more names. A church may be 600 weak as well as 600 strong—reports usually indicate the latter. Numbers in the church directory or dollars on the collection plate are not safe criteria.

Third—I should try to discern more carefully between mere institutional success and building up the kingdom of Jesus. The world is commercially minded. It is difficult for us to "make a showing" of what we are accomplishing except we do it in dollars and cents or in figures at least. It is becoming difficult even for two preachers to discuss the growth of their churches and do it in terms of religion. Prayer, sacrifice, missionary culture, Bible study, social service, these are rarely mentioned in exchange of reports. It may be objected that these are not tangible results and the others are. These would seem very much more tangible to us if we set ourselves to think of the prosperity of our work in such terms rather than in those other more tangible terms which are almost irrelevant. I am condemning no one more than myself that the church is judged by ordinary commercial standards. It is my shame that as a minister I was not spiritually minded enough to be indifferent to such unworthy standards and lead my people to a loftier plane of spiritual perception.

The day was when official boards took up subjects in their meetings which pertained to the spiritual life and welfare of the congregation. Now they are busy about raising finances, patching the furnace, and letting the contract for cleaning the carpet in the spring. We can become enthusiastic over a project to raise $50 in a sociable but we have endless difficulty in finding teachers for the Sunday-school, or Christian people to fill the adult classes. We can work ourselves into a frenzy over a Red and Blue contest but would never think of inviting our neighbor to Sunday-school if a reward were not promised our side for winning. The religious motive is in the background. We are trying to convert the world by indirections. We entice people to church and Sunday-school by tricks and keep them there by additional schemes and methods. It is to be regretted we are using subterfuges instead of manly and straightforward appeals for men to become Christians and do those duties which fall to Christian people. The church's devices to win people are transparent and her reputation suffers rather than gains from them. The church is a religious institution. Its business is to direct men toward holy living. The church is not a theater or social club or athletic association. Athletics and social functions directed by the church are not evil. But there needs an emphasis today on the fundamentally spiritual aspect of the church. Her work is soul saving through inducing men to live the life of Jesus. It is a sacred and serious business.

Renaissance Of The Country Church

BY J. S. KIRTLEY, D. D.

Will the country churches come back? If they heed the many and insistent calls upon them, they will, provided they can. A new interest is centering on them, an essential part of the new interest in country life in general. There is a renaissance of country life. "Back to the farm," "back to the country," "next to nature" are the new rallying cries of the movement to the country, which includes those who are leaving and those who are longing to leave the cities. Their motives are various—economic, which is the leading motive at present, aesthetic, ethical, religious, hygienic, domestic and possibly others.

The High Cost of Living Talk.

We are familiar with the economical question involved. If about five or ten millions of the people, now living in cities, would get out into the country and go to farming, they would still the strident wail about the high cost of living, in one season. The high cost of living is due, in only a small degree, to the tariff and to the trusts, and to "high living." There are only two real reasons for it and they would both pass out of existence if the right number of people would go to the farm. Those two reasons are that there are not enough people engaged in producing the necessaries of life as compared with the number engaged in handling and consuming them, and that combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade are possible because the producers are too few and are not as well organized as the transportation and commercial companies.

More people on the farms would produce more, be more comfortable, and be in a position to co-operate for their own protection against inimical combinations and thereby protect their friends in the city. The churches are a part of this great movement. They must have a care for the people now flocking to the farms. The question of the country church is a great national question. Colonel Roosevelt was right every time he reminded us that the development of the life of the people, who are dealing directly with nature and furnishing food and clothes to the nation, is really the most important question we have to deal with.

The Early Country Church.

The country church is to play a vital part in the new country life. Its part in the early pioneer life was the most important thing in that life. It made the settlement of the West possible. Without it, the people would not have gone; with it, they won their victories; to it, the whole nation is indebted. One church is known as the "traveling church," because, when its members went from Spotsylvania County, Va., to the new state of Kentucky, the organization transferred itself, too. And there are scores of similar removals in the early days of New England, while later churches moved from Illinois to Kansas, pastor and all. The churches were the center of history. Great men filled their pulpits and were leaders in the social, educational and ethical life of the community. Great laymen filled the pews. Preachers and laymen stayed in the country. Young men rose up to continue the work of their fathers, in pulpit and pew. Out from the country came the men most eminent in the cities. Up to a few years ago, the majority of our foremost preachers were born and brought up in the country. The majority of the strongest laymen came from the farm. At last ministers went to the city, because the laymen went; there was a greater number of people to influence and a better opportunity for culture and an adequate support. The young laymen went because of the better business and professional opportunities. For the past three decades the churches have been losing men and money so rapidly that they have become anaemic. Some have gone out of existence altogether, and few of the rest are more than alive. Their present assets are small, certainly as to quantity, and the little opportunity they have had has been divided between churches of differing and conflicting denominations, while strangers who have come in have not been willing or able to become assimilated.

New Conditions.

Now a new comunity is growing up. There are plenty of people, but they are not homogeneous, either in nationality or religion, and they are throwing down a new challenge to the churches. If the churches are not able to meet the issue, they are a travesty on Christianity. All our leaders and thinkers recognize the essential character of their work and are appealing to them to come to the assistance of the reorganized country communities. The agricultural colleges and papers and departments are telling us how indispensable the churches but for the whole life, the foundational uniare, not only for the religious life, as such, fying, purifying and directive force of the people.

The church in the country must render the old service but in a new way, because the present community is a new thing in human history, in its complexity. It must, first of all, be content to be a country church, not a miniature city church—just a church for the people in whose midst it lives. It must draw its life from its own environment, or, rather, must plant the divine life which it brings, in its own soil. The problems of the community are to be its problems. It must not be out of sympathy with the city, but its mission is to the country.

Unification and Co-operation.

It must render its ministry to the whole people. Where there are two different denominations in one community, it is a real misfortune. In that case, it will be almost impossible to do its duty by all the people, entirely impossible unless the churches enter into Christlike co-operations with each other; and, even then, there will be serious limitations on their usefulness. The money spent for two ministers would support one stronger man; and two separate plants involve a waste which we all condemn.

Its ministry must be to all the interests of all the people. It ought to be the center of the community life, steadily reorganizing its social life, as it deflects from the true course, and directing its drift. The activities of the public may well center in its building and find their rootage in its ideals. The church must be the counselor from which all will be glad to get help in life's problems, both public and private.

One of the most important things remains yet to be said. The church must utilize all the community in its work. When that is well done, there will be no longing for the ways of the city church. The culture of the country is reaching the level of that of the city and, in the country community where the ideals of service are well taught, the musical talent of the young people will enrich the worship of the church, if it is sympathetically utilized. Its financial support will be easy.

The difficulities are plentlful, but not insurmountable. The complex and diverse elements and the different religious beliefs need not be disastrous to consecrated workers. The bitter denominational rivalries have, in a measure, ceased; family prejudices have mostly died or become inactive, partly because families have scattered; new people are on the ground, ready to be built into the new church, if only they are taught by truth and led by the hand of love. The renaissance of the country church is a necessity in the renaissance of the country, and it still may have a glorous prospect for a greater ministry to mankind than it has ever yet rendered.

Chicago.

The Book World

A CERTAIN RICH MAN, by William Allen hite. This novel was taken up by the reviewer with a feeling of confidence because of the many favorable review of the book which he had read, and the commendations of his friends. The story not all disappointing. It is a strong novel interpreting the most characteristic phases of present day commercial iife in America. It is true to the life which it interprets and true to the deepest philosophy of righteousness. The hero of the story, John Barclay, is a mere lad in the beginning of the Civil War. Soon after the close of the war, he starts for the state University of Kansas, his native state. During his university course he not only makes his own expenses, but a considerable sum in addition, not by hard work, by business sense, is this done. Then follows the business career with increasing power and wealth. He is not always scrupulous. but he is successful. He forms companies that control whole industries. The power thus gained is used to influence law makers and law interpreters. With vividness is the whole story of sorrow and blighted lives left in the trail of this man's success told by the author. When life is far spent, through the influence of his mother, who has lived a quiet life of devotion to the high ideals and has never given up hope that her son would some day come to a similar faith, John Barclay comes to see that he has missed the way of life. Then follows restitution, so far as possible a righting of wrongs, and when life is about gone John Barclay begins to live. It is a strong story and will repay careful reading. (The Macmillan Co., N. Y., $1.00 net.)

CRIME AND CRIMINALS, is a small volume of 300 pages published by the Prison Reform League, Los Angeles, California. It is well known by thoughtful students of social conditions that hardly anything in our administration of government in the United States is more in need of reform than our treatment of criminals. As the name indicates, the purpose of this league it to bring about such reform. The volume under consideration is sent out to help reform sentiment. It is filled with descriptions of the wrong way to treat criminals based upon investigations made by the representatives of the league in all parts of the country. In contrast with this are descriptions of the better methods of other countries, and the advocacy of a scientific social policy suggested in the following objects of the League: (1) The abolition of capital punishment, that the state may no longer swell the list of murders by becoming itself a murder. (2) Reform of the administration of criminal law. Restraint to be for the sole purpose of protecting society and reforming the offender. This league was organized in 1909 and already has more than 4000 members. Col. G. J. Griffith, 443 S. Main Street, Los Angeles, is Secretary of the League.

SEEKING AFTER GOD, by Lyman Abbott, a series of sermons or essays by the editor of the Outlook, which will be welcomed by a large circle of readers. In recent years Dr. Abbot has written several boooks of this general character, and they have been widely read. The purpose of the present volume is thus expressed in the preface: "Religion consists in seeking to find our true relation to God, the center of life, and to our fellow-men. The object of this book is to help those who are, consciously or unconsciously seeking for this center and for their own true orbit and place, and so for peace." The chapter headings are a fair index of the material that may be found in this volume. They are: "The Soul's Quest After God"; "God in Nature"; "God in Humanity"; "God in Jesus Christ"; "God a Savior from Sin.' The book includes 159 pages, printed on the best paper and well bound. (Thomas Y. Crowell and Co., N. Y., $1.00 net..)

—THE CREATORS, by May Sinclair. The Creators are folk who write—men and women whose genius sets them apart from their kind—men and women for whom their work is the vital fact of existence. Some of them marry; some of them do not—and call Fate cruel. All of them work feverishly, intensely, spending themselves on their work without mercy. All of them have the brilliancy and fascination which genius gives its children; and May Sinclair's pen makes them live on the printed page—Jane, Tanqueray, Prothero, Laura, Rose, Nicky. Is it possible for the man or woman of genius to marry, and sacrifice neither family happiness nor success in creative work? This is the question these "creators" ask of themselves and each other often in their brilliant talk. This is the problem they try to work out in their lives. A clever picture of life and thought today in London among men and women who create. (Century Co., New York. $1.50.)

—AMERICAN PROSE WRITERS, by W. C. Brownell. The American writers whose life and work is discussed in this volume are: Cooper, Hawthorne, Emerson, Poe, Lowell and Henry James. One wonders why the author should not have included a longer list of names of men who would seem worthy to stand with those here named. However that maybe. Mr. Brownell has dealt carefully and critically with the works of those included in his list. Not much space is given to a narrative of the life of the writer studied, and to a criticism of his individual production, almost none. The attempt is rather to study crictically the underlying qualities of thought and literary style. As such the book is technical and critical, well adapted to the use of careful students of American Literature. To the average reader it will hardly be found entertaining. (Charles Scribners Sons, N. Y., $1.50, net.)

OLD MOTHER WEST WIND, by Thornton W. Burgess. In his charming book of stories for children, Mr. Burgess has personified the winds and the various small animals, yet the latter retain their animal characteristics. Old Mother West Wind came down from the purple hills in the golden light of the morning, opened the bag in which were all her children, the merry little breezes, and let them loose, and they began to spin around for very joy; and then the merry little breezes and Johnny Chuck, and Grandfather Frog, and Mrs. Redwing, and Billy Mink, and Reddy Fox, and the Field Mice Children, and Jack Squirrel, and Peter Rabbit, all played together. (Little, Brown & Co., Boston. $1.00.)

THE BROWNIE'S LATEST ADVENTURES, by Palmer Cox. All the Brownie books are unique but Mr. Cox's clever pen, his gift at jingle-turning seem to gain in cleverness and wit with every year; and youngsters of all ages will vote this the jolliest Brownie book yet. There are all the old favorites in the new book, and some new friends; and they help a hospital, and harvest ice, and sow seeds in most novel fashion, and put out a fire, and play many other Brownie pranks. Pictures and verse are done as only Palmer Cox knows how. (Century Co., New York. $1.50.)

German Street Cars

In all my street railway riding in Germany I have not yet seen a crowded street railway car, a writer in the Engineering News says. Only once have I seen passengers standing inside a car. The Germans recognize the necessity of making street railway service flexible, to provide for variations in travel at different times, and they attach trail cars behind the motor cars. In even such small cities as Heidelberg a train consisting of a closed motor car hauling an open trail car is regularly run. American street railways have provided for increased traffic by putting on larger and heavier cars, but the Germans have met the same problem by running trains of two or three cars. The advantages of the German system to the public are extremely great and I believe they are almost as great to the street railway. The floors of German street cars are low, like the American street cars of a dozen years ago. They are far easier to get in and out of than our high-floored American cars, which are designed to accomodate the car builder rather than the convenience of the traveling public. The German street cars are clean. They are even cleaner than the Boston street cars; and those who know how high the Boston street-railway service stands compared with that of most other American cities will appreciate what a compliment this is. Not only are the cars clean, but they are attractive. They are kept well painted and varnished, and they look in fact, like an American car just out of the shops. And not only are the cars clean, but the employes are clean. Their uniforms are immaculate, their brass buttons shining and the men themselves are courteous to a degree that leaves an American dissolved in astonishment.

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

Copyright, 1910, by J. C. Kilner

By M. A. FULTON

(CHAPTER XXII—Continued.)

"Let us not speak of him, Mrs. Johnston. As for Miss Jeanie, we must just hope that in all that concerns her true happiness, she will be guided for the best. And now," he added gravely, "I think I would like to look over today's paper." Without another word, the housekeeper handed him the Glasgow Herald and left the room. But the minister did not read. No sooner was he alone than the paper dropped from his nerveless fingers. His brow contracted in a frown of pain. He stared into the fire with dark, unseeing eyes, while his lips trembled with emotion. At length he bowed his head on his one arm and groaned brokenly—"O God—a wounded spirit—who can bear?" He did not hear the doorbell ring, nor the quiet voices in the hall. He only roused himself with a start and a guilty rush of color to his pale face as Mrs. Johnston threw open the study door and announced, "Mrs. Graeme and Miss Jeanie." With a great effort he controlled himself and advanced to meet them with smiling face and words of welcome.

"So you have been quite alone all day, Mr. Sinclair? So Mrs. Johnston has just told us."

"It has been one of the longest days of my life, too, Mrs. Graeme, and your fault, I think. You see your care and kindness, while I was with you, have just spoiled me for living a solitary life—and what shall I say to you, Jeanie? This is the first time you've come to see me since I returned to the Manse." Jeanie blushed very prettily as she gave him her hand.

"Indeed, Mr. Sinclair, I think our house owes you an apology for having given you no peace, lately. It seemed to me that some of our family was always finding an excuse for invading the Manse."

"A Graeme can never come too often here, Jeanie." He placed chairs for them in the cosiest places and took his favorite position by the mantel-piece, his back to the light and Jeanie full under his eyes.

"Did you hear that Donald's away to Oban, Mr. Sinclair?" inquired Mrs. Graeme.

"Yes—Mrs. Johnston told me, just before you came—nothing wrong with James Douglas, I hope."

"Nothing. He wrote in great spirits the day after he went there." Jeanie could not wait for her mother's calm way of telling of their hopes. With sparkling eyes and glowing cheeks, she bent forward on her chair, exclaiming—

"Oh, Mr. Sinclair, think of it—James believes he has found a clue to the discovery of the forger!" Mr. Sinclair's own face shone as he gazed at her. The thought of Mrs. Johnston's belief that Miss Jeanie was breaking her heart flashed through his mind and he smiled at the thought. Outwardly he answered fervently—"Thank God."

"Of course," added Mrs. Graeme, "he mentioned no name. He just told Donald to come to him with all speed, bringing the forged cheque. His letter put Donald into such a state of excitement that he rushed off at the first possible moment. He meant to come to you, Mr. Sinclair, along with Jeanie. We thought he would return the next day, but a card this morning says both he and James will come in a few more days. Jeanie could wait no longer, so anxious has she been to see you, Mr. Sinclair"

"I am thankful to Donald for having gone, if it makes Jeanie anxious to see me," he said, while his face lit up with that rare smile of his. They laughed. But Jeanie was pale as she answered:

"You know my business, already, I am sure. Father has told you about Donald and John M'Ketridge. I need not say any more about it. It is all too painful. But I have brought you the money. And I shall never cease to be grateful for your goodness to us all. Mother thanks you as much as I do." Her eyes were shining in tears and her voice trembled as she spoke.

"You will never know, Mr. Sinclair," said Mrs. Graeme, in her low, sweet voice, "what you have done for Donald, and for us all, in this world. I believe the lad would have been in a foreign land, long ago, but for you. May God bless you, and grant you your heart's desires."

Mr. Sinclair's dark eyes were full of tender feeling as he listened. He was silent a moment, then he said sadly:

"Your prayer for me may mean much more than you imagine, Mrs. Graeme. As for you, Jeanie, I may confess that I guessed from the first that this money was for Donald. I knew also that the time would come when both you and he would tell me all. You were very brave, child, to bear the burden alone so long——"

"Do you not think," interrupted Mrs. Graeme, "that it would have been wiser of her had she told her mother?"

"You forget that Donald would not consent to her doing so—Mr. Graeme told me everything, you see, just as Donald told him."

"Quite true, Mr. Sinclair—it was not Jeanie's fault. Poor Donald was hiding among the trees, as guilt always does."

"A man may fall and rise again. If I mistake not, Mrs. Graeme, the new Donald will be a braver and a better man than he could ever have been without his bitter experience. He has fought a hard battle and received wounds whose scars will remain always to remind him of the dangers of the way. But his penitence proves him conqueror. Henceforth he will not only strive to be a true man himself, but he will do all that in him lies to lead others into straight paths." Jeanie's face was shining with eager light as he spoke. When he ceased, in words scarcely above a whisper, she inquired:

"Then you do not now suspect Donald of having committed the forgery?"

"Most assuredly, I now believe him to be innocent. And even if this clue, which James Douglas believes he has discovered, should lead to nothing, yet I feel that Donald is at last speaking out the whole truth." Jeanie, with flushed cheeks and shining eyes, looked the thanks she could not utter; while Mrs. Graeme fervently exclaimed:

"God bless you, Mr. Sinclair."

"Yes, but there is more I wish to add—that. even if Donald had done this vile thing under strong temptation, now that he is repentant, it is not for us weak men and women to condemn a fellow creature; I, least of all, whose sin has been deeper than Donald's, whatever he may have done." He spoke as one who meted out to himself stern, inexorable, self-condemnation. Jeanie stared at him incredulous, wonder-eyed. While her mother said, amazedly:

"You, Mr. Sinclair?"

"Yes—I. Listen. For the man who has left me maimed for life, I have felt, deep down in my heart, resentment, which at times has been almost hatred. To be robbed of a strong arm is loss black enough and hard enough to bear. But I fear he has robbed me of that which I had prized more than an arm. I had my dreams of home and happiness. He has shattered them, too. I, the one-armed minister, must go on my way a lonely man for life. Not because I am maimed, though, but because my enemy has won the love of the only woman in the world who could have made me happy. The bitter knowledge has come to me very slowly, but very surely, since I returned to the Manse. I have been through my Gethsemane, and, like my Master, an angel has been with me to strengthen me. For your sake, Jeanie, I forgive Archie Monteith everything, and can sincerely wish him happiness, because it means yours also." Jeanie's face was tremulous with emotion. The color came and went in her cheeks. Her eyes were radiant through unshed tears. Her lips parted, as if to speak but she could not utter a word. He had never seen her so beautiful. It was the moment of greatest misery in his life, yet he smiled as he said gently:

"You are glad that I have forgiven him, Jeanie?"

Suddenly words came to her.

"Glad," she said. "Glad—oh, my heart is overflowing with joy."

"He is so much to you?" said he, and the light faded from his own face.

"Oh, Mr. Sinclair, can you not understand? The man I love is even more noble than I thought."

"What has Mr. Monteith done, Jeanie, to prove himself noble?"

"I was not thinking of my cousin Archie. I never loved him," she said, with downcast eyes. The minister bent forward eagerly, his face shining with hope:

"Oh, Jeanie, is my love not in vain?" She lifted her eyes to his. It was enough. The next moment, regardless of her mother's presence, he was kissing the fair, upturned face. He would never think of himself as the one-armed minister any more.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The shop was closed for the night and Mr. Graeme, expecting to find his wife and daughter in the drawing-room, made his way there with slow, spiritless steps. But the room was empty and the fire burnt low. He poked it viciously, as if it were to blame for his depression, put on more coal, and then threw himself wearily into an easy chair, and fell a-brooding. Donald's confession, strengthened as it was by John M. Ketridge, failed to bring peace to his mind regarding the forgery. The money borrowed by Jeanie from Mr. St. Clair had gone to Mr. Ketridge, right enough. But this only made it all the blacker for Donald. If the gambling craze had got possession of him, was it not highly probable that he had fallen a prey to other gamesters as well? Though Mr. Sinclair had tried to persuade him of the young man's innocence, yet in his own heart, thought the miserable father, the minister believed Donald guilty. So weighed down was the good man under the burden of his sorrow, that when his wife and daughter presently returned home, they found him haggard and despondent and as woe-be-gone as if the world held for him nothing worth living for. Jeanie swiftly came to his side and knelt down.

"Father" was all she said, but her face was radiant. He was roused in a moment.

"Jeanie, ye hae something to tell me. Have ye heard frae Donald? Can he clear himsel'?"

"Dear father, how can you look so sad when the whole world is full of joy. Oh, what am I to have received such happiness?" Rising from her knees she whispered to her mother, "tell him" and hastened from the room.

"Wife, what's come tae the lassie?"

"The knowledge that a good man loves her, and wants her to be his wife."

"Archie?"

"Archie's not in it. Poor fellow, I know now why she could'nt care for him."

"Jamie Douglas maybe?" Mrs. Graeme smiled, though her eyes glistened in tears.

"Mr. Sinclair" she said softly. David Graeme rose to his feet. He drew himself to his full height. The look of anxiety dropped from his face as if it had been a mask. Lifting one hand imploringly he said:

"'Lizabeth, don't mock me. Is it true that the minister has asked oor bairn tae be his wife?"

"It is true, David. I was there and gave them my blessing. But oh, to think of it, our bonnie Jeanie is going to marry a one-armed man! I could have wished it otherwise."

"'Lizabeth, I wonder at ye. Airm or no airm I could wish nae better man for Jeanie. An' I'm sensible of the great honor he has done us a' in wishing to make her his wife. But I'm no' sure that it would be right for me to give my consent."

"David?"

"The meenister's name shouldna be linked wi' anither that's tarnished beyond help."

"Will you be the last to believe our son is innocent David? Mr. Sinclair has not a doubt about Donald. Should that not be enough for you?"

"Ay, but the proof, wife, where's the proof?" As if in answer to his question, there was a loud peal at the door bell. The next moment, eager feet were heard ascending the stairs, and James Douglas and Donald literally burst into the room. Jeanie heard the joyful greetings amid her own happy musings, and flew downstairs to welcome them.

"Why Jamie," exclaimed Mr. Graeme "ye're only a week awa' an' ye're a new man already."

"New? I'm nothing short o' a conquering hero! Sit down one and a' till I tell ye o' my conquest."

"You must have supper first, lads. It's a long way from Oban."

"Hear till yer mither, Donald. She thinks that meat an' drink wad be better than the news we hae to tell."

"It will not be all news to mother, Jamie," answered Donald.

"If yer news is guid, let's hear it. Supper can wait" said Mr. Graeme.

"Supper never was like this, maister. See I am coming hame like a hielan' chieftain o' long ago, wi' an important prisoner in me grip—Richard Smith, nae less! What think ye o' these, Mr. Graeme?" He laid on the table the forged cheque and the envelope addressed "Mr. Richard Smith." Mr. Graeme put on his spectacles, while Jeanie and her mother bent breathlessly over the writing.

"Written by the same hand, but disguised in the cheque," murmured Jeanie.

"It's not Donald's writing. Thank God," said Mrs. Graeme. Mr. Graeme examined the writing long and critically. At last he said slowly, "The same hand wrote them both, who's to prove who that was?"

"You are, maister," said James.

"I? How?"

"Do ye remember the frosty morning that ye asked Miss Jeanie here, tae address letters for ye in the office. A kind-hearted freen wadna allow her tae sit in the cauld. He wad gang tae the ends o' the earth tae save her one hour's unpleasantness. The black-herted, lying deevil, when he was crushing the joy oot o' her very life by letting her brither, an innocent man, bear the blame o' his crime. Forgive me, Mr. Graeme, for being in such a passion, but I canna tholl tae think o' the double dyed villain." He paused and wiped his brow. Mr. Graeme was breathing hard.

"Take care Jamie," he said "how ye lay the blame on Erchie. Much as I would like tae see ma ain son cleared, I would not like it done at the expense o' an innocent man."

"Innocent? The hertless scoonrel—the black wolf who came prowlin' after your white lamb. It wasna Donald he wanted tae injure, but me. Ma word, but it's fitting that it's by me the mask's torn off an' the criminal brought tae justice."

"Be calm, Jamie," said Donald. "Tell your story from the beginning. Don't you see they do not understand you."

"How can I keep calm, man, when I think o' it? But I'll try. Well maister, you mind that ye telt me tae see if the letters were a' stamped an' sealed. Then I was tae post them wi' me ain hands. Ye mind how I brocht ye ane and asked ye for anither cover. I had ta'en off the cover addressed by the forger's hand tae Richard Smith. It lies before ye there, an' yer ain lips hae said it's written by the man who forged the cheque. Heaven only kens how I got tae the post office that day an' back. For nigh a week past, I had been creepy an' headachy, but frae the instant I saw that address my brain seemed afire. Before night, as ye'll a' remember I was helpless in my bed. When my long sickness was past an' I could think; I made up my mind tae wait an' see Mr. Sinclair aboot it. Then I went tae Oban. I was but ae night there when a thing flashed on my memory that had clean escaped my mind since the month o' August last. It was the day Mr. Sinclair came back frae the motor tour wi' his brither. It was the first time he had seen Miss Jeanie from she left school. We were a' at tea when he came in. Erchie was there a' politeness. I watched him when Mr. Sinclair's face lit up at sight o' Miss Jeanie, an' I said tae mysel' 'the deil's looking oot o' his twa e'e.' I left the table in a rage, and returned to ma work, an' I was thumpin' the sugar bags so I wonder they didna burst. When Mr. Erchie lounged into the shop an' says he with a lordly air, 'Could I have writing materials, James? I want to send a letter by next mail.' The maister was crachin' upstairs wi' the minister. I told Erchie tae gang into the office, he would find what he wanted there. The next day the forged cheque was cashed in the bank. What do ye think o't noo, maister?" he concluded triumphantly.

"It looks black for Erchie. Donald, my son, can you pardon yer auld faither for the wrong he's done ye?" Donald stretched out both hands eagerly and grasped his father's.

"It was no wonder you doubted me, father. I deserved it." Then he placed an arm round his mother and Jeanie and kissed them both, though neither could speak for tears.

"It's a joyful supper we're having," said James again, wiping his hot brow. "But tell us maister when are ye going tae put these papers into the hands of the police?"

"Saftly, Jamie, he's oor ain flesh an' blood. I'll send for him the morn, and hear what he has tae say for himself." Suddenly Donald's eyes flashed with anger and he exclaimed bitterly:

"Father, when you thought me guilty, you were ready to banish me to the ends of the earth, but when black suspicion rests on Archie you seem quick with your forgiveness. It is most unjust."

"Hush, Donald, and be slow to lay blame tae yer auld faither. If Sawtan himsel' had done it, I could gladly forgie him, jist oot o' thankfulness that ma ae son is an honest man."

CHAPTER XXIV.

The Last Link.

"Hilloa! James Douglas. Is it really you in the flesh, or is it a wraith that I see before me?"

"Nae mair a wraith than you are yersel', Maister Gordon. Though I'll allow that ma cloes dinna fit sae weel as they used tae do. But that'll come in time, like ither things tae them that wait."

"I'm real glad to see you so fit, James, after your long illness. But this is no day for you to be out for it's fair raining frost. Come away to my den and crack awee."

"Thank ye kindly Maister Gordon, not this evening. It is half past five now, and I promised Mrs. Graeme that I'd be hame by six o'clock."

"I'll not keep you ten minutes, James. Do you know, I was just going to call at Graeme's to see you, when we chanced to meet. It may be a matter of importance to you—or maybe to myself in the long run, ha! ha! No such luck for poor Gordon. The man wi' the motor has cut us all out, Jamie, and yet—and yet, the bonnie lassie is growing more and more like a snowdrop every day."

"If it's Miss Jeanie ye mean, Maister Frank Gordon, ye may keep yer pity tae yersel'. She's no ane tae be caught wi' dross. As for the motor-car, she thinks nae mair o't than if 'twas a whirlbarrow. There's something better in store for her than a whited sepulchre."

"You're a man after my own heart, James. I never could bear the glint of yon fellow's e'en. And Hornie himself couldn't be more jealous minded. But come away, I have something to show you." They were at the door of his lodgings as he spoke, and Frank Gordon quickly led Jamie to his own room. Unlocking a drawer, he produced a cabinet sized photograph.

"What think ye o' that, James Douglas?" he inquired, holding it under the gaslight.

"Archie Monteith!" exclaimed Jamie. "Where did you get it?"

"The first snap-shot taken in my summer holidays. Not bad for an amateur, is it? In truth I was so pleased with it that I enlarged it as you see."

"But where—where was he when you caught this. It looks like somewhere I know."

"Ay, you ought to know it, seeing you have done there many a time, what he was doing that day. Could you count how many times, James, you have cashed a cheque in the Bank of Brigend?" Jamie Douglas jumped to his feet, his eyes ablaze with excitement. "For Heaven's sake Frank Gordon, can you tell me the date?"

"Right well I can, my dear fellow. The first day of my summer holidays, the eighth of August, half-past ten o'clock in the morning under bright sunshine. Anything else?" Jamie was grasping a chair back with one hand to steady himself. In the other he held the photograph at which he glared wildly.

"Yes, yes" he cried "something else I must know. It is of the utmost importance. Can you find out for me the amount of money he drew from the bank that day?"

"I have found it for you already James. The cashier and myself are good friends as well as fellow-lodgers. You can tell Mr. David Graeme that light-headed, glib-tongued Frank Gordon has now found for him the missing link in a chain that he has been trying to piece together for months."

"But for why hae ye been silent sae long, Maister Gordon?" said James sternly.

(To be continued.)

The Flying Hours

Twelve little birds fly by in a row—
  Bright little birds are they;
Shining and free and as blue as can be,
  And these are the hours of the day.
The sun shines warmly across their wings
  As they flutter their way along,
And now and again, in their joy of things,
  They carol a daytime song.
Twelve little owls fly by in a row—
  Silent and dark their flight;
Gray little things with shadowy wings,
  And these are the hours of the night.
But the last of them all, as he hovers low,
  Is flushed with a radiant pink,
This is the good little sunrise owl—
  I like him the best, I think.

Moses

BY FAY STUART.

Helen ran into the house in breathless excitement, "Oh, grandma!" she cried, "Topsy has a chicken out in the barn and it is all snuggled up beside little Bobbie, just come and see."

"For pity sake!" exclaimed grandma in a flurry, "I never knew Topsy to touch a chicken before. Run quick, Helen, and tell your grandpa! I cannot leave these doughnuts, I wouldn't have believed that Topsy would touch a chicken."

"But, grandma, Topsy isn't hurting the chicken; I think she's just adopted it, that is all," explained Helen.

Grandma Major looked sharply at her over the top of her spectacles.

"You are not telling a fairy tale, child?" she demanded.

"Why no, grandma, it's really, truly so. Grandpa is out in the barn now looking at her. Push the kettle back and come and see," urged Helen earnesly.

Sure enough! In the corner where grandpa had made her a soft nest of hay, lay old Topsy-cat with little black Bobbie and a pretty yellow chicken. She looked up, purring contentedly as grandma and Helen entered.

"Well, I never saw anything to equal that in my life!" cried grandma. "How do you suppose it happened, David?"

"Well, you see, Lucy, it was like this. I had eleven chicks left in the brooder and it didn't seem worth while to keep it heated for so few, so I took 'em out and gave 'em to a hen yesterday. She acted as though she would take 'em all right and I went off and left her. About an hour afterward, I went back and that pesky idiot of a hen had picked the eyes out of ten of those chicks. There they lay, dead as door nails, all smashed to pieces! I could have killed that hen with good relish. I didn't pay very much attention to the one little fellow that was left and while I was picking up the dead ones I lost sight of him. The next time I went to the barn, there he was all cuddled up with Topsy and her kitten. I suppose he wandered in there and Topsy took him into her nest. I didn't say anything about it last night, Lucy, for I knew you'd be so worried you wouldn't get a wink of sleep. But I watched 'em, off and on, all the morning and I've made up my mind that Topsy will make a better mother than that old hen. Curious, ain't it?"

"I always did say that Topsy knew as much as some folks," replied grandma.

Harold ran into the kitchen and returned with a saucer of milk. At once the trio surrounded the dish and drank the milk hungrily. The twins laughed merrily as they watched the strange family at dinner.

Then Topsy called her children back into the nest and gave them a good washing. The yellow chicken had to take his scrubbing as well as Bobbie.

"We ought to give him a name," suggested Helen.

"All right," agreed Harold, "and I know a dandy one. We will call him Moses."

Helen looked doubtful. "I don't think that Moses is a very pretty name, Harold," she objected.

"Well, but don't you remember the Sunday school lesson about Moses?" argued Harold. "All the other babies were being killed, but Moses was hid in the little ark among the bulrushes and so he lived to grow up. All the other baby chickens are killed and I think this fellow ought to be called little Moses."

"All right," said Helen, "let's call him Moses. Only I thought Marigold would be very nice because he is so yellow."

By-and-by, the kitten and chicken began to have funny frolics together. The little black kitten, so fat that it tumbled clumsily about, and the fluffy ball of yellow down, would chase each other all around the barn floor. They rolled and frisked about in the hay until they were tired; then they would lie down beside patient old Topsy and go sound asleep.

The three often wandered about the yard together and Moses seemed to prefer the cat's company to that of the barnyard fowl, even when he was quite grown up.

"Moses is almost as good a pet as Jim Crow," decided Helen.

"Well, I don't know but you are right," said Grandpa Major.

The Boy Scout

Mr. Ralph D. Blumenfeld of the London Daily Express, writing in the Outlook, says of the effects of the Boy Scout movement in England: "It has wrought a revolution in British manners and ways of thought. The discovery of the boy has not only changed the nature of the boy for the better, but has so improved him that he now sets a national standard.

"There is the point of honor. 'A scout's honor is to be trusted.' It is the old law of the knights newly revived, gloriously resurrected. There is the matter of day-by-day helpfulness. It was common to hear, in the days before the scout movement, how people were drowned in rivers, ponds, or canals, with crowds helplessly looking on. Now that all scouts are taught to swim and to rescue the drowning, they have set a new fashion in life-saving. Every day in England the papers report some fresh deed of scout gallantry or heroism, a deed to be traced back to the age-old ideal of chivalry newly set up before Britain's boyhood. In the first four months of this year eighty-four medals were awarded to scouts for gallantry in saving life. * * *

"One is conscious also in England today of a new spirit of love for wild creatures, of pity for the helpless animals. All scouts are trained to be merciful to beasts of burden, to be prompt in interfering if a man is working a lame horse, to respect the sanctuaries of the birds in trees and hedge.

"Wherefore, in building their own characters, in learning self-respect, the scouts are slowly strangling that curse and that age-old menace of English liberty—the foul thing, servility. The boy becomes a man. What he is taught in his impressionable age he carries with him through life; and so we see in this Boy Scout movement the reflection of the knights of chivalry, we see him going about the world looking for the chance of helping others."

There are nine points in Scouts' Law, as follows:

1. A scout's honor is to be trusted. If he declares: "On my honor it is so," that settles it.

2. A scout is loyal. The obligation of loyalty embraces country and rulers, parents, employers, and scout masters.

3. A scout's duty is to be useful and to help others. He must try his best to do a good turn to somebody each day.

4. A scout is a friend to all and a brother to every other scout, no matter to what social class the other belongs. He must eschew snobbery and cultivate democratic good fellowship.

5. A scout is courteous. He must, furthermore, take no reward for his courtesy; this means "no tips."

6. A scout is a friend to animals. He must not give pain to any creature unnecessarily.

7. A scout obeys orders. He must, too, render obedience without question; but after carrying out an order he may state reasons for objecting to it.

8. A scout smiles and whistles under all circumstances. The duty of cheerfulness is second only to that of obedience.

9. A scout is thrifty. He opens a savings bank account.

"O Little Child! Lie Still and Sleep!"

"O little child! lie still and sleep!
  Jesus is near,
  Thou needst not fear;
No one need fear whom God doth keep
  By day or night;
Then lay thee down in slumber deep
  Till morning light.

"O little child! be still and rest!
  He sweetly sleeps
  Whom Jesus keeps;
And in the morning wake so blest
  His child to be;
Love every one, but love Him best
  Who first loved thee."

S. E. Fisher, of University Place Church, writes that in their Bible study and teacher training courses, the enrollment of university students is larger than ever before. Among the courses of study is one on the International Lessons.

A mass meeting of all the churches of Denver, Colo., was held at Central Church, October 9, to consider the plan of organization and co-operation which has been adopted by the ministers, and which will be recommended to the churches.

The Bible study classes of First Church, Beatrice, Neb., have opened for the winter season. These classes have been conducted for the past four years, and the courses of mission study have covered the fields and forces in nearly every country of the world. The pastor, J. E. Davis, has the work in charge.

G. B. Baird, writing from Luchowfu, China, says, "We held our quarterly conference of Chinese helpers of Luchowfu district in September. We had some very helpful talks and discussed plans for both old and new work. The general topic was 'Evangelistic Work in the Hospital.' This is a great and promising field."

Boulder, Colo., Sunday-school leads the state. When A. L. Ward became minister of the First Church, Boulder, three years ago, there were 127 in the Sunday-school. On Sunday, October 2, there were 627. The offering was $80 to be given to the Colorado Orphans Home at Denver. This school has not fallen below 300 in the past three months.

A "leadership movement" banquet was given at Central Church, Terre Haute, Ind., October 5. The purpose of the movevment is to acquaint the members with church finance and general church work, and as superiority is developed, members better equipped will be appointed on committees as heads and teachers of Sunday-school classes. The meeting was addressed by S. S. Lapin of Cincinnati, Ohio.

At his first service as pastor of Centennial Church, Bloomington, Ill., Milo Atkinson, chose as his subject "The Successful Church." He spoke at length on the growing optimism of the work of the church, the most hopeful sign of which is the dying out of religious prejudice, and the growing spirit of fraternity which is drawing men together in the demonstration of the truth which Jesus taught and lived.

The church at Lawton, Okla., is making gains in every department under the leadership of O. R. Spicer. Ninety-four have been added to the membership at the regular services in the past eight months. The Sunday-school had over 300 present at their rally day service. A new parsonage has been built, and the church building remodeled. These outward signs all manifest an increased activity in the spiritual life of its members.

The church at Pendleton, Ore., has called J. W. Vandewalker, formerly of Mento, Kans. He has accepted and is now on the field. This is one of the good churches in Oregon and the outlook is very encouraging.

H. C. Bobbitt is conducting a meeting at Columbus, Ga., under the auspices of Central Church. The meetings are held in Chase Conservatory auditorium in order that the audiences be accommodated. Mrs. Bobbitt has charge of the singing.

Second Church, Terre Haute, Ind., is in a promising meeting under the leadership of the minister, Geo. J. Ruth, assisted by Charles E. McVay, soloist. Mr. McVay has organized two efficient choruses, which are a great aid to the musical part of the services.

The English School for Russians, New York, has begun its third year, starting with three classes. This school is under the direction of the Disciples Missionary Union of New York and is located at 63 East Second street. Students are taught to speak, read and write the English language.

An evangelistic meeting began October 9, in Second Church, Bloomington, to continue for several weeks. S. H. Zendt, the pastor, is in general charge of the services and is assisted in the singing by H. A. Browning of Queen City, Mo.

Twenty-one years of continuous service as organist is the record of Mrs. B. H. Grayston, of Central Church, Huntington, Ind. Since she has refused to accept pay for her services, the congregation recently presented her with a purse containing a considerable sum, recently, as an expression of appreciation.

W. H. Waggoner gave a week of instruction in missionary and Bible study recently, at First Church, Danville, Ill. While given under the auspices of this congregation, it was intended to be undenominational in character, and all other churches were invited to participate in order to make the work as much of a union affair as possible.

The congregation of Third Church, Indianapolis, Harry G. Hill, minister, will occupy their new building on Broadway, November 6. This edifice when completed will represent an outlay of $85,000 and is splendidly equipped for institutional work. Several features of this work are already carried on, and the growing demand for this service has led to the erection of the larger building.

Arthur Braden, who was compelled to resign the presidency of Keuka College on account of ill health, is now located at New Castle, Pa. Several months rest has restored Mr. Braden to his usual health, and he will do evangelistic work temporarily while deciding on a pastorate. He begins a meeting on October 30, at Tabernacle Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., of which G. H. Steed is pastor.

At the annual rally day service of First Church, Mexico, Mo., Congressman Champ Clark occupied the pulpit in the place of W. A. Shullenberger, the newly-installed pastor. Mr. Clark spoke on the subject, "The World is Getting Bigger," in connection with the parable of the good Samaritan, and decried the spirit of those who claim that the world is growing worse, pointing out the many just causes for optimism in the progress of the world in every line of endeavor.

A. L. Ward, who is teaching a Bible class in the University of Colorado, reports the largest number of students who are Disciples, that have ever been in the university. There is an effort being made to found a Union Theological Seminary at Boulder, in connection with the state university. Mr. Ward has been appointed by the ministerial union of the city to confer with President Baker of the university. Doctor Baker is very much interested in this work having attempted such a work as early as 1892.

S. M. Perkins, of Davenport, Iowa, according to certain press reports, has come to believe that churches do not advertise enough. Recently, as an experiment, he visited a number of houses in different localities, inquiring the location of First Church of which he is pastor. The answers were for the most part ambiguous, some having never heard of it. As a result the numbers of his congregation have planned a systematic campaign of advertising for the coming season. Mr. Perkins occupied the pulpit at one of the Presbyterian churches in Topeka, Kans., during the recent convention.

Dr. and Mrs. H. W. Breeden, with the Lintts, recently held a short meeting in Missoula, Mont., where W. H. Bagby ministers. Despite the short time of preparation, the meeting was an uplifting one. In addition to the gain in membership, the church for the first time in its history is free from indebtedness, $2,700 having been subscribed. These evangelistic workers have been invited to return next year for a meeting and at a congregational meeting it was decided to begin at once to get ready for this meeting, by entering heartily into the support of the regular services in the interim.

W. S. Johnson, the newly appointed pastor of Waterloo, Iowa, was given a reception on his installation, being extended a welcome by the members of the ministerial association. This growing cordiality among the ministers in a community, fostered by the growth of ministerial alliances, is doing much to destroy the doctrinal prejudices of past generations, and is a sign gladly welcomed by every friend of Christian union. There is no gainsaying that the truths that are essential to our highest development must ever be unifying, and not divisive forces, and so the Christ ideal must take the place of dogmatic utterance.

Is the Ministry Losing Popular Respect?

One of the very apparent contrasts between the church life of Great Britain and the United States is the difference in the popular attitude toward the minister. There the ministry is respected for the sake of the office over and above the merit of the minister as a man. Here the man counts everything. Dr. J. H. Shakespeare, the London Baptist leader, in a recent comment on this contrst, frankly criticized the American ministry for its "hale fellow well met" character and suggested that the white tie and frock coat of the English minister was to be preferred to the business man's dress affected by the American preacher. Now comes Dr. J. S. Wrightnour, writing in The Baptist Commonwealth and saying that the lack of reverence given the minister in this country is due to the unbecoming deportment of the minister. He rehearses several illustrations, among them the following:

"I have known, during sessions of associations, or other gatherings of that character, such a buzz of laughter and small talk among the ministers in the vestibules as seriously to disturb the religious services in progress in the adjoining room, which the gossipers should, indeed, be attending. I have known ministers in the pulpit during public worship to be whispering together, or a pastor in a prayer meeting hunting a hymn during a prayer by some other brother, or moving about from place to place, or sitting, with head bowed, indeed, but with eyes wide open and thoughts evidently elsewhere. Yet the people are expected to be reverent and silent. I have known ministers so 'genial' as to divest themselves of nearly all dignity in their relations with the people, perhaps seeking ceiving it. I have even known some such very popular fellows to retail slightly off-color stories in some smoking-room (with deep shame I say it) and to be familiarly known everywhere by their first names. I knew of one who was known far and near only (let us say) as 'Fitz'—his name (let us say) 'Fitzpatrick.' All this at the cost of a certain sacrifice of the true influence of the sacred office. Not only is influence to be considered, but right influence; and something better than influence—power, sacred power. Many years ago, Jacob Knapp, who, in his day, was instrumental in the conversion of many thousands, was a guest at the home of one who was afterward a member of my congregation. From her I learned that he was always genial and friendly, but he went from his room (where, for sometimes half a day, he insisted on being undisturbed) to the pulpit very much as Moses came down from the mount after he had talked with God. In another house in the same congregation, many years after the days of Knapp, two alleged evangelists, working together, were guests. Before and after 'pleading for souls' with tears more or less real, in the meeting, they made a practice of spending several hours in their room amid tobacco-smoke, telling all sorts of stories, with peals of laughter. Is it any wonder that 'converts' oftentimes know little of the real power of the gospel, and as for reverence for the ministry, they have it not?"

THE MAKE-BELIEVES.

Make-believe houses are nicest;
Make-believe stories are best;
Make-believe rides last the longest,
Make-believe folk are all dressed
In make-believe garb of the finest;
Make-believe boys never tease;
Make-believe girls are politest;
And make-believe children say "please!"

—St. Nicholas.

Fear the Betrayer

By Rebecca Smylie

It is said that a general at the battle of San Juan Hill noticed a volunteer, a mere boy, panic-stricken under the rain of Mauser bullets and the thunder of Spanish artillery. The officer dismounted, spoke encouraging words to the young recruit, directed his aim again and again, and commended his returning steadiness, until the man in him awoke and the boy found himself a soldier.

Fear may make a coward of a soldier or a liar of a child. Fear and subterfuge are running mates, and often the terrified child, overtaken in a faault, is betrayed into the hands of deceit. The encouragement to find his best self is not given, he is overwhelmed at his weakest moment by wrathful accusation, and, with no time to collect his small fortitude, no word to help rally his courage, no hand steading his aim, to avert the storm, he lies.

A boy of six, sensitive, naturally truthful, and with a sincere desire to do the right, had great fear of his father's anger. One day, in getting a little flag from a mantel, he overturned and broke a picture frame. Before he could tell his trouble to any sympathetic ear his father came, and he joined the other children with his burden unshared. The father soon found the shattered glass on the hearth, and with a retributive air proceeded to determine the culprit. Each child gave a frightened denial, and, pained as well as angry, the father sought his wife's room. One of the children had told a lie; he meant to discover which one and inflict severe punishment, or else he would punish all.

" I think the one who did it will tell at bedtime," she said. "Let us leave it till then."

Dinner was a dreary meal, and the subdued quartet were ready for bed early,—all but Jamie. He begged for a few minutes more, and then a few more, even after the others were tucked away, until, the nurse gone, the mother said, "Now, dear, hadn't we better have it over?"

Suddenly the fountains of his soul were broken up: "Oh mama, I can't go to bed till I say my prayers, and I can't pray till I've told you. I broke the frame, and I told papa a lie."

"Dear, I knew, but I wanted you to tell me."

"I started to tell you right away, but papa came, and—I was so afraid, he seemed so cross."

"And then you told the lie."

"I was afraid. Oh, why do I get so scared?"

"You will be braver next time, I feel sure. Are you sorry, dear?"

"So sorry. Can you love me any more, mama?"

"Dearly. But I'm sorry, too, for the lie. I hope you won't tell another."

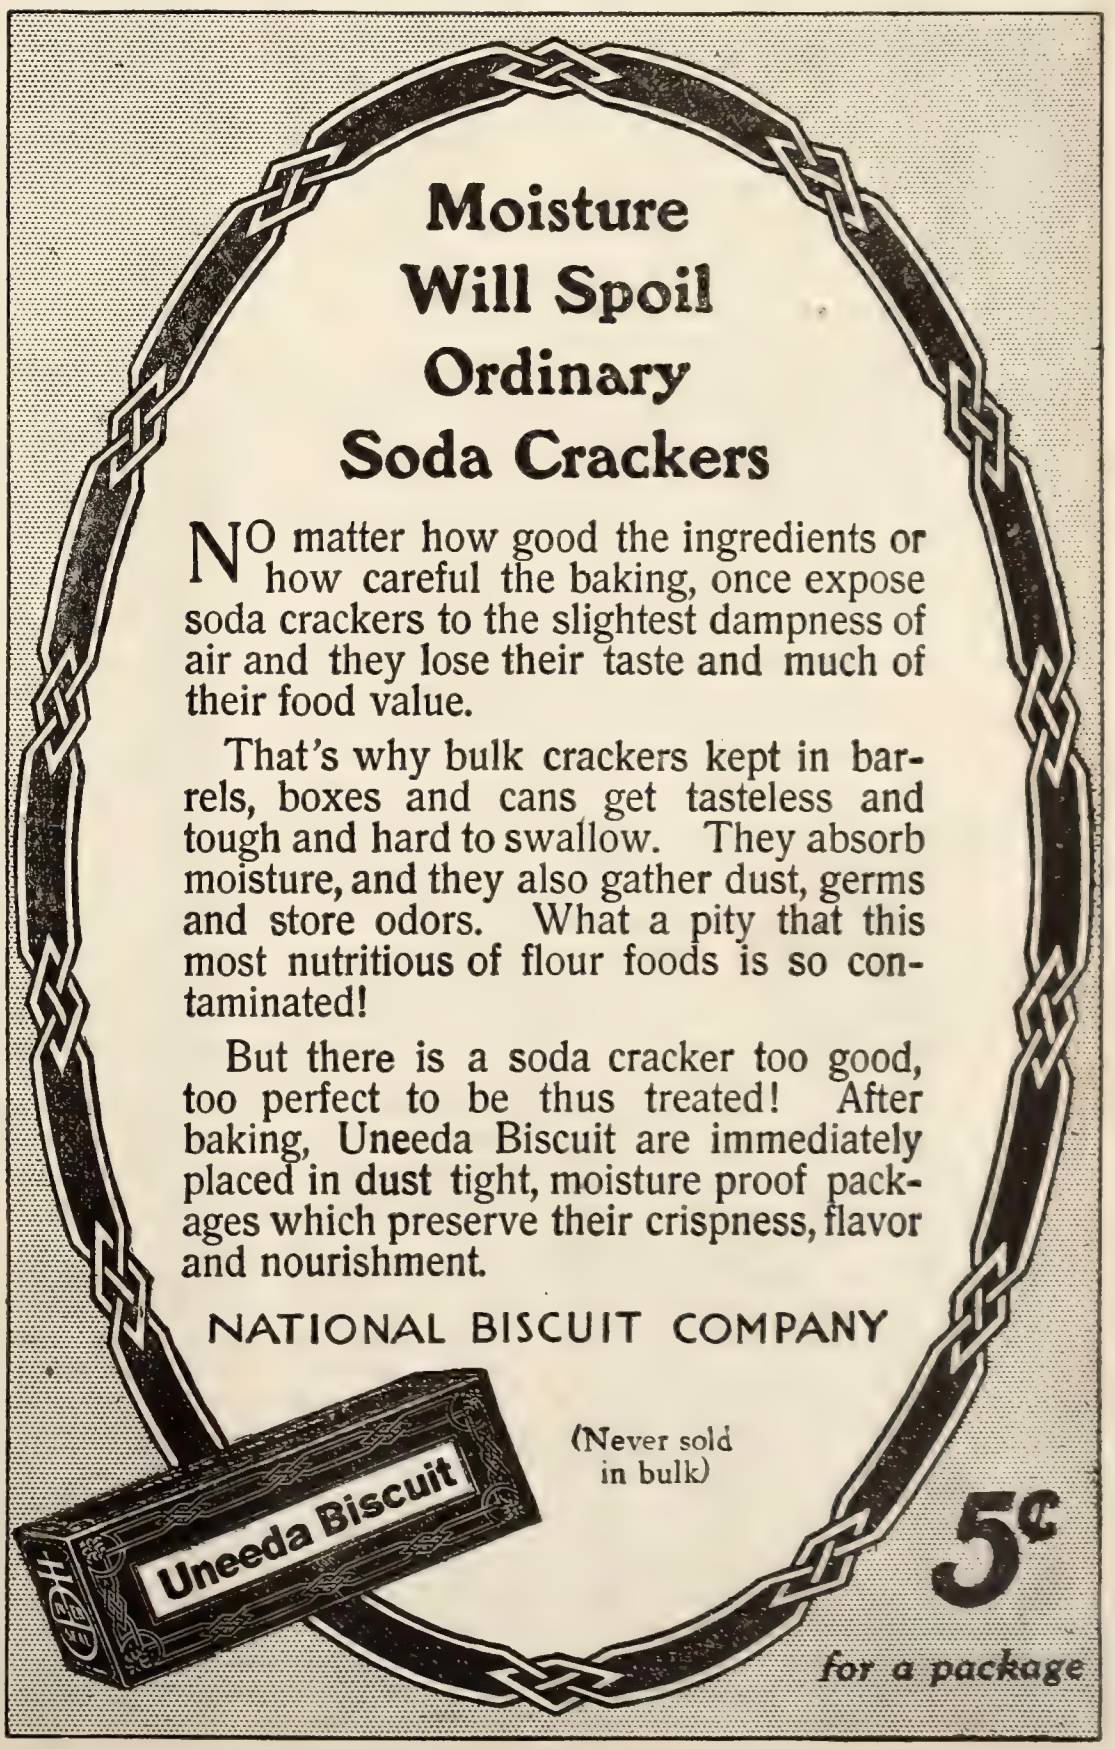
"I don't believe I will. I think I'll get braver,—don't you? What must I do about papa?"

"Tell him yourself in the morning."

"He'll whip me,"—in a frightened whisper.

"Well, then, be a brave boy and bear it. We are bound to pay in some way for misdoing, and the highest price we ever pay is for a lie. Do you know what I mean?"

"I think I do. But mama, I believe I love you so much because I want to tell you things, even when I'm naughty."



Love casteth out fear—yes, and remember that is reversible.—The Sunday-school Times.

Almost a year, counting a working year as 300 days, has been wasted by the Chicago building trades unions in jurisdictional and sympathetic strikes in the construction of the new Northwestern railroad station and the new city hall. In that time nearly $400,000 was lost in wages. The combined loss of time on both buildings is 270 days. To this will be added probably several weeks more by reason of the present jurisdictional trouble at the Northwestern depot. The strikers who quit recently make ten trades and a total of 400 men now on strike. There is no question of wages at stake. All this expensive delay is caused in the latest instance by a row between the members of the roofers' union and the building laborers. The labor world will like the "house divided against itself," fall, unless the internal dissensions that are continually in progress cease ere long.

One of the first questions with which the approaching session of Congress will be called upon to grapple will be to determine when the next apportionment of members of the House of Representatives under the recent census shall be made. The Constitution requires that a reapportionment shall follow each decennial enumeration of the people, and accordingly a redistribution of seats in the House membership has taken place hitherto soon after the conclusion of each census. Before the time for the meeting of Congress the result of the November elections will have become known. If the Democrats should come into control of the House for the Sixty-third Congress they would naturally resist any effort to have the change made by the present Republican Congress, while the Republicans would be as anxious to have the service performed while they were in control of legislation in both houses.

It evidently costs something to run for the governorship of a state as well as for the United States Senate. Governor-elect, Hoke Smith, of Georgia, spent a total of $17,596.10 incident to the recent primary election, of which he paid $10,489.63 out of his own pocket. The rest was contributed by friends. Governor Joseph M. Brown spent in the same campaign, $3,950.75, of which he paid $3,300.75 out of his own pocket, the balance being contributed by members of his family. The salary of the governor is only $5,000 a year; hence the governor-elect paid out of his own pocket incident to his campaign $489.63 more than he will receive as salary from the state during the two years he will be in office. The good things of life come high.

The strike of 44,000 coal miners in Illinois, which was settled recently, it is estimated cost the miners $12,000,000 in wages. The loss to the operators during the five months' shut down is placed at $15,000,000. The annual production of coal in Illinois amounts to 50,000,000 tons and the shortage this year due to the strike will be in the neighborhood of 20,000,000 tons.

Christian Citizenship

A Sermon

BY G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D. D.

III.—The Building of the City.

"The city which hath the foundations, whose Builder and Maker is God."—Hebrews 11:10.

This is now the third Sunday evening that we have turned to the subject of Christian citizenship.

Speaking on the first evening from the words occurring in this same letter, "We have not here an abiding city," we considered the reason why men of faith have always had to make that affirmation; and have to make it still. The cities of men are cities in which the principle of selfishness is the master principle; and the law of life is that of the survival of the strongest; and the character of the citizens is to a large extent that of sordidness. The pilgrims of faith are those who have entered into life by self-death; who believe not only in the survival of the fittest—in that—but also in the possibility of the salvation of the most unfit; and whose law of life is that of sacrifice. Therefore such can find no abiding city in the world.

We then considered the true attitude of the pilgrims of faith toward the cities of men. While it is true that "we have not here an abiding city," this also ought to be true concerning us. "We seek after the city which is to come"; not by gazing at the stars and waiting for the coming of a city; not by seclusion from the ordinary and everyday life of these cities of men; but by first seeing the vision of the ultimate purpose of God, and then by the response of life to all that visions means, the realization within the individual experience of the principles of the Divine Kingdom; and finally by earnest, actual, persistent effort in harmony with these things.

Chaos of the Present City.

Now all this has seemed to be most excellent; but we are constrained to say: "What of the chaos and misery in the midst of which we live? What of the sad habit of the Christian Church of withdrawing itself from the great centers of the life of the city? Or, what—and this is perhaps the question which overwhelms us most often—What after all can be the value of our small contribution toward the building of the city of God and the bringing in of His Kingdom?"

The answer to all these suggestions is contained within the compass of our text, "The city which hath the foundations, whose Builder and Maker is God?" We shall surely be depressed and overwhelmed unless we learn the lesson which is crystallized into this declaration of the writer of this letter, that the Builder and Maker of the city is God.

The City Not in Heaven.

Let us glance at "The city which hath the foundations," as it was revealed to the Seer of the Galilean Lake in the Isle of Patmos.

The city according to the story of that book is not heaven. Neither is the city to be built in the millennium, but beyond it. I am particularly anxious not to enter into controversy with your mental convictions. The writer may have been mistaken. I am only reminding you of what he wrote. There are no detailed pictures of the millennium in this book. There are descriptions of events, full of awe and sublime majesty and terrible judgment, which usher in the millennial reign; but the millennium itself is dismissed in this book in three or four verses in the chapter preceding that in which we have the story of the city. At the close of the millenium John says that the devil will be loosed again after having been chained for a thousand years. Another period of swift judgment will then fall upon the earth; after which the great white throne and final assize, full of awful majesty.

Beyond all that, as to order, will come the city of God. This city will not be built immediately. The ultimate victory is postponed; not that God has abandoned His work, He is the Architect, the Framer, and He is building, but the victory is not yet. I shall be able to do my day's work better, however, if I can see something of the ultimate victory.

Theocracy and Democracy.

Every city, according to these Eastern figures, had a burgess roll, and this city has its burgess roll. A burgess is one who inhabits a walled town, having a tenement there which is his own property. The burgesses of this city are those whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life. The defiled of every class, such as work abominations and make a lie are excluded.

The vision of this city is that of the great Theocracy which is the true democracy. It is the vision of the true democracy which is the great Theocracy. All is of heaven; the ideal, the process, the realization. It is a city which comes out of heaven. The plan of it was not born in the brain of any man. It is a city entirely of the earth; the material is of the earth, gathered from the earth, returning to the earth. It is the city which Abraham saw but never reached. It is the city toward which all the pilgrims of faith have been looking, and in the building of which they have been co-operating with God by faith, but none of them has reached it.

"These all, having had witness borne to them through their faith, received not the promise." They saw the city, but they have not yet entered it. The goal toward which they ran was not their crowning in heaven, but God's crowning on earth. The city which they saw was not in a land beyond, this to which they hoped to go; but this whole earth, governed by God, from a central city, the metropolis in which God is King, and which, therefore, is the Theocracy, the people constituting the instrument through which in every age he makes known his will. It is therefore the final and ultimate Theocracy. All attempts to realize the democracy apart from God will issue in the most disastrous failure, and every attempt to preach the Theocracy which forgets the democracy, will issue in failure equally disastrous.

God the Framer.

Of this city the Architect and Framer is God. The whole plan is in the mind of God. What that is no man can see finally, perfectly. Some vision has been revealed ever and anon to men of vision, and in the vision they have seen something of the glory. Abraham saw it; Moses saw it; Isaiah saw it; Luther saw the city of God; Cromwell saw the city of God; Mazzini saw the city of God; William Booth has seen the City of God. To take that latest illustration, what drove General Booth into that method which some people, who are near-sighted, criticise—the method connected with the social endeavor? What made him want to care for the flotsam and jetsam of this great city of London and all the cities? What put into his heart the passionate discontent with unholy conditions of life? His vision of the city of God. All the discontent that is constructive is born of a great content with the ultimate purpose of God. To have seen this vision of the city is to be for ever restless in every other city, and so "We have not here an abiding city, but we seek after the city which is to come." The inspiring vision which has created the pilgrims and warriors and builders of faith has been the vision of the city which is in the plan of God.

Superscription On the Cross.

The superscription, "King of the Jews," was written on the Cross in three languages, the Roman, the Hebrew and the Greek There is profound significance in the writing of that superscription in the three great languages of the hour, the languages of the three peoples most powerful in the affairs of men. Hebrew was the language of spiritual religion. Greek was the language of intellectual strength. Latin was the language of imperial empire.

God was building by all those great world powers. God was at work in the midst of the Hebrew religion, in the midst of Greek culture, and at the heart of Roman power. Through all these, there were operative in the world, forces making possible the mission and mastery of Christ. Not idly does Scripture declare that He came in the fulness of times. Let me say a thing that I hesitate to say in this way, lest there should seem to lurk in it something of irreverence, but yet let me say it: Had he come sooner he would have come too soon; had he come later he would have come too late. He came when the Hebrew nation had prepared in the history of the world the great spiritual atmosphere resulting from the monotheistic doctrine of God. The history of that people is a history of persistent sin against God; oh, the greyness of it all. But there is wonderful sunshine in it too. My spirit has been elated in many an hour of study as I have seen the over-ruling of God, the chaos coming to cosmos; God for evermore making the wrath of men to praise Him, and restraining the remainder. However much the Hebrew nation failed, after the captivity they never again set up an idol. Their God was one. When that master spiritual truth was embodied in the world's history, the Christ came. God was building.

Greek and Roman.

Or if we turn to the Greek outlook, and think of the wonderful history of Greek culture and refinement, that history of intellectual giants which made it possible to speak of Athens as the fairest shrine of pagan humanity; if there be no other thing to be said, let this at least be said, the Greek had provided, for that time, a language which was of universal use, in some dialect of which, the story of the Christ could be written, in some dialect of which the messengers of the Cross could preach through all the known world and be understood. God was building. Rome was the center of imperial power, and if you want to know the value of it, read again the Acts of the Apostles and Paul's letters and keep your eye on Paul; mark the restlessness with which he wanted to get to Rome, the eagerness with which he looked towards it, the haste which made him unable to wait, and compelled him to sit down and write the Roman letter. What was it made Paul want to reach Rome? It was not the restlessness of the tourist. It was the passion of the missionary. He knew that from Rome, the strategic center of the world, there were roads leading out to all the known world along which her legions traveled; and he saw that they ought to be captured for the traveling of the legions of the Cross. All the forces contributed to prepare the way for His coming in the fulness of the times. God was building.

Preparation and Failure.

But there was the preparation not only of what these forces contributed; there was the preparation of their failure. Hebrewism, when He came, was degenerated—the home or ritualism and hypocrisy, and the spiritual ideal was not enough to create spiritual religion. By the failure of the past the way was prepared for His coming. The history of Greek intellectualism had become the history of Greek bestiality. When Paul came to Athens he found Epicurean and Stoic philosophers who knew nothing of Epicurius of the original Stoics, men who had degraded their philosophies. Then He came, when the way was prepared for Him by this failure; and his evangel was presently published by the Hellenist-Hebrew Paul, and redeemed all that was best in Greek strength. Rome had failed; voluptuousness and brutality were the two facts of her government. By that failure the way was made for the building of the new empire, for the coming in of the Kingdom, for the proclamation of the new evangel.

A Work Waiting.

There is a great work waiting to be done among our young people. I want someone to write the history of England as Isaiah reveals the history of Judah. I do not think it would be popular in England, but it needs writing; the history of how God has been at work and is at work still, the history of the fact that amid all the chaos and break-up and disruption God is building; a history of the fact that all through the centuries and today God is at work.

This is a dark day, you tell me. There are disappointing things abroad, heartbreaking things abroad; missionary societies languishing for lack of funds, indifference spreading over the Christian church. Away with you; God is building! That is the highest of vision, and if you deny it me, then I will bow my head and die for very heartbreak. But if you will grant it me, I will build, and fight, and sing, because the city will be built, and God's victory will be won.

Tending Toward the Ultimate City.

There are abundant proofs of the tending of humanity toward the ultimate city of God. Do not be at all alarmed at that statement. Some people are very much alarmed. "Do you not think the world is getting worse?" I am asked. Certainly! "But do you not think it is getting better?" I know it is! I mean that in all seriousness. Wheat and darnel, "Let both grow together until the harvest." Some men are always looking at the darnel and they say the world is getting worse. Some men see only the wheat and they say the world is getting better. The man who sees the whole field of the world, sees the darnel and the wheat, he sees that evil is becoming more evil and growing into clearer manisfestation in all its dartardly devilishness, but he sees that the world is being prepared for the coming of the King. I affirm that there are abundant proofs of the tending of humanity toward the city of God.

Spiritual freedom is becoming civic liberty. Divine Fatherhood is whispering the story of human brotherhood.

Not consciously, any more than Greece or Rome of old did consciously prepare for His coming, but surely all the forces are preparing for that advent.

"God's in His heaven," therefore ultimately, finally, "All's right with the world." Failure itself shall prepare the way for the coming triumph. He will again purge His floor and gather the wheat in to garner and burn the chaff. The city will be built, the victory won, God vindicated.

"I looked; aside the dust-cloud rolled—
The Waster seemed the Builder, too;
Upspringing from the ruined old I saw the new.
Take heart! The Waster builds again—
A charmed life old goodness hath;
The tares may perish—but the grain
Is not for death.
God works in all things; all obey
His first repulsion from the night;
Wake thou and watch!
The world is gray with morning light!"

The temperance idea is gaining strength even in European countries. A delegate just returned from the first international congress of brewing at Brussels says: "Signs of a powerful temperance movement in Europe were manifested by 600 delegates at the Brussels conference. Denmark has taken the lead. There the government has placed a premium on temperance by letting through beverages with less than 2 1-2 per cent of alcohol, and taxing all with more. The influence of this great temperance movement is easily seen. In the Scandinavian countries moderation in imbibing is noted everywhere, and Germany, which we usually picture as being a nation of heavy drinkers, is pulling for temperance."

THE REALITY OF THE UNSEEN.

By Charles Dorsie.

It is difficult to realize the reality of the unseen. Still more is it hard to take delight in it. Abraham is described as "enduring as seeing him who is invisible." But the average man or woman finds that such "seeing" and "enduring" requires an effort of the will.

Many will come to the church to eat when they will not come to pray. The decline of the prayer meeting is generally treated as a modern failing; but Jesus reproached the people of his day who followed him "not because they saw signs but because they did eat of the loaves and were filled.'

The perpetual office of religion is to aid us in seeing that unseen things are the only eternal realities. Men of science are teaching the same thing in another way. No one ever saw the law of gravitation; yet gravity has more to do with the stability of houses than all the nails and lumber. No one has been able to detect the principle of life in a human being; yet, without the spark of life, the world's greatest hero becomes a mass of senseless clay.

Successful people are those who are not deceived by appearances. Edison finds the unheard realities of the sound world by disregarding the confusion of noises. Washington turned his back on material advantages to follow the eternal principles of liberty and justice.

God is trying to induce us to attend to unseen realities. The great mass of mankind are misled by appearances. Be not deceived. The flesh means nothing but corruption. The spirit controls life.

The Curriculum Outlined Above Furnishes a Comprehensive Course of Religious Instruction

Comprising as it does not only the biographies, history, literature, and teachings of the Bible, but also lessons on the history and heroes of the Christian Church, of missionary enterprises, philanthropic movements, and moral reforms.

In order that the truths taught may be assimilated and the spirit and qualities of Christian character developed, various forms of self-expression are suggested, beginning with simple hand-work done by the little child, and culminating in important lines of Christian service possible to young men and women.

The series of lessons for each year begins in October, and the work that is essential to the completion of the aim and the integrity of the course as a whole, is found in the nine months corresponding to the public school year—October to June. The lessons for the remaining three months of each year are valuable in themselves, and either supplement the work of the preceding months, or prepare for that of the following year.

The courses for each grade or year are permanent and will be available for use in the same grade with successive classes each year. While these courses may be begun at any time, there is especial advantage in beginning at the beginning, October 1.

A Changed Attitude

The most exciting moment in the Topeka convention was that in which President Peter Ainslie declared that the time was come when the Disciples must change their attitude toward their brethren of the Christian denominations.

His statement was not formulated on his feet. It was deliberate. He announced it three times in the same day. He had spoken it in private conversation and in public address many times during the year of his incumbency of the presidential office.

Despite the storm of protest which his words received at Topeka he refused to alter them. In subsequent conferences he reaffirmed them, and met the charge that his form of statement brought humiliation to his brethren with the response that there is nothing so dignifying as repentance and change when one sees the error of his way.

With the convention so keenly aware of the full bearing of Mr. Ainslie's words, there is deep significance in the fact that it adopted his proposal for the creation of a Council on Christian Union, which at its first meeting resolved to issue two addresses—one to the Christian world, the other to the Disciples themselves, the latter to be an appeal for the further practice of unity.

No one could mingle in the great throng at Topeka, without hearing words spoken on every hand which indicate that there is coming a new spirit into the great body of the Disciples.

The hard shell of legalism is being broken through.

The cocksure conceit that our present practice is the absolute basis of ultimate union is giving way.

The braggadocio spirit in which, too often, our victories have been recounted, is vanishing.

Our obsession by a formula of conversion is being overcome.

The unintentional affront to evangelical Christendom in the assumption that the Disciples alone are loyal to Christ or concerned to restore the Christianity of the New Testament, is being discovered and repented of.

In a word, there is among us a deepening humility, a disposition to restudy the whole question of unity and an inexorable determination to keep ourselves from becoming just another respectable sect in Christendom.

President Ainslie would be the first, however, to agree with The Christian Century that the "changed attitude" is not so much a change as a revival.

The original and fundamental attitude of the Disciples' movement needs no essential change. Thomas Campbell's attitude toward all Christians as expressed in the yearning appeal of the Declaration and Address is the very attitude which should characterize the Disciples today.

If The Christian Century had been making President Ainslie's address, we would have said the time had come for a revival of the pristine, the essential, spirit of the Disciples' movement, a spirit almost crushed by legalism, dogmatism, clannishness and sectarian pride.

What the times demand is not a changed attitude of the Disciples, but a changed attitude of some Disciples. And the most reassuring impression received at Topeka is that many Disciples are coming to see that our plea for union demands as the primary condition of its success that we make a place in our hearts and our fellowship for all souls whom Christ has received into his.

This marked change that is so manifestly coming over the temper of our people lays an obligation upon the so-called "progressive" men in our ranks.

Among the Disciples, as among all religious bodies, there are today two types or schools of thought—called popularly "conservative" and "progressive." With the Disciples the point of acute sensitiveness between these two ways of thinking is just this matter of our attitude toward other Christian people.

Not higher criticism, nor science, nor evolution, nor theological doctrine of any sort, measures the division of mind between "conservative" and "progressive." These are all relatively negligible questions as compared to the far-reaching question whether or not the Disciples shall practice their own plea of Christian unity.

In face of much sectarian conceit and clannishness among their brethren, some "progressive" men have allowed themselves to be goaded into a cynical and fault-finding temper. They have failed to discern either the signs of progress in Disciple circles today or the inescapable implications of our origin and historic principles.

The brave leadership of Peter Ainslie at Topeka and the prompt and practical response of the convention should challenge the enthusiastic loyalty of every man whose heart has ever fainted lest the Disciples might at last prove recreant to the high purpose for which they were called into being.

There are men of the younger generation, keenly conscious of the short-comings of the Disciples in this central matter of Christian union, who for years have kept their hope and loyalty unshaken through sheer faith in our history and in the spirit of Thomas Campbell. There was little in the actual current practice or attitude of their brethren to encourage them.

But we are entering a new time. Timid faith and wavering loyalty find much reassurance. In the new century upon which the Disciples are entering, this, our brotherhood, will speak its message out in the open forum of Christendom, and back it up with a procedure which shall demonstrate that Christian union can be practiced here and now, without waiting for the settlement of the gnarled dogmas that divide Christ's people.

The "changed attitude" acknowledged by the Topeka convention as a present duty for many Disciples, should be answered by a pronounced re-consecration to the body of the Disciples on the part of those who need no such change.

The loyalty rooted in such a re-consecration will attest itself in many ways. But in one particular it will be especially painstaking—it will strive in every way to keep down the spirit of partyism.

The time has come to say to all men who have been fearful or cynical about the Disciples, that their re-consecration to the brotherhood carries with it the implication that they are Disciples first, and "progressives" afterwards.

The "conservative" is no more loyal to the Disciples than the right-minded "progressive." It is the instant duty of all progressive men to make it clear that this is so, by actual coöperation in the heartiest and most sympathetic fashion with all Disciples of whatever "school" of thought.

The formation of a smaller sect within the main body of Disciples is every way a contradiction of the spirit of unity. Perhaps "progressive" men are no more guilty of this tendency than "conservative" men. But progressive men should be wholly innocent of it just because of the principles for which they stand.

Those who plead for the practice of Christian union must fight the party spirit in their own souls and their own fellowships. No organization that tends to cultivate a feeling of aloofness should in this new day of progress and hope be fostered among them.

Consecrated loyalty to the brotherhood does not mean weak conformity to prevailing practices. It does not call for the surrender of the right to criticise those things among the Disciples that are wrong. Instead, it turns that right into a sacred duty.

Nor yet does it condemn those groupings of friends or fellow students, based on likemindedness or other affinity, which are bound to spring up within a great body like the Disciples. Loyalty is enriched and strengthened by these fellowships.

But men who are Disciples first and "progressives" afterwards, will guard against maintaining any formal organization whose meetings, however well-purposed, cause needless suspicion and alienation on the part of other brethren.

We are come into a new day.

And if there is to be a changed attitude on anybody's part, let it provoke all the rest to a deeper consecration to the holy cause.

The War on Death

The war on death goes bravely on. Medical statesmen now declare that the time will come when men will not die of disease. This may be a dream of the Utopia of Health but the war on modern preventable death is conducted with a religious zeal and with all the skill of science. John D. Rockefeller has raised his donations to the Institute for Medical Research to nearly $10,000,000. One of the most recent discoveries there is that of a serum for the cure of poliomyelitas or inflamation of the gray matter of the spinal cord. They first isolated the germ and then found the serum to kill it. They have also made progress in combating the terrible inroads of meningitis and are working patiently at the mysteries of cancer. When cancer, meningitis and rheumatism have yielded to skill as tuberculosis, yellow fever, cholera, diphtheria, typhoid and other former scourges of death have done, we may count the warfare well on toward the point of final victory. It is reported that the hook worm's conqueror has been discovered and that a sure cure is found for ankylasis or stiffening of the joints. Cholera, an easily prevented disease, has claimed tons of thousands of victims in Russia and southern Europe during the past few months, simply because the people live in filth. It is not even easily communicable where the common laws of hygiene and sanitation are observed. Calcutta reports, through our consul there, that a new treatment for it has proven very successful, reducing the mortality by 50 per cent where used. It consists simply in the peritonial injection of a strong salt solution.

Of course the great big fight is on tuberculosis. Some of the cynical have used surface statistics to prove it was of little avail, ignoring the fact that the fight on the disease has served to bring to light more effectively its ravages and to procure more exact reports of its presence. Closer study of the facts reveal great progress. Two hundred years ago, Sterne, the English novelist and author of "Tristram" was treated in Paris for "consumption." The formula was called "bouillons rafraichissants" and consisted in a cock, flayed alive, ground in a mortar, boiled with poppy seeds and strained. Then there was added to the stew a male crawfish and it must be a male or complications would arise. This sounds like a Chinese prescription and illustrates to us how far science brings a people in a few generations.

Will the Theater Be Redeemed?

Let it be taken for granted that the theater is one of the most powerful means for appeal to conscience and one of the best educators among the institutions of civilization. If it does not minister to these ends it is because the people who want to see these ends ministered unto do not use it for that purpose. During the past six months 300,000 people have flocked to Ober-Ammergau to see the Passion Play. The vast majority of them were people of religious and refined tastes and they found nothing in the fact of the theater to condemn; it was quite as good as a church and a sermon to them and perhaps to many more powerful. The theatre has been with us since the dawn of civilization; it was one of the natural and most primitive manifestations of art. Its power over the multitudes is manifest. More people go to the theater on any Sunday, in many of our large American cities, than go to church. A canvas of 17 of the low play houses of Chicago on one Sunday evening gave a count of 17,000 paid admissions. It would be interesting to know if the 100 best attended Protestant churches in the city had as many, with no admission charge. Jane Addams points out the fact that the trend is upward and that one can always find a play with human interest and social theme and that it is generally a success financially. Last season the clean sociological plays were successes while many of the old time pleasure mongering type, with just a cast of cynicism at morality or an insinuation of the immoral, were failures. On the one hand were the "Melting Pot," the "Man of the Hour," the "Fortune Hunter," "A Man's World," "The Fourth Estate" etc., all successes and a benefit to the public, while on the other hand the conspicuous financial failures were such things as "Midnight Sons," "The Girl from Rectors," "The Queen of the Moulin Rouge," "Baby Mine," etc. Stephen Phillips' fine literary plays succeed and stars like Sothern and Marlowe, with their clean and classical bills are never failures, neither are innocent comedies. Has it not been a puritan dislike of play quite as much as a wholesome objection to immoral acting that has put the theater under the ban to such an extent? Now we find play so nearly the largest field for suggestion for good as well as bad that many of the moral leaders are agitating the use of it frankly as such.

Labor's Progress and Proposals

France has recently been threatened with labor riots on its government controlled railroads for when the Frenchman strikes he goes to war. The directors have settled on the basis of a minimum wage of $1 per day, to become effective Jan. 1st. The intervention of the Minister of Public Works, Posts and Telegraphs, M. Millerand, brought about the settlement. In Germany a strike of a million workers has been narrowly averted by a concession to the workers as has also that of a large number of English operatives. In the United States a quarter of million miners went out last spring, demanding a raise of five cents per ton. Their demands were practically conceded and they are at work. The general trend has been upward in the battle of labor for better wages, but with all the increases, the wage gain has been much less than the increase in the cost of living and a severe winter will bring untold suffering to a million or more people who labor on the nether line of a wage that only guarantees existence.

The death of J. W. Van Cleave gave the Buck Stove and Range company a chance to withdraw their legal proceedings against the American Federation of Labor and its leaders, in the persons of Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison. This won for them universal approval but our old friend and human benefactor (?) Post, of immitation coffee fame, has entered a stockholders suit to prevent the company from withdrawing the proceedings. It is reported that Mr. Post offered Col. Roosevelt $100,000 a year to head his imitation labor union, but Mr. Roosevelt declines and says that if he were a working man he would be in it with his best licks. The directors of the National Manufacturers Association, the organization of Post, Van Cleave and John M. Glenn, has passed a resolution condemning labor unionism for the destruction of Gen. Otis' printing plant at Los Angeles. They needed no evidence, prejudice was better. They should be called upon for evidence, however, or sued for damages. Organized labor is as desirous that the real culprits be found as are the officers of the law.

One of the most significant proposals of late date is that of the railway unions. The 3,000 delegates in recent convention, representing 308,000 members voted unanimously to enter politics as independents, choosing the individual candidates who favor such patent necessities as safety appliances, liability laws, old age pensions and shorter hours of labor.

Democracy's Progress Among the Nations

Portugal joins the growing list of republics, Turkey is establishing a public school system, China has taken the first national step in organizing for constitutional government, the little principality of Monaco has introduced the constitutional regime demanded by the people, Briand and his democratic cabinet keep their hold firm on French affairs and are carrying out their crusade against clericalism, Spain throws the gauntlet to the Church in Rome and proceeds to develop a democratic spirit and to open the land to religious toleration, in Germany the Social-Democrats continue to make Parliamentary gains, while in England Lloyd George and Winston Churchill give no signs of relenting in their determined warfare on ancient vested and lordly privileges and our own insurgent cause marches steadily on to the inevitable victory that has perched upon the banners of a progressive democracy, regardless of party name, for the past ten years.

Portugal is not the first experiment in republican government by Portugese. Brazil was the seat of a Portugese king and since his overthrow the little kingdom's greatest principality has become one of the successful republics of the new world. Its politics has not been characterized by the revolutions and dictatorships of many of the Latin republics and has been successful politically as well as commercially. Portugal now stands as the fore-runner of a larger democracy in the entire Iberian peninsula. Her revolution was against monarchical extravagance and religious intolerance. Spain is moving in the same channels. The Catholic orders must go from Spain as surely as they have from Italy, France and Portugal and the sedition they breed will be replaced by the democratic self-reliance a school system brings.

Turkey is seeking American capital to develop her vast untouched resources. This will make Emperor William envious no doubt but the young Turks, who are ruling that nation more as a republic than as a monarchy, are wise in seeking to keep clear of monarchical and old world complications. The Kaiser could use a strong hold well if trouble arose and German securities were threatened. America might collect her debts, but she would take no land. The Phillipines suffice.

The World's Temperance Outlook

"This is one of the disadvantages of wine, it makes a man mistake words for thought! This mistake of the drinking man is one of the chief obstacles to the progress of temperance. Another obstacle is that powerful financial interests profit by the drinking habits of men. But there are gains to be recorded on the side of sobriety. The drunkard is no longer regarded as a harmless and amusing citizen. He is looked upon as a menace to the peace and health of his community. The evils of alcoholism unaccompanied by drunkenness are recognized. Sober men are demanded for the more important part of the world's work.

In an issue of the Survey of recent date, Homer Folks sums up the problem of alcoholism as it presents itself to the social worker. "The drunkard's family has ever been the insoluble problem in home relief, public and private. The drunkard's children have ever been the despair of child-caring agencies. Authorities on insanity accept alcoholism as one of the dependable sources of supply for their constituency. General hospitals either bar the doors against the alcoholic and inebriate, or, if public institutions and therefore obliged to receive all classes of patients, find the alcoholic ward a source of ever-recurring trouble. The conscientious almshouse superintendent finds his best plans miscarried, and the discipline and regime of his institution broken up, by the in-and-out alcoholic rounder. Those who are undertaking the newer lines of preventive work find themselves at once face to face with alcoholism. The tuberculosis campaign is in many respects a campaign against intemperance. The promising movement for the prevention of insanity finds alcoholism one of the two very definite factors clearly indicated as positive causes of certain important forms of mental breakdown. In every department of the correctional field, alcoholism is ever present. The lower courts are clogged with habitual drunkards; the upper courts are distracted by questions as to the responsibility of the criminal who is part way along on the road to alcoholic insanity. Probation commissions are issuing leaflets on how probation may sometimes help the drunkard. Several states have established or are establishing hospital colonies for inebriates. In short, without attempting to define precisely the role of alcoholism as cause or as effect, it is perfectly clear to every social worker that alcoholism is present as a serious factor in a great part of his work."

It is a distinct gain that those who are working for the highest welfare of humanity are having their eyes opened to the seriousness of the alcohol question. It is no longer a few religious and political radicals upon whom falls the burden of pointing out the dangers to civilization which have their source in the saloon. Men of science are supplying the materials for temperance instruction. It has been discovered, too, that something more is due the drunkard than fines and imprisonment. The laws concerning him are therefore being remade with a view to giving him help in regaining self-control and self-respect. In 1894 Lade Henry Somerset established "The Industrial Farm Colony for Women." She writes of this colony: "The years which the colony has existed have been sufficient to prove that inebriety in women is not a hopeless, incurable evil, but that it yields to wise treatment. It may be said a thousand times that a woman who gives way to drink is irreclaimably lost. but of all the wandering ones whose feet were guided to Duxhurst, considerably more than half have been restored to womanhood, usefulness and happiness. And this percentage is obtained even when we reckon the insane, the dying, those unfit for treatment, and those who did not stay the full twelve months; if we only deal with those who fulfil what we consider the conditions necessary to cure, the percentage is much higher."

The hospital and the industrial colony for the inebriate are being accepted in the United States as a necessary part of the system of curing drunkenness. We may expect all the large cities to make use of them. But the goal of the temperance worker is not the cure but the preventive of alcoholism. He must face the facts as they are and assist in providing for the victims of drink the means of moral recovery. The more workers engaged in efforts to redeem drunkards, the greater will be the number of those who see the wickedness of systematized efforts to create the demand for alcohol as a beverage.

Midweek Service, Nov. 2. 1 John 2:17.

Editorial Table Talk

Convention Topics

The Topeka convention's riotous manner of disposing of the proposal for a delegate convention is the best argument for a delegate convention that has yet been advanced.

* * *

The auditorium or convention hall which the Topeka committee provided for the gathering was an admirable building. Its numerous exits and smaller rooms added to the convenience of the audiences and to the ventilation during the warm days on which the convention was held.

* * *

The hospitable spirit in which the churches at Topeka were placed at the disposal of the convention, and the admirable manner in which meals were provided at most of them for the hungry delegates, served further to emphasize the cordial spirit in which Topeka welcomed the gathering.

* * *

The missionary display of literature, pictures, and other material from the mission fields, was exceedingly interesting. The fact that it was on the second floor of the capitol building perhaps removed it somewhat from general inspection, but those who made their way upstairs were amply rewarded.

* * *

One of the significant and appreciated features of the convention was the morning gathering for prayer, which we hope will be continued in future years. The spirit of these prayer services did not always prevail in the later sessions of the day, but those who were present found them of great value.

* * *

The report of the Home Society presented by Grant K. Lewis was a splendid document, admirably presented. Not for many years has a report been received with greater enthusiasm. Its reception marked the approval by the Disciples of the work accomplished during the past year by Secretaries McCash and Lewis.

* * *

Professor W. C. Payne of the Bible college at Lawrence, Kansas, invited a group of college men to visit that institution on Saturday afternoon, where they were welcomed by President Strong of the University of Kansas and were shown the character of the Bible Chair work in its relations to the state university. Some twenty college presidents and others interested in education made the trip.

* * *

The state capitol on the spacious square was generously turned over to the convention in so far as the exigencies of official work would permit. The central corridor and lobby were occupied by the headquarters of the journals, colleges, and other organizations. Even some of the official rooms were placed at the disposal of committees during the convention. The hospitable spirit of welcome pervaded the entire city.

* * *

Most of the colleges held reunions at one time or another during the convention. No feature is more delightful than these gatherings of students, teachers, alumni and friends of the institutions which have maintained the educational work of the Disciples through their history. At the educational session, which was presided over by President Howe of Butler College, President Crossfield of Transylvania, read an able and comprehensive paper on the relation of church schools to education.

* * *

Rev. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, the President of the American Christian Missionary Society, endeavored earnestly and not without success to set a new standard of efficiency and dignity in the work of a presiding officer. With tact and courage he voiced the needs of the hour among the Disciples, and with unfailing courtesy he administered the duties of his office throughout the sessions. His presidential address was masterful and eloquent. And the work which he accomplished in the launching of a serious effort to realize Christian unity was one of the incidents of the convention to be long remembered.

The real progress made by a people like the Disciples is not to be registered in convention utterances, which are generally cautious and conservative. It is to be found rather in the free exchange of confidences among individuals or in small groups of earnest men and women who believe in larger things and are bringing them to pass. No gathering in recent years has been so marked by signs of promise in this regard as the Topeka convention. Conferences were held which are destined to be historic, and light from unexpected quarters was shed upon some of the most perplexing problems in our work.

President McLean and Secretaries Corey and Allen were received by the convention with enthusiasm. President McLean is unique and incomparable in his conduct of the Foreign Society's sessions. The confidence of the Disciples in his wisdom and devotion was never greater than today. A new and pleasing feature of these sessions was the addresses by the missionaries themselves. Almost the entire program of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society was given to the missionaries, whose accounts of the experiences on the field are always full of inspiration for the supporting churches at home.

* * *

Whether or not President Ainslie was fortunate in his reference to the theme of Federation is an open question. But he must have been astonished at the efforts made by more than one on the convention floor to entirely mis-state the purposes and spirit of the movement. Those who so loudly denounced the tyrannies and limitations of Federation must have been heartily ashamed when the report from the Federal Council was actually presented with its simple frank statement of results accomplished and its plea for more earnest coöperation on the part of all Christian bodies. The anomaly of Disciples protesting against a movement which is carrying forward so admirably the very ideals to which they have devoted themselves would be diverting if it were not pathetic.

* * *

In addition to the Brotherhood sessions on Monday, there was a deeply interesting and informing conference held by President Long of the Brotherhood in the hotel parlors on Saturday morning. At his request a select number of ministers and others gave frank expression to their views regarding the value and limitations of the Brotherhood work among the Disciples. It was the general feeling that the work of the men in the local churches greatly needs emphasis; that the question of the support of a denominational Brotherhood is a more serious and difficult question to decide. There were voices on both sides of the proposition. It was also made clear that the problem of a Brotherhood is also felt to be difficult by our religious neighbors. No difficulties are sufficient to discourage the pursuit of a needed work. The question is, however, whether the greater stress does not need to be laid upon the individual groups of men in the churches, rather than on the national organization.

* * *

The report of the committee on time and place for the next convention presented the names of Boston, Massachusetts, and Portland, Oregon, as petitioners for the convention, but made no recommendations. It was later learned that only by the widest stretch of terms could Boston be considered in any sense an applicant for the convention. The courteous message from our Baptist brethern in Boston expressing the hope that the Disciples might come to the city was as near as the invitation came to definiteness and authority. The Pacific coast delegation, speaking less for Portland than for some neighboring places, made an urgent appeal, and the matter was decided in favor of the Pacific city. Convention-goers among the Disciples, who have grown accustomed to see the report of the committee on time and place set aside by the convention at the plea of J .B. Briney, were deeply grieved to see this precedent violated at Topeka!

* * *

The spirit of progress was manifested in many ways during the convention. The Disciples are awakening not only to a sense of responsibility, considering their great numbers and ability, but as well to a sense of good form and order in their procedure. While some of the sessions of the Topeka convention left on the mind of intelligent Disciples present a depressing sense of disorder and the spirit of riot, yet the deep and sincere deprecation of some of the conduct that disgraced the convention was the best proof that our people are lovers of dignity and deeply resent such unjust and unhappy judgments as the conduct of a few uncultured and childish spirits invited. Nothing could more effectively deepen the conviction that the Disciples are in need of representative and therefore orderly conventions than the exhibition of the spirit of misrule and lawlessness that broke out once or twice at Topeka. Such scenes disgrace the Disciples in the thought of religious neighbors who are almost without exception accustomed to dignified and seemly religious gatherings.

* * *

One of the sessions of the convention most looked forward to was that which dealt with the question of delegate conventions and the reduction of the number of our missionary societies and offerings. The report of the committee appointed a year ago was presented by A. B. Philputt, but it was only presented to be withdrawn with the request that an additional year be granted for its further consideration. Those who believe in the plan of delegate conventions were unfortunate in having the subject insufficiently prepared to present it with vigor before the convention, or else in the decision to make any statement regarding it at Topeka. The result of the partial and imperfect presentation of the theme was a scene of disorder rarely equalled in the history of our people, and deeply discourteous to the presiding officer and the guests of the convention. It is understood that a report is to be made at the next convention, when it is to be hoped that those who have the interests of a delegate and orderly convention at heart may be prepared to present the subject in a definite, decisive and aggressive fashion, in a session where ample time will be given for debate and the issue will not be clouded by appeals to prejudice and partisanship.

Contrast of Sunday-school Leaders

The Sunday-school leaders were much in evidence during the convention. Robert M. Hopkins, the national superintendent of Sunday-schools, spoke on Saturday afternoon on "A New Bible School Era." Hugh McLellan, of San Antonio, Texas, followed with an address on "The Bible School Conquest of America." Clarence L. DePew, of Illinois, was toastmaster at an interesting Teacher Training luncheon that evening.

An interesting contrast was provided on the evening program in the addresses of R. P. Shepherd, of St. Louis, and Herbert Moninger, of Cincinnati. There was contrast every way—in the speakers, their methods, and their messages. The great audience was submissive to the appearance of Mr. Shepherd, who asserted his authority in his opening words, "You people who are going out think the show is all over. You're mistaken. It's only just begun. Sit down!" And they sat down, and staid down until Mr. Shepherd chose to let them up.

His was a picturesque address, radical in its temper, though not unsafely so in its conclusions. At its close, Mr. Moninger spoke on "Men's Work in the Bible School," using the stereopticon part of the time. He speaks fluently. He knows his speech thoroughly. He holds everybody's attention. Now and again he will ask the audience to say over after him some sentence, or scripture phrase, or to repeat his outline. There is very little truth in his address; it is mostly method.

After it is all over, the listener feels that he has been amused, but that he has no vital, solid thing to take away with him. As he thinks longer, he sees that he has been treated like a child, that he has been talked to about small things and in a small way. With Mr. Shepherd it is otherwise. He grasps large problems. He dignifies his hearers by talking of worthy things. He faces real problems. He strives to touch the springs of inspiration, to give his hearers vision, not toy devices.

"I am sick and tired of this fingering of the book," Mr. Shepherd said, "and calling it Bible study. We cannot substitute the Bible for the holy spirit of God and call the accumulation of religious facts religious education. It is infinitely better to know the distance from the side of the road where the priest and the pharisee were to the right side than the exact distance in miles between Jerusalem and Jericho.

"The educational opportunity of the Sunday-school is unparalleled, in that the unconscious adaptation of the organization meets perfectly the changing religious needs of men from infancy through childhood and youth to maturity.

"The supreme need of infancy and childhood is to know what religion is, both in itself and in its relations. The insistent though unvoiced need of adolescence is to know the why of religion. The supreme need of seniors in the advanced grades and of adult life is

A Prophetic Convention

Pleaders For Unity Taking Active Steps to Practice It

The new century of the Disciples of Christ has opened as auspiciously as the old century closed. Pittsburgh 1909 was the symbol of all the achievements of a hundred years. Topeka 1910 was the symbol of the achievements of the new era upon which the Disciples are entering.

The Pittsburgh convention a year ago was reminiscent. The Topeka convention which has just closed was prophetic. In the former the old struggles were lived over again, the old heroisms recounted and the veterans honored at the hands of a grateful people. In the latter there was an awareness of the new age with its new problems, its call for heroes and thinkers, and a free but loving criticism of the past.

The new century convention at Topeka was notable for its forward look, for its humble sense of short-coming in performing the task to which we were commissioned by our Lord. There was a wholesome sense of our failures. There was an earnest reaching forth unto the things that lie before us.

No convention of recent years has been so marked by an absence of boasting. The delusion that we are a young people, and that our achievements are amazing for our years was not in evidence. But there was no note of discouragement, no suggestion of weakening in our historic purposes.

It was, on the contrary, an optimistic convention. The faith by which we have endured through a century of indifference to our plea for unity, found confirmation in the present-day awakening of a desire for unity in all parts of the Christian world. There was a strong sense that the Disciples are dealing with an issue that is wondrously alive.

There were flaws in the convention. It was not a perfect gathering. But its faults are to be characterized as crudities not as reversions. The mob spirit controlled the convention at times. There was a deplorable lack of reverence, often of courtesy, in the congregations. The music was of as inferior a grade as has cheapened any convention of recent years. It was with difficulty that the devotional spirit could maintain itself.

But all these faults are due to the headlessness of our national convention organization and to the inadequate conception of those who lead. The people responded to the call for a devotional hour early in the morning in large numbers. And had the convention itself been projected on the higher levels by its leaders the devotional spirit would have inhibited all those crudities which so greatly mar our conventions as religious gatherings.

The addresses were almost without exception of a high order, both in idea and in spirit. In the main there was a stern facing of real issues. It may be well enough for such a convention to have one such address like that given by Congressman Champ Clark, but one twenty-minute talk like that of President H. B. Brown, of Valparaiso—earnest, sane, direct and vital—is worth all the hour and a half of the Congressman's much-worn eloquence.

The delight of the convention was its president. Peter Ainslie hitherto a young minister of good reputation as a man of clear thought, hard work and a prayerful life, leaped on a single day into a position of leadership among the Disciples. He is, first of all, fair to look upon. The excellent but unflattering likeness of him given our readers two weeks ago makes any word-description of his countenance superfluous. Blessed with a rich voice of moderate strength and a charming southern brogue, he captivated his hearers in every address. But his power lay not in any such accident as voice or inflection, but in his lucid thought and the simple, unmistakable piety of his heart.

With remarkable poise he held himself through the most trying situations. A playful humor bubbled on his lips. He knew when to give the convention its way and when to insist upon his own. He was a hard man to oppose.

From the moment of his election a year ago Mr. Ainslie has taken his position seriously. The president of the American Christian Missionary Society holds a place more nearly representative of the whole brotherhood than any officer of our other societies. After three or four months of consideration Mr. Ainslie wrote a letter to the Disciples setting forth certain problems and questions which seemed to him to require the attention of the brotherhood in its Topeka convention. That was eight months ago. Since then these questions have been discussed by the press and in conversations and local conventions.

Mr. Ainslie himself has traveled throughout the country in two tours,—one in the central west, the other in the far west and the Pacific coast,—speaking on the big issues confronting the Disciples today. The questions as stated in the president's letter to his brethren were as follows:

1. How to provide a way to more effectively promote our plea for union among all denominations?
2. How to provide a method for introducing more vital business into our conventions?
3. Shall the date be changed from October to Spring or Summer?
4. Shall our national conventions be biennial or continue to be annual?
5. How to cultivate a deeper devotional life among our people?

How these questions were going to get themselves discussed at a convention whose constitution and precedents would declare them "not germane" has been a puzzle ever since President Ainslie announced them. But it all became very simple when we arrived in Topeka. While the sessions of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions were in progress on Wednesday morning, a committee of fifty men selected by President Ainslie met in the First Christian Church to take up the discussion of these questions. This committee re-convened at 1:30 with perhaps fifty others present, and again at 4:30 with the house packed to the gallery windows. The Foreign Society whose sessions fell on Thursday agreed to adjourn at 4:30 p. m., so as to give time for another sitting of the committee, in the auditorium. The same arrangement was agreed to by the American society for Friday, so it was thus arranged that a series of conferences parallel to the main conventions would be held through the week.

Thus, for the first time in our history, at least half a chance for the discussion of our problems was provided.

But how it was done is not half so interesting as what was done.

In presenting his first subject for consideration Mr. Ainslie made an address in which he suggested three definite things to be done in order to further the cause of Christian union. We cannot do better than to quote a portion of his words:

"Other communions are alive on the question of Christian Union. I believe that they should be informed where we stand on this important matter.

"For a hundred years we have stood for the unification of Christendom. But the other churches do not know where we stand in regard to this question and I do not believe that we should delay any longer to inform them of our position.

"I believe as you believe that we have the greatest message ever given to the world. The time has come when we should propagate it or quit it. We have been content to be isolated from the other churches all these years but I believe we were wrong in keeping to ourselves. We should let the world know the message that we have. There are three steps that I believe we should take.

"First, we should put out a definite propaganda. We should send literature embodying our views to every minister in this country every month or at least once a quarter. This is not an original plan but one which has been followed by the Unitarians and the Christian Scientists for a number of years. The Disciples represented by a board or committee should pass upon these tracts and have charge of the work of sending them out."

"Second, there should be a monthly magazine as a clearing house for thought on Christian union. Its pages should be open for discussion by any reputable minister or layman of any church but its editorial policy should be steadfastly in line with the principles of the Disciples of Christ. This magazine should serve to bring our platform before the divided church of God. We feel that it has much in it that will appeal to other denominations which are blindly groping in the dark for some plan of Christian Union.

"Third, the time has come when we have got to change our attitude toward our religious brethren. (applause). Sometimes it has looked as if we regarded the Methodists and Presbyterians and the others as our enemies. We can't win them by throwing stones at them but we can win them by love. We should regard them as brothers. If they deny it, we should claim it still, and if they deny it again, we should go on claiming them as brothers. The baptismal question is not as large a question as once it seemed. Thomas Campbell's plea was to unite the world."

This address was given, in substance, three times on Wednesday. First at the forenoon session, when, after an earnest discussion, it was resolved by the committee of fifty to appoint a sub-committee to draw up a plan for carrying into effect the president's suggestions.

The sub-committee with President Hill M. Bell, of Drake University as chairman, was instructed to bring in its report at 4:30 in the afternoon. Promptly at that hour Mr. Ainslie made a re-statement of his proposals for the benefit of perhaps a hundred others then present who were not present at the morning session.

By the time Mr. Bell arose to read his report, the throngs from the just dismissed auditorium sessions were pouring into the church. They were keen to know what was going on. The committee of fifty had now grown to have six-hundred members, every one of whom expected to have a vote! And how, forsooth, could these vote intelligently unless they heard the whole story! So it was suggested that Mr. Ainslie take the pulpit and present anew his explanation. This he did, and everything moved on agreeably until the speaker announced his third point, viz., that the time has now come for the Disciples to change their attitude toward their brethren of the Christian denominations. After the great applause which greeted the first sentence had subsided questions began to interrupt the speaker. For twenty electric minutes Mr. Ainslie was subjected to a species of heckling that would have done credit to an English political meeting.

"What do you mean by a change of attitude?"

"Have not the Disciples always regarded their religious neighbors as brethren?"

"Do you mean that we are now to receive Methodists and Presbyterians into the fellowship of our churches?"

These are some of the questions that were hurled at the speaker from the floor and the packed gallery. Some were disposed to argue the question. One auditor contended at some length that only those were our brethren who had obeyed Christ's commandments. He was reminded that Mr. Ainslie still had the floor and had not yet finished his address. Another protested:

"I have always treated my religious neighbors as brethren."

To which the cavernous voice of Dr. W. T. Moore was heard to respond,

"Keep right on, brother, keep right on!"

Mr. Ainslie showed not the slightest sign of perturbation. He did not qualify nor hedge nor apologize nor explain away his statement. But in reply to the question, "How far do you intend for us to go in treating Presbyterians, for instance, as brethren?" he replied, "Go as far as your conscience and judgment will take you."

Everybody had the feeling that we were following a leader who had thought his proposition through, that he knew his ground, that he was not there to act as a mere device for expediting business procedure but that he had ideals of his own up to which he earnestly desired to lead his brethren.

Finally the committee's report was read. It provided for the creation of a Council on Christian union—a new organizaton whose function it should be to carry out the proposals in President Ainslie's address. Next day the officers of this council were nominated and elected: President, Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore; vice-president, A. C. Smither, of Los Angeles; secretary, F. W. Burnham, of Springfield Ill.; treasurer, E. M. Bowman, of Chicago. Five other names were added to form with the officers the executive commission. The additional names are: Hill M. Bell, of Des Moines; W. T. Moore, of Indianapolis; M. M. Davis, of Dallas; J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis, and I. J. Spencer, of Lexington.

The personnel of this group insures that the new movement will be aggressive and that some great achievements may be expected. R. A. Long, owner of the Christian Publishing Company, of St. Louis, offered to furnish to the new council, printing of tracts to the extent of ten thousand dollars. This will enable the new organization to accomplish results at an early date. The offer is made with the understanding that the money will only be used in case it is not furnished by other donors. Following is the constitution adopted for the Council:

CONSTITUTION.

Article I. This organization shall be called the Council on Christian Union.

Article II. The purpose of this organization shall be:

First—To create and distribute literature bearing on Christian union among the people of our own and other religious bodies, and to solicit and hold in trust funds for this purpose.

Second—To arrange conferences in important centers on the subject of Christian union.

Third—To prepare and send to all religious peoples an address reciting the great cardinal principles of our movement, and urging the vital importance of Christian union if we are to conquer the world for Christ.

Article III. All Disciples of Christ may be members of the Council.

Article IV. The Council shall elect annually a president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer, who shall serve until their successors are chosen, and who shall perform such duties as usually devolve upon these officers in similar organizations.

Article V. A commission of nine members to execute the purposes of this Council, and to report to it annually, shall be composed as follows:

First—The president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer shall be members ex officio.

Second—Five additional members of the commission shall be chosen annually by the Council, to serve one year and until their successors are elected.

Article VI. This Council shall, at the call of the president, meet annually at the time and place of the meeting of the American Christian Missionary Society.

Article VII. This constitution may be amended by a majority of the members present and voting at any regular annual meeting.

No doubt a factor in preparing the minds of the convention for this important action was the publicity recently given the announcement by Dr. W. T. Moore that it was his purpose to ask the Topeka convention to address a letter to Christendom on Christian union.

He was given time on Thursday to present his memorial. The convention enthusiastically adopted his suggestion and asked the newly appointed Council on Christian union to carry it out.

Not the least important of the subjects discussed in President Ainslie's Conference of Fifty was that concerning the need of a deeper devotional life among the Disciples. In introducing the subject, he deplored the fact that the literature of the devotional life has so scant a circulation among our people. He also emphasized the pivotal place of Bible study in creating and cultivating spiritual character. In respect to the Bible, all were agreed with the leader. As to the devotional literature, however, there is some comfort in the fact that the Disciples read so little of it.

There is a species of pseudo-spiritual writing being widely circulated in some religious circles today. No need is more acute and deep than that for a literature of the inner life that shall be sane, strong and wholesome. When this literature comes, it will find the mind of the Disciples virgin to receive it. Perhaps the explanation of our people's failure to take up the conventional books is a tribute to their discernment. Whether this be so or not, it certainly is the bounden duty of those who teach us divine things to produce books interpretative of the world within.

In the discussion at Topeka, the following works were mentioned with approval: Isaac Errett's "Evenings with the Bible," J. H. Garrison's "Alone with God," Peter Ainslie's "God and Me" and Herbert L. Willett's "The Daily Altar" now appearing in The Christian Century and soon to be published in book form.

The felt need of a devotional spirit in our conventions was apparent in all the leaders and in many others at Topeka. There is an increasing dissatisfaction with the religious tone of our great gatherings. It was proposed to have a prayer-hour at 8 o'clock each morning at Topeka. Large numbers attended it and found it uplifting and revealing. Action was taken in the Conference of Fifty looking toward setting apart a definite time in each session of future conventions for communion with God.

This is a much needed revision of our programs. From this hour of devotion there will radiate an influence that will tend to hallow the entire assembly. But the revision must go deeper than the creation of a devotional hour. There should be a devotional convention. The convention itself, in all its departments, should be projected on the level of spiritual devotion. This would involve the music, the hall decorations, the precedent advertising, the choice of chairmen and speakers. The "hurrah-boy" spirit would be suppressed, the great hymns of the church would be given their rightful place and the whole machinery and "rough-house" temper of modern evangelism would be kept outside the convention door.

The Disciples are a virile, vital, active people. They will not yield easily to an appeal that seems to lack reality, substance. But they do love piety and do wish to walk humbly before God and honor him. They will follow leadership that points them, not to a cloister, but to the uplands of faith and vision. And the best sign that this is so is their present widespread and almost painful discontent with the tone of their conventions.

I have grown to believe that the one thing worth aiming at is simplicity of heart and life; that the world is a very beautiful place; that congenial labor is the secret of happiness.—A. F. Benson, in "The Point of View."

to know the how of religion.

"The parent or teacher who will lead the way of childhood along familiar paths where God may be found in all his works, where his voice speaks through flowers and birds, in scene and sound, will always be companioned on the delightful quest by eager, responsive, grateful souls, happy to find Christ in unexpected places and in ways unseen.

"The teacher of religion who faces a class of adult energy, faces the multiform task of showing how the religion of Christ applies to the varied problems which bring harassment and not peace to the souls of men. Wisely to use the opportunities afforded by the informal relations of organized adult Bible class work is to be a real minister of the gospel of God's grace. The teacher may be a real saver of souls, a medium of multiplied friendships, and a 'servant of the Lord having no reason to be ashamed.'"

The Communion Service

The great communion service of the Centennial convention at Pittsburgh last year seems to have set a precedent which Topeka felt compelled to follow. This, we believe, was a mistake. The Topeka communion service was not comparable in its adequacy of preparation, its orderly administration and its memorable impressiveness to the great observance on Forbes Field. The brethren at Pittsburgh seemed to be aware of the great peril of taking a service indigenous to the quiet upper room out into the glare and distraction of a base-ball field, and they made their preparations accordingly. The Topeka brethren had no such facilities for orderly administration to the six or seven thousand persons on the Capitol grounds as Pittsburgh had for the thirty thousand there assembled.

Many comments have been passed on the inappropriateness of the type of observance of the sacred meal provided at Topeka. But one needed nothing save his own eyes to convince him that the Pittsburgh communion service should be regarded as a precedent for centennial conventions only, not for annual conventions.

If, instead of the service on the Capitol grounds, it had been arranged that the visitors would retire at 3 o'clock to the various churches of the city—all the evangelical churches—for a quiet, orderly observance of the Lord's Supper, how rich a contribution to their spiritual life might have resulted! And if the churches of the city had agreed together to invite the convention to meet with their several congregations in union communion services throughout the city, how rich a contribution, not only to personal spiritual life, but to Christian unity, would have been made!

In the churches the proper vessels are used, the accustomed deacons officiate. There is no blaring cornet, no crowd of curious onlookers, no camera abomination with its advertisement nailed to the stand, no shouting through a megaphone, no curiosity in the worshipper to know how the machinery of administration works, no diverting conversation. The leader's voice is heard, and the people move forward in their worship with common thought and feeling—a real communion.

If the reader of this paragraph will turn to Professor Willett's interpretation of the Sunday-school lesson on page sixteen of this issue, he will be made to feel the incongruity of our picnic form of celebration with the scriptural ideal of the Lord's Supper. It is earnestly hoped that next year our Portland brethren will seek to make the Sunday afternoon observance of the Lord's Supper a genuine eating of the Lord's body and drinking of his blood as, it is to be feared, it is impossible to make it in the spectacular administration out of doors.

The New President and His Sermon

The nomination and election of Rev. Harry D. Smith of Hopkinsville, Ky., to the presidency of the American Society for next year reflected the favor with which his Convention sermon was received on Tuesday night. Mr. Smith is, like Mr. Ainslie, his predecessor, a young man. His pastorate at Hopkinsville has been distinguished for continuity of effort and breadth of vision. His church has, under his leadership, long been an ardent and solid supporter of the various missionary causes. He speaks in vigorous style, with a fine baritone voice. There were some demurrers to his Topeka sermon heard on the margin of the audience. Some felt that it was too critical, that it did not do the Disciples full justice. Others took exception to the homiletic license of conceiving our religious neighbors as "spies" in the Disciples' house. This latter is a purely technical quibble, however, as no one could miss the genial figurative purpose of the speaker. As to the former objection, the convention soon found itself in a prevailing mood of self-examination, and the point of the objection to this particular sermon was dulled. With respect to four great matters, Mr. Smith declared the people of the Christian denominations are studying the Disciples' missions, evangelism, education and the practice of Christian union. In all these, he said, it was not enough that we should be about as virtuous as others. We should do more than others. "What shall we say," he inquired, searchingly, toward the close of his sermon, "of our attitude toward these brethren of the denominations themselves? Does it breathe the spirit of the union we plead for? Do they find us courteous, both privately and publicly, in our discussions of them and their views and enterprises? Or do they hear us speak of themselves in the tone and phrase of the stump speaker? Do they find us open-minded, eager to learn what concerns them and to see it from their point of vision? Or are we cock-sure, self-sufficient and unsympathetic? Back of many leaden speeches and wooden performances, beneath the debris of all our confusions, is at the heart of us the good of holy aspiration and large purpose. Be it ours henceforth to bring up and out this golden treasure and put it on exhibition, not merely in speech and song and great convention, but in deeds of utmost kindness and courtesy to all mankind—especially to these others who are also of the household of faith—that they may take note of us that we have been with Jesus, and may desire us for their friends and counsellors in the work of the Gospel."

Topeka's Famous Preacher

As is customary, all the protestant churches of the city invited visiting preachers to fill their pulpits on Sunday. Judging by accounts in the newspapers next day and by conversational reports, there were many "great" sermons preached in Topeka that day! The editor writing this preached in the Central Congregational Church, of which Rev. Charles M. Sheldon is minister. Whatever is to be said of the poor words of the sermon, there is no doubt that preacher and congregation went from the house with a blessing that day.

Dr. W. T. Moore and Another Young Preacher.

The service itself was an uplift. Noble hymns, simple, tender prayer, an atmosphere of consecration made God seem near and duty plain. Dr. Sheldon's work in Topeka is only surpassed in fame by his book, "In His Steps," which has been read more widely over the world than any other modern volume. In his pastoral ministry, the author embodies in very simple fashion the ideals of his book. There is a quiet, simple, kindly strength about him. He is transparently Christian. The city speaks his praise with one voice. Business men believe in him. Young people love him. The poor cling to him.

It has been much marvelled at that Dr. Sheldon has remained in Topeka all these years despite the lure of many calls to other "wider" fields. Until a year ago, his church house was very modest—only the uncompleted chapel on the rear of the lot. Last December the present beautiful sanctuary was completed. It will seat perhaps a thousand. Through the years Dr. Sheldon has found the worths of his ministry not in crowds (though he has not lacked them) nor in material success, nor denominational prestige, but in the spiritual welfare of the people with whom he lived. He saw, what many ministers fail to see, that these worths are just as great in Topeka as in Boston or Chicago, that a man's field is as wide as his insight, and no wider. Hence he has remained in Topeka, gathering all its people into his heart—the students and professors of Washburn College, the colored folk of Tennesseetown, and everybody else between.

The Convention Story

How the Topeka Meeting Moved Forward Step by Step

Topeka is a good convention city. Though the convention of the Disciples of Christ, October 11-17, was the largest gathering that had ever come to this little city of forty thousand, we were never more comfortable than here. The gracious western hospitality threw open the best homes of the city and three times our number might have been cared for with ease. The city was ablaze with electric signs welcoming our coming and the newspapers printed most extensive reports of our deliberations. Our presence was distinctly the event of the week and we trust our message was scattered about the city so generously that it may remain with the people of Topeka for many days as some return for their many acts of kindness.

The convention was opened as usual with the sessions of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. It was a marked feature of the entire convention that the various societies placed upon the program the actual workers of the various fields. No innovation could be more popular than this. If we are at times to hear from preachers who take large offerings, we are always more glad to hear from the people who can bring information from the field direct. The C. W. B. M. had a list of strong workers who would be a credit to any organization. W. L. Mellinger spoke on the work in Mexico. He reported that Protestant work in Mexico had been almost exclusively among the lower classes, so that protestantism had almost come to be confused in the public mind with ignorance and incompetence. He insisted that if any people was to be converted their leaders must be reached and the program in Mexico should be so conducted that the strong men might be brought within the sway of the gospel. J. E. Randall also spoke of the need of making the program in Jamaica one that might appeal to all classes. He asked that the new building near the governor's mansion, being erected by our people, should be in keeping with its surroundings.

Educational Projects.

The educational projects of the C. W. B. M. are among the leading forms of service of the society. The new missionary training school at Indianapolis was described by Professor Charles T. Paul. The school is being conducted on a very broad basis and already members of other communions are enrolling in it for training. This is comforting news to the Disciples after we have spent a century using the educational equipment of other bodies for many special lines of work. The Bible chair work in the state universities was reported by Professor F. L. Jewett of the University of Texas. It was shown that while other communions have been considering the work of reaching the students of the great state institutions, the Disciples have to the present time elaborated the most practical plan in the field. As the state institutions are rapidly growing in favor and will never be lacking in money or equipment, the opportuneness of co-operating with these great educational plants in their work, is most apparent.

In Home Missions, the C. W. B. M. has shown itself very appreciative of the real problems of our home land. It has not been interested in duplicating churches in over-churched towns just to gratify the feeling that the Disciples should have a church in every spot of our land. It has gone to the mountain whites, to the negroes, to the frontiers of the west and to the orientals upon the Pacific coast to render a home missionary service which must be admired and appreciated by every person in the brotherhood. The real workers in these various fields of missionary endeavor were presented and spoke at length with reference to the trust that had been committed to them. The note of optimism was everywhere present and we have every reason to be proud of the results coming from this consecrated toil.

Foreign Society Sessions.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society began its annual convention on Thursday. Secretary F. M. Rains was gone on his trip around the world, but the best loved man in the brotherhood, A. McLean, was present to preside over the deliberations. The society has grown under his consecrated labors from a small despised movement to be the greatest of all our organizations. The society eclipsed its centennial offering last year and is now venturing to nail to its mast-head the slogan, "A Half Million for Foreign Missions." Stephen J. Corey was there with his broad sweep of missionary lore and his consecrated enthusiasm. The new secretary E. W. Allen, made an impressive address on "Pentecostal Power" in which he emphasized the need of a deeper devotional life.

A Program of Missionaries.

Never were there more missionaries on the program and never did the addresses at a foreign missionary convention reach a higher level. Our best men are saying that the most statesman-like thinkers among us are the foreign missionaries. These foreign workers cannot think in a groove, for their work presents new situations and new problems all the time. O. J. Grainger is on furlough and was present to speak on India's need. The protestant forces in India are drawing closer together, except the Church of England missionaries. Unless the latter shall see the hand of God in these union efforts, she will be discredited among the natives of India. It may not be as long as some of us think until we have a united church of Christ in India. Our people are on the field and it will be a privilege to contribute to this great movement in spite of the relative smallness of our numbers. Mrs. Madden spoke of Missionary experiences in Japan. Dr. Pickett is a most enthusiastic spokesman for the mission in the Philippines. He called attention to the statistics which showed that the Philippine mission had had over half the converts won on the entire mission field of the society. A five thousand dollar printing press has been donated the mission which will soon be busy scattering literature all over the island possessions of Uncle Sam in the Orient. R. Ray Eldred spoke on the growing work in Africa. A woman gave a gold watch in the convention because she had no money to spare for the Congo work, and the address of Mr. Eldred but served to deepen the conviction that the mission work on the Congo was a real advance of the kingdom of God. The growth there has been one of the miracles of modern missions. It is no accident, but results from the toil of consecrated lives.

Dr. Macklin's Broad Work.

Dr. Macklin spoke of his Chinese friends. He has exercised a wonderful influence in China, not simply in a religious way but in every way. He has well-defined political views that have been accepted in many quarters. He is strong on the parable of the Good Samaritan and is himself the doer of many good Samaritan acts. No Disciple could listen to him without feeling proud of the statesman who represents us in China. He replied to the criticism that has been directed to the work in China by certain reactionary influences in our brotherhood. His appeal was irresistible. "Cannot you trust us in China? Cannot you rely on the judgment of 45 out of 46 of the missionaries on the field?" The mission had been criticised by one of our journals for joining the other religious bodies in an educational enterprise. We glory in men who so truly represent the genius of the Disciples and blush that we have any who think loyalty demands a refusal to practice the Christian union which we ever preach.

The foreign society had a great booth which was the busiest place to be found in the capitol where the booths were located. The missionaries nad one continuous performance of telling their experiences and of presenting the problems of the work on the foreign field. Books and curios were sold in large numbers. It is to our credit that the foreign society is able to report the sale of seven thousand books on missionary subjects last year. We think we know that no other department of religious knowledge had that much literature scattered among us last year by all means combined. It is a great day when our literature is relating the conquests made for Christ instead of emphasizing small and unimportant dogmas that were once built up around us.

American Society's Sessions.

The sessions of the American Christian Missionary society were almost overshadowed by the interest in questions of organization that were before that society. Contrary to the belief of many people, the question of delegate representation was really settled three years ago at Norfolk when a plan for the churches to elect delegates to the sessions of the American Christian Missionary Society was adopted. In spite of this fact, a journal has been busy exciting people against proposed delegate representation.

That some of our people are without a sense of humor is illustrated by that Nebraska church where the pastor preached vigorously against delegate representation the Sunday before the convention and then got his church to elect him a delegate to go to Topeka to fight delegate representation. What was really proposed was the creation of a general council of the church to which all our societies should report. At present our societies are self-constituted boards, and those voting are life members who have bought membership with a price. A more undemocratic device could hardly be imagined. Only the American Christian Missionary society has invited churches to send delegates who could vote in its general convention. Under the new plan all societies would report to the church and be subject to the control of the brotherhood. That it is desirable that we should all have a hand in directing the evangelistic and benevolent work of the church seems beyond question. The minds of some had been beclouded upon the question, however.

The basis of representation was a delegate to each hundred members, it being provided that no church should have less than one delegate or more than ten. This was to prevent large churches from having an undue influence in a convention. To the delegate body thus created, the societies would report annually and receive instructions for their work.

Unification of Missionary Societies.

The most sweeping feature of the report was the proposed unification of the missionary interests of the church. It was proposed that the Foreign Christian Missionary Society should do all the foreign work and the American Christian Missionary Society should do all the home missionary work. It was proposed that the Christian Woman's Board of Missions should continue its present missions but that its future work should be benevolent and that the National Benevolent Association and the Ministerial Relief society should be merged into this society. Under the proposed merger, there would be but four missionary calls a year. It is for just such a change as this that our preachers and congregations have been calling and it is interesting that this, the most radical feature of the report, has not been subjected to any debate up to the present time.

In the discussion of the plan of organizing a general board, we had good opportunity for observing the different types among the Disciples. Those who favored the new move made no speeches and took no part in the polemics except to offer brief explanation. The conservative element of the convention, however made vociferous protest against the proposed innovation. It was most apparent that there were two types of conservatives. One was represented by J. B. Briney. The other type was represented by younger men mostly located in the galleries. Brother Briney made a calm and unimpassioned speech. It was much like the speech of an attorney but it was delivered in a rational mood and to the point. It came from a man whose long service in the work of the gospel commands respect even from men who differ from him in most radical ways. The younger type of conservatives made no speech but jumped up and down and yelled. They would carry their point by sheer force of vocal power. Converted under an emotional evangelism which has superseded the rational evangelism of men like J. B. Briney, they would fain accomplish all things by primitive Methodist agencies. We are glad to say, however, that our young men were for the most part inclined to listen to facts sanely presented rather than to appeals to prejudice. The motion to postpone action for one year on the proposition of organizing a general convention prevailed, almost unanimously.

Boston Versus Portland.

In the business session other matters came up for discussion. Since the committee on time and place always has its report overruled, the committee this year brought in a facetious and ambiguous report. The two cities wishing the next convention were Boston and Portland. Boston made application on account of overtures the Baptists of the east were making for union. The west demanded it on account of the influence it would give them in determining the future religious belief of a rapidly developing section. The convention after much parliamentary jockeying voted to go to Portland. The choice of the place of meeting is the one point where free swing is each year given to the debating proclivities of the ordinary Disciple.

Change From October to June.

The most radical thing actually accomplished was to change the date of future conventions to June. The convention next year may be held as late as July for transportation reasons, but it is understood that we are to have June conventions henceforth. The various resolutions that passed were all of progressive nature and we regret that we may not pause to discuss others of them. Our business meetings at the convention show up whatever wickedness is in our hearts, but when the worst has been said, we are [illegible] young and masculine and a bit untrained. With coming years will come dignity, we trust, without loss of virility.

Benevolence and Ministerial Relief.

The session of the Benevolent Association was only an hour long but full of enthusiasm from start to finish. While the association makes but little noise, it has made amazing headway and now enjoys an income equalling many of the older societies. The latest project is the establishment of a hospital in Kansas City. A church is known by the keenness of its human sympathies and it is one of the most hopeful signs among the Disciples that their type of piety feeds the hungry and cares for the orphan. Mr. Mohorter is a tireless worker in his special field and as secretary of the Benevolent Association is rapidly bringing it into prominence.

The Ministerial Relief session was also brief. While something is being done for our old preachers, it is in no way commensurate with the need. We must acknowledge as the worst blot upon the fair name of our brotherhood, the failure to come to the relief of the old soldiers of the cross. Even the men being aided get only a pittance. Some of our brightest men have an incredibly thin wall between them and poverty and want. A church that pays lower salaries than many other churches, should make more adequate provision for its old preachers than any other.

The presidential address by Peter Ainslie was a classic. We would gladly quote from it but since we learn that it is to be printed, we would rather commend to our readers the entire address. There was courage, vision and a prophet's power in this great speech, one of the finest pronouncements that a Disciple convention has ever heard.

American Secretary's Keen-Visioned Report.

The secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, Dr. I. N. McCash spoke on the work of that society. As the society has eclipsed all previous records in raising money, Mr. McCash was naturally happy, as were we all. He outlined his conception of the progress of American missions.

Prominent in this program was the redemption of the city. It is clear that the cities of America which are growing so fast must be taken for Christianity or they will become the centers of infidelity and sin that will in turn defile the whole nation. With so broad-minded a program for American missions we should expect to see this mother of all our societies restored to her early place of leadership in the missionary life of the church.

The Church Extension cause, of which George W. Muckley is secretary, had a most enthusiastic evening session. More money was raised this year than in the centennial year. Within two years at the present rate, we shall have a church extension fund of a million dollars. John Ray Ewers of Pittsburg made a notable address for the society. He is so saturated with the modern social view of things that his Church Extension address would have made a passable presentation of the social mission of the church.

Evangelism Discussed by Evangelists.

The evangelistic period was interesting to many. It is noteworthy that we hardly ever hear a pastor speak of evangelism any more without wishing it improved at many points. This critical attitude is deeply resented by some of our evangelists. Some of the men in evangelistic work frankly recognize the need of reform in our methods. Others go blindly on in defiance of facts that should be apparent to all. One speaker spoke in defense of sudden conversions. We had a great wish in our hearts that some of the church's greatest leaders would speak on the recruiting work of the church. New members must be gotten and the world must be won for Christ. How shall we do it? The evangelistic session presented one way, but we believe not the only one.

The Communion service in the afternoon was as usual the largest gathering of the convention. No address was made, for the vast audience of ten thousand people on the capitol steps and on the lawn could not have heard a speaker. The emblem of the Lord's sacrifice were distributed to the members present and at the close an offering was made for Ministerial Relief.

Stirring Brotherhood Sessions.

The Brotherhood was in evidence throughout the convention with their stereopticon exhibits. On Saturday they had a thousand men in line for a Sunday school parade. All day Monday they presented their cause. The great question that is being discussed is the function of the Brotherhood. It is not lacking in its critics who declare there is no place for such a movement and that it only cumbers the ground. Others believe in the idea of organizing our men but think the movement should be more concrete in its aims and that it should show a larger record of achievements.

It has organized several hundred local brotherhoods among us. It will certainly have to define its function more accurately, however, to appeal in the largest way to men. Dr. Combs says its function should be to convert the world. Dr. Gunsaulus insists that there can be no doubt what a Brotherhood should do, it should brother. We would have liked, if his subject had permitted, to have had him follow this lead a little farther, for it was a thought-provoking pronouncement. The Brotherhood had one of the best programs of the convention, and is to be especially commended for introducing to our people such able men from other communions as Raymond Robins, Bishop Bell, Governor Stubbs and Dr. Gunsaulus.

On the whole, it was a happy home-coming from the convention. From some conventions we have gone with much sadness. The task of progress has seemed well-nigh hopeless. Now we are astonished and delighted with the open-mindedness of our brethren. It was noteworthy that the young men were furnishing the church with their counsel. The day has dawned for a new generation of leaders. What these men will do with their opportunities it would be hard to forecast. They are men who are loyal, but who love truth above tradition. The Disciples are young among the great bodies of Christians in this country. Their traditions are less fixed. Great things may come yet from this body of Christians. All of us who have faith, must believe God will use the Disciples of Christ for some great service in the days to come. O. F. J.

CHAPTER XXIV—Continued.

"And do you think, Mister James Douglas, that I had the heart to go on amusing myself developing photographs and such like, when our minister was lying in agony of body and mind, through the devilish act of a man who scrupled at nothing to gain his own ends. It was only when Mr. Sinclair went home to the manse, that I began to develop my summer snap-shots. The one you hold in your hand was one of the last I did. I knew my man at once. A few words with the cashier was enough. If I mistake not, the man with the motor will not be seen at Brigend choir practices any more." The young men clasped hands and both their faces shone with gladness as James answered:

"It was nae chance, Maister Gordon, but a kind Providence, that led ye into the bank that August morning, wi' yer camera. He's like a rat in a trap, the black-herted villian. It was a guid day's work, Maister Gordon. Yer ain hert and mony anither's would hae been sair tae hae seen the dove in the claws

"Take it lad, and ye'll come back soon to telt me how the knave scuttled away."

"I will that, an' it'll no be lang. Though right weel I ken a'ready how it'll be. He'll gang just like a whipped cur—a snarl, a yelp, and then aff wi' hangin' lugs. If I had ma will it's jail he'd get. But David Graeme says he would forgie the de'il himsel' for the black deed, seeing' his ain son is cleared o't."

"Jail would be too good for him, James. But let us be thankful that he did not succeed in robbing Brigend of something better than gold. I know she's far above me, or you either, James. But, man, it's a grand thing that we'll tear the mask from the man with the motor car. Hurray!"

As James hurried homeward through the lighted streets of Brigend he scarcely felt himself touch the ground. His heart was beating joyously. The very street sounds seemed to ring with gladness, and the burden of it all was the thought which kept repeating itself over and over again in his inmost consciousness: "Donald is proven innocent. Donald is proven innocent." Nothing else seemed to matter. For was not Donald Jeanie's brother? In proving Donald guiltless, would she, possibly, not be saved from a fate worse than death? But did she love Archie Monteith? He had reached the door of Hopefield when he got so far in his musings. He paused on the step a moment before inserting his key in the latch.

"Would she give him up?" he said to himself, grimly. "She's a woman in a thousand—one o' them who would cling to the man she loved gin if he were a leper—or a forger—for that maitter." Then he opened the door and went in.

The pleasant clatter of tea cups greeted his ears as he put off his great coat and hung it up in the hall. A good, old-fashioned, sit-down tea, served in the dining room, was the usual custom at Hopefield. A buzz of pleasant conversation filled the room as Jamie Douglas turned the knob and entered. A great surprise was in store for him. Jeanie was pouring out the tea and, seated at her right hand, was Mr. Sinclair, his spiritual face lit up with that rare smile of his, which always seemed to set him apart from the ranks of ordinary men. Jamie was at his side in a moment, grasping his hand with a grip of heartfelt affection as he said:

"Mr. Sinclair, from ma very hert I welcome ye back amongst us. We never knew how much we lo'ed ye, sir, till yer place was empty for a time."

"You could give me no more valued words of greeting, James, than those you have uttered. Believe me, the present moment is one of the happiest of my life." He scarcely glanced at Jeanie as he spoke. But had Frank Gordon been present he would, at that instant, have pronounced her more of the rose than of the snowdrop.

"Allow me to congratulate you, James, on your recovery from recent illness." James started as if he had received a shock. At the opposite side of the table, between Mr. and Mrs. Graeme, sat Archie Monteith. He rose and extended his hand to James, with apparent cordiality. But James drew back and his eyes flashed angrily as he put both his hands behind his back. "I did not expect to find you here, Archie Monteith, in this company, and I refuse to touch your hand." Archie's face flushed hotly, but he managed to speak calmly as he said, with a sneer: "I do not choose to explain myself to one of my uncle's servants. If I have satisfied your master, James Douglas, it ought surely to be enough for you."

"But it is not enough for me, sir, as you will know before you are much older."

"Sit down, Jamie," said Mr. Graeme, feebly. "It is only fair that you should know everything. Archie has made a very fair statement. We must treat him as an innocent man sae long as we cannot prove the contrary."

"I know, Maister, Mr. Monteith has aye made fair statements. An' I'm no one to condemn any innocent man. That's how I've aye stood up for Donald. Where is he?"

Mrs. Graeme, who had listened in silence but eagerly to every word, now spoke sadly. "Donald left the house half an hour ago. Poor laddie, his heart's breaking."

Archie flared up angrily. "It is very hard, Aunt 'Lizabeth, that Donald should behave as he is doing. If I have shown to my uncle's satisfaction that two miserable bits of writing may not have been written by the same hand, if Mr. Sinclair gives me the benefit of the doubt, and you and Jeanie, is it fair of Donald to storm up because his cousin is received in his father's house as an honorable man? Why should Donald consider himself under suspicion if I am acquitted? An innocent man should not be quick to USE STEPS BEFORE THE PARADE.

The Chorus of Frogs.

"Yaup, yaup, yaup!"
Said the croaking voice of a frog:
"A rainy day
In the month of May,
And plenty of room in the bog."

"Yaup, yaup, yaup!"
Said the frog, as it hopped away:
"The insects feed
On the floating weed,
And I'm hungry for dinner to-day."

"Yaup, yaup, yaup!"
Said the frog as it splashed about:
"Good neighbors all,
When you hear me call,
It is odd that you do not come out."

"Yaup, yaup, yaup!"
Said the frogs; "it is charming weather;
We'll come and sup
When the moon is up,
And we'll all of us croak together."

Where the Daisies Lived

BY LIZZIE DE ARMOND.

There was a whole big family of Daisies, they lived in such a lovely place! It was a green field with two broad, spreading chestnut trees right in the middle.

On one side, close by the fence, a little brook danced gaily over smooth white stones singing such a merry tune, that the Daisies never felt cross but smiled and nodded gaily to each other from morn till night.

They were all dressed alike in dainty green robes and pretty white-frilled caps. Every day they gave a honey lunch to the butterflies and bees, who told them wonderful stories of gardens full of sweet-scented roses, of dark cool woods where ferns lived and the shadows gathered around.

"Yes," they would say, "it must be fine out in the world, but our home is the best, with the warm sunshine beaming upon us, filling the meadow with golden light."

Far, far above, like a great sea, was the deep blue sky, where soft fleecy clouds lay piled in heaps like snow banks. "Sometime," the daisy flowers told each other, "we will grow tall, and reach up and see what lies beyond"—but they never did.

There were cradles hanging from the maple branches, rocked to and fro by the summer winds. Through the day, baby birds peeped over the sides, their big eyes blinking and winking in the sunshine and their wide mouths always open for food; when they grew large, away they flew up, up, singing songs so sweet and clear, that the children who played by the sparkling brook forgot to be naughty and thought only of the glad music.

The red-backed spiders hung their dainty lace curtains on the blackberry bushes and the crickets chirped merrily at the front door of their underground homes.

There was life above, beneath, everywhere. When the shadows began to gather, and the sunset bars were let down so that the shining clouds could pass through, the mother birds sang softly to their tiny nestlings, "lullaby, lullaby!"

Soon the star torches in the sky began to gleam and glow, then the Daises folded up their white frilled caps, their heads bobbed sleepily to and fro, then hung motionless. Ah! they too were off in dreamland, while the silent Night gathered the Daisies and their beautiful home safe in its sheltering arms.

Alligator That Shoots the Chutes

The very last creature that the average man would select as a trick animal is the huge, sluggish alligator, yet even that deliberate brute can sometimes hit a swift pace. It has even been trained to shoot the chutes with easy grace.

This feat is performed regularly at an alligator farm in California, the big saurian waddling up the incline at the other side and sliding down the watery chute at express train speed.

At this novel farm there are 500 or more specimens, ranging in size from the huge bull to the newly hatched, lizardlike youngsters. They are raised for their hides, although the sale of the little fellows for "pets" and the admission to the grounds help swell the profits of this unusual business.—Scientific American.

No Clock-Watcher

How many clerks measure up to the standard of the young bookkeeper in this story? He was employed in the passenger department of a great railroad. It was just a little before lunch. Some of the clerks were putting on their coats, some leaving for the wash-room, some consulting the clock; some were still busy. Suddenly the "boss" entered. He glanced about him, and then approached the young bookkeeper.

"What time is it?" he asked.

The young man kept on figuring, and the boss put a hand on his desk and repeated the question.

Instantly the other looked up, surprised to see the chief at his elbow.

"I beg your pardon, were you speaking to me?" he asked.

"Merely inquired the time—that was all," said the other.

The bookkeeper glanced about the room, located the clock, and said, "It's ten minutes to twelve."

"Thank you," said the general manager and vice-president, and strolled out.

That conversation cost the young bookkeeper his place—in the passenger department—and put him under a higher officer. Nine years later he was assistant general manager, and while still in the thirties became a general manager, full-fledged.—Human Life.

A Word to Girls

Have you ever noticed the great amount of admiring attention which the graceful girl attracts? Even though she may be only plain or moderately good-looking, and not prettily or smartly dressed, there is an air of natural superiority about her which forces her upon our notice. This superiority lies in the fact that the graceful girl knows how to poise her body correctly, how to walk and sit becomingly. Consequently, no matter what she wears or what her features may be like, she always appears to the best advantage.

A plain girl who knows how to stand, move and sit with ease is far more admired than the beauty who is clumsy and awkward. Some girls are naturally graceful. But there is no reason why those who are lacking in this respect should not add to their charms by carefully cultivating the art. An erect carriage, a graceful walk, a graceful manner of sitting and rising are necessary if a girl wishes to be really charming. And it is quite within her own power to acquire these virtues. She must study her own defects and the faults of other girls in order that she may avoid them.—Selected.

A Spelling Lesson

It was at a private day school for little girls that mother had told the teacher that Grace could spell all such words as "cat" and "dog" and "rat."

Soon after the mother had gone, spelling class was called out.

"Phoebe," said the teacher, "you may spell 'pig,' and then tell us what kind of noise little pigs make."

"P-i-g," spells Phoebe correctly, "and this is the noise they make: 'Que, que, que, que.'"

"That is excellent," said the teacher. Now, Rosalin, you may spell 'dog,' and tell me what kind of a noise he makes."

"D-o-g, dog," replied Rosalin; and our doggie says 'Bow-wow-wow,' and sometimes he growls very ugly when the cat comes around."

"Very good, indeed," the teacher said. "Sallie, you may spell 'cat,' and tell what noise she makes."

"C-a-t, cat." responded Sallie. "She sometimes says 'Mew,' sometimes she purrs and when the dog bothers her, she hisses at him."

"Splendid!" exclaimed the teacher. "Now, Grace, you spell 'love.'"

"Oh, laughed Grace, "I can spell love!" Then she ran up to the teacher, threw her arms around her neck, and gave her a sweet, resounding kiss. "That is the way I spell 'love' at home," said Grace, demurely, while the teacher and all the little spelling class girls laughed.

"That is a beautiful way to spell 'love.' Do you know of any other?" asked the teacher.

"Why, yes, ma'am," answered Grace, looking around. "I spell 'love' this way, too." Then she picked a raveling from the teacher's dress, brushed a fleck of dust from her sleeve, and put in shape the topsy-turvy books on the platform desk." "I spell 'love' by working for mamma, papa, little brother and everybody when they need me!" she said.

The teacher took the little girl on her lap, and said: "Grace, that is the best way of all to spell 'love.' But who can spell 'love' the way the book has it?"

"Why, I can!" exclaimed Grace: "L-o-v-e, love!"

The teacher hugged her, called her a dear little girl, and then dismissed the class.—

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 30.

Theme for the Day.—The Sure Reward.

Scripture.—And Jesus said unto them, verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Matt. 19:28.

I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death, Rev. 1:18.

And ye lifted up your head, and it seemed as if He said,
"My beloved is it so?
Have ye tasted of my woe?
Of my heaven ye shall not fail!"—
He stands brightly where the shade is,
With the keys of Death and Hades,
And there ends the mournful tale.
—Elizabeth Barrett Browning ("The Fourfold Aspect").

Prayer.—Father, we claim the privilege of praise, which is the joy of all Thy creatures. For the new week, for the day of rest and worship, and for every precious gift of Thine, we render Thee our thanks. Thou hast made us very rich with Thy favors, and we would make our lives responsive to the call of God to higher ground and to purer character. Thou hast promised us such honor as Thy children as makes every burden seem light and every sorrow nothing worth. In that high assurance lead us to the end of the way, and bring us to eternal life. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 31.

Theme for the Day—Delusion and Reality.

Scripture—The grass withereth, the flower fadeth; but the word of our God shall stand forever, Isa. 40:8.

I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear: but now mine eye seeth thee, Job. 42:5.

"What a brave winning! Lo the idol ours!"
When softly as the fingers of the wind
Unleaf the tallest trees, the fairest flowers,
So God with pity infinitely kind,
Strips the illusions, one by one, till fain
We are to trust His wisdom once again.
Marie Mumford Meinell ("The Soul's Autumn.")

Prayer—Our Father, we thank Thee for every experience in life which removes from before our eyes the clouds and mists of illusion and gives us to know the actual nature of life and Thy purpose for us. Save us, we beseech Thee, from self-deception. May we see things as they are. May we resent no trouble and turn aside from no hardship that yields to us a truer experience of Thy love and providence. We commit our ways to Thee. Lead us in the right way, and bring us home in peace at last. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 1.

Theme for the Day—The Miracle of Mastery.

Scripture—If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ask whatsoever ye will, and it shall be done unto you, John 15:7.

I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me, Phil 4:13.

And still depart
From death to death thro' life and life and find Nearer and ever nearer Him, who wrought
Not matter, nor the finite-infinite,
But this main-miracle, that thou are thou,
With power on thine own act and on the world.
—Alfred Tennyson ("De Profundis.")

Prayer—Amid the perplexities of this world we are often tempted, our Father, to distrust Thy love and to doubt our power to win to holiness and joy. Save us from all such distrust. Teach us that our Savior has made clear our right to Thy friendship, and our power to do all things in His name. Give to us the sense of mastery over ourselves and all the evil of the world. May we share the calm courage of our Lord. So would we be like Him, in whose name we ever pray. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 2.

Theme for the Day—The Recognition of Jesus.

Scripture—When she had thus said, she turned herself back and beholdeth Jesus standing, and knew not that it was Jesus. ..... Jesus saith unto her, Mary. She turneth herself, and saith unto him.... Master, John 20: 14, 16.

Ay, the ray
Shed from those gentle eyes flushed my stilled soul
With such a glow of glory, such delight
Of sudden seeing, as if I had been
An Apennine, touched singly by the Sun,
Dyed rose-red by some earliest shaft of Dawn,
While all the other peaks were dark, and slept.
—Edwin Arnold ("Mary Magdalene.")

Prayer—Holy Father, our Guide and Friend, we have shared the sorrow of Mary of old, for we too have thought at times that we had lost our Master and should not see his face again. Yet out of every time of despondency he has brought us again by the glory of his presence and with the cheer of his word. We have heard his voice saying, It is I, be not afraid. May we never miss the joy of his recognition, but may our intimacy with him grow until we know him as we are known. Amen.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 3.

Theme for the Day—The Cry for God.

Scripture—O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee; My soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee, in a dry and weary land, where no water is, Psa. 63:1.

Philip saith unto him, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us, John 14:8.

O somewhere, somewhere, God unknown,
Exist and be!
I am dying; I am all alone;
I must have Thee!

God! God! my sense, my soul, my all,
Dies in the cry:
Saw'st thou the faint star flame and fall?
Ah! it was I.
—F. W. H. Myers ("A Last Appeal.")

Prayer—Our Father, the longings of our souls after a vision of God assure us that we share the strong desire of all men of faith to know God. Our hearts cry for Thee. We are made in Thy own image, and we cannot be satisfied without the clear shining of Thy presence. Our divine Father, we prize this longing for Thee as the best proof of our upward progress. If we were not in some true sense Thy children we should not yearn for Thy love. Deepen, we pray Thee, this thirst for Thyself, that Thou mayest satisfy us with Thy mercy now and in a world without end. Amen.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4.

Theme for the Day—The Assured Future.

Scripture—For our light affliction, which is for the moment, worketh for us more and more exceedingly an eternal weight of glory, II. Cor. 4:17.

Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom Luke 12:32.

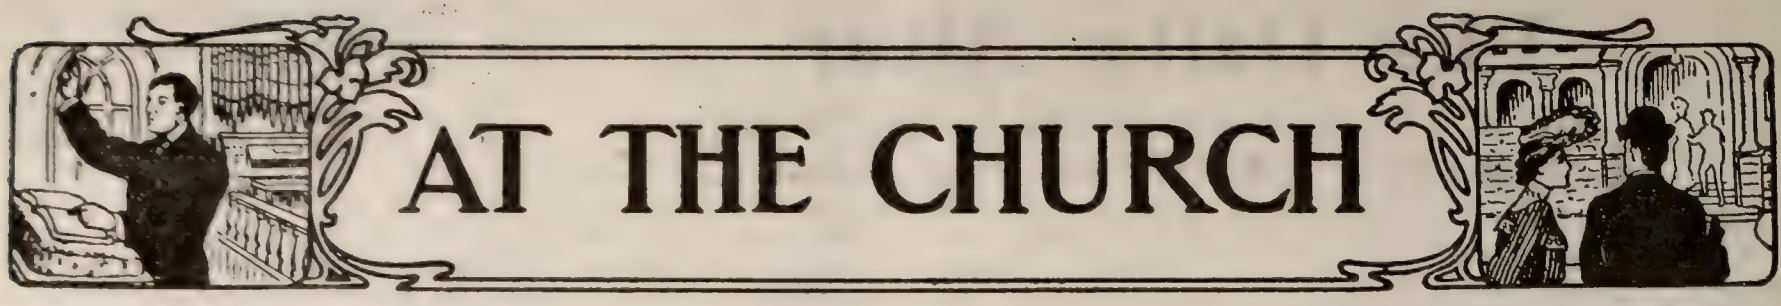
I have not seen, I may not see,
My hopes for man take form in act,
But God will give the victory
In due time; in that faith I act.
And he who sees the future sure,
The baffling present may endure,
And bless, meanwhile, the unseen Hand that leads
The heart's desire beyond the halting step of deeds.
—Whittier ("The Last Walk in Autumn.")

Prayer—We adore Thee, Thou ever living God, for this day and the strength we have to do our work. If it were not for the daily blessings of our Father, we should be too weak to master the duties of the way. But we are able wih Thy help to take one step at a time. And we trust Thee for tomorrow's portion of guidance and power. In the promises of our Savior we find comfort. Save us from letting go of his hand or giving up his protection. We want to live nobler and purer lives each day. Help us to come to our desires. For we ask it in his name. Amen.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5.

Theme for the Day—"Not as I Will."

Scripture—Not as I will but as thou wilt, Mark 14:36.



Which we have as an anchor of the soul, a hope both sure and steadfast, and entering into that which is within the veil; whither as a forerunner Jesus entered, Heb. 6:19.

"Not as I will!"—the sound grows sweet,
Each time my lips the word repeat
"Not as I will!"—the darkness feels
More safe than light when this thought steals
Like whispered voice to calm and bless
All unrest and all loneliness
"Not as I will!" because the One
Who loved us first and best has gone
Before us on the road, and still
For us must all His love fulfill.
"Not as we will."
Helen Hunt Jackson ("Not as I Will.")

Prayer—Holy and righteous Father, we have followed too much the desires and devices of our own hearts. We have left undone the things we ought to have done, and we have done the things w ought not to have done, and there is no health of spirit in us. But Thou, oh most merciful Father, look upon our weakness, and gird us with Thy strength. Aid us to put aside the pride and the passion of our hearts, and to cry out to Thee for mercy and forgiveness. Most of all may we submit our wills to Thine own, and ever learn to say, Thy will be done. We pray in Jesus' name. Amen.

Count Tolstoi Scores the Russian Rulers.

Tolstoi, the peasant count of Russia, and noted novelist, vigorously denounces the action of the Russian government in establishing and maintaining a "Jewish pale," outside of which Jews are not allowed to live. He declares that it is a direct violation of the natural right of all human beings to "live and move upon the earth." His protest must be galling to the rulers and other prominent Russians, for he declares that the attempt of the government to restrict the Jews within the "pale" is because of their fear of the Hebrew race; that the Jews are far superior as a race in business and in enterprise, and likely to eventually absorb all the interests of the country.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Upper Room*

The story of the final interview of Jesus with his disciples in the quiet of the upper room is given in various forms in the four Gospels. The third and fourth of these narratives are fullest, while Matthew and Mark are much briefer and almost precisely alike. The order of events is not easily established. Just at what point in the Passover feast Jesus suggested the memorial use of the bread and wine we do not know, for the records differ. But these details are quite immaterial.

A considerable additional section is furnished by Luke, relating our Lord's words in reference to his earnest desire to eat this final meal, and also his gentle reproof of his followers for their eagerness to enjoy whatever authority their position as his friends would permit. The fourth Gospel present a still further detail of the scene. It describes how Jesus, knowing the issue of events which were already starting him on the course toward the cross, girded himself with the towel, washed the feet of the disciples and gave them those impressive words regarding the danger of selfishness and the beauty of humility. Still further, the Gospel of John reports a fuller conversation between Jesus and Judas than the other records, closing with Judas' final resolve to sell the Master and his departure from the group prior to the dispensation of the bread and wine of the memorial meal.

The Passover.

Jesus lived the life of a devoted and high-minded Jew under the law. In all things he was obedient to both the substance and the spirit of the classic institutes of the nation. As far as it was possible he attended the great feasts of his people, though without the feeling their observance was obligatory if it interfered with the good work he was doing. He had planned his arrival at Jerusalem so that he might be present at the feast of the Passover. The memory of that feast went back to the days of Egyptian bondage, from which Moses had led the people into liberty. The Master planned a new exodus, not only his departure from the world of his active and visible leadership, but the exodus of all those who counted themselves his friends or were to accept his guidance thereafter, from the land of low desire to the region of holiness and happiness, the new social order of which he had continually spoken. Therefore the Passover had a deeper significance to him than to any other of its observers. He realized that by a very true figure of speech which was to become familiar to the church of the future, he was the real Passover Lamb of that year.

There is something very beautiful as well as pathetic in the story of this little gathering in the upper room. The disciples knew but little of what was about to come. In spite of all the warnings they had received and of the keen disappointment of their hopes for immediate honor upon the previous Sunday, they were keyed to high expectation of the early advent of Christ's rule in the world. Their minds were set upon the honors they were about to enjoy. Two of the evangelists record the earnest efforts of Jesus to turn their minds from these selfish considerations to the larger ideals of the kingdom. Our Saviour knew what a shock awaited these men upon the morrow. He had done his utmost to make them understand, but all in vain. It was therefore a melancholy pleasure for him to share with them in such quiet as the evening afforded, these last moments of confidence and direction.

Did Jesus Command the Condemnation?

It seems probable that this gathering of our Lord and his disciples took place on Thursday, the evening previous to that on which the Passover was observed. Friday was the proper day for its celebration. Moreover on Friday morning, when the priests and other officials gathered to secure Jesus' condemnation in the courts of Pilate, they were careful to avoid the contamination of a heathen building, lest they should be unable to partake of the Passover meal. Much controversy has arisen over this unexplained fact in the life of Jesus. But for some reason best known to himself, he chose on this earlier evening to enjoy with his disciples that ceremonial meal which was not due for another twenty-four hours in the calendar of the nation.

The more one enters into sympathy with the spirit of Jesus, the more clear it becomes that it was no part of his purpose to establish any ritual for the observance of his friends in later days. Indeed it is the astonishment of all who have studied his life that he avoided as far as possible the Jewish spirit of ordinance, ritual, and form as little calculated to yield values in the making of character. Jesus was no more concerned to establish an ordinance like that of the Lord's Supper than to prescribe a liturgy for the church. But he was greatly concerned to impress upon his disciples their common relation to him and their need of repeated reflection upon his teaching. Their love for each other and the common work they had to do would draw them into association at frequent intervals. That association was sure to express itself in the common meal where they seemed to be one family. He wanted them to remember that whenever they ate and drank together he would be with them. Never must they forget that fact.

Not a Sacrament or Rite.

This is the very heart of the Holy Supper. It is not a sacrament, as it has been too frequently and mistakenly called, though it ought to have all the value of a renewal of allegiance to the Lord. It is not a mystery in which a miracle is wrought by the change of the elements of communion into the body and blood of Christ, though one branch of the church has constantly maintained this thesis. None the less, is it the feast of the Real Presence. The Master would have us understand that he is present with his people whenever they gather in his name. It is a feast of Memory, because it recalls those great events in his life in virtue of which our friendship with him and with the Father has become possible. It is a feast of Hope, because it looks forward to the reunion with those whom we have loved and lost awhile, for they too are in the presence of God. But most of all it is the feast of Love, for here is brought to mind afresh that good will of God made known to us in Jesus Christ our Lord.

The Holy Supper is not a matter of form. Time and place are as nothing compared with the spirit in which it is kept. Probably the last thought of Jesus would have concerned itself with the mere accidents of this holy meal. He wanted his disciples always to think of him as a fellow guest with them at the banquet table of God. His words are not to be construed as commands for the observance of the communion. To so read them robs them of their deep and tender appeal to the heart of the disciple. The Holy Supper is appropriate on any day, at any hour and in any place. The early Christians appear to have observed it daily. Throughout the centuries the church has kept it in loving regard, though varying greatly in the method of its observance and in the periods of its recurrence. The only thing that can render it ineffective is to make of it a spectacle or a rite. Then, least of all, is the Savior remembered and honored.

The Spirit of the Holy Supper.

To give the Holy Supper its true place in the work of the church is to make it so impressive and significant that those who observe it are made to feel its inward value and its spiritual lesson. It never ought to be observed by a congregation of listless, inert, or uninterested people. It is an open question whether its connection with other and more formal services is not a direct disadvantage to the right interpretation of its meaning. Is there not danger that when it is made an essential part of a longer and more ambitious service, it falls to the low plain of a mere convention or commonplace, and misses its true meaning? Better would it be that a dozen sincere and earnest disciples were to go into another room for the deliberate purpose of observing this holy feast, and thereby register their choice of soul, than that a whole congregation should passively partake of the dispensed emblems and lose their deep significance. Rightly observed, the communion cannot come too frequently.

"Age cannot whither it
Nor custom stale its infinite variety."

But if it is in a danger of becoming a mere form, if the members of the church imagine that there is some value in the observance of this feast apart from their actual and vital communion with Christ, it has lost its meaning and is more likely to do harm than good. Better its less frequent observance than the danger of its degenerating into a stereotyped rite.

Most of all must the Christian remember that the communion is not observed alone in the Holy Supper, but in every act of good will and kindness to one's fellow men. Most fittingly has Lowell taught this lesson in Sir Launfal:

"The Holy Supper is kept, indeed,
In whatso we share with another's need;
Not what we give, but what we share—
For the gift without the giver is bare;
Who gives himself with his alms feeds three,
Himself, his hungering neighbor, and me."

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES

Topic Nov. 6: Secrets of Happiness Job 5:17-27; Prov. 3:13-18.

The subject assumes that happiness is a good and desirable thing. It may be, and it may not be, that depends upon our conception of what happiness is. If we think of it as continuous merriment, as a succession of thrills of delight, a giddy joy, void of all responsibilities and earnestness, it is by no means worth the cost. But if we look upon it as the deep and abiding satisfaction of the soul at one with God, full of earnest purpose, engaged in high endeavor, rejoicing in the pursuit and the possession of all worthy ends, we may well inquire for its secrets for they are to be desired above all things. Such doubtless is the conception underlying our subject, and we may well ask for the secrets through which it may be obtained.

We do well to realize that there is no formula which if discovered by just one, will elect one to the enjoyment of true happiness. Men might have time and ability to search whole libraries and read all the numerous volumes which have been written on the subject and still be one of the most miserable creatures in the world. The secret of happiness will hardly be found in books. John Stewart Mill, the great Utilitarian philosopher, said in effect that the world wanted happiness, but that it could never get it by going after it. And did not Jesus express the same great truth in his own inimitable way when he said "He that seeketh his life shall lose it?" The way to secure happiness then is to forget all about it. One might as well undertake the pursuit of his own shadow as the pursuit of happiness with the hope of overtaking it.

Happiness as above described lies in the fulfilment of the life function—in being real men and women, somewhat conscious of the grandure and destiny of human life and trying to realize upon it in an eternal way. As we look on life in this big way and try to order our lives accordingly, we get vision, a new sense of values, a new definition of life. We have been born again, we are in a new world, we have found God. As we view life from this vantage ground the routine of daily life ceases to be dull and heavy, instead it is full of significance, an occasion for hope, and opportunity for the realizations of eternal values. Thus occasions for words of sympathy and cheer, the sharing of another's burdens and sorrows, once duties to be discharged, now become privileges to be enjoyed.

How strangely this all happens. Is not the outside world the same as it has always been? Are not the burdens in themselves just as heavy as before? Is not the cry of the hungry and oppressed as loud and as sickening as before? On the other hand did not the birds sing just as sweetly, the flowers bloom just as beautifully, and the stars shine as brightly as before? Then how all this change, this unalloyed satisfaction, this inward joy, this true and abiding happiness? The compelling answer is that it comes from within. We are the source of our happiness and the secret is to find ourselves—in relation to God and his world.

take guilt to himself. But I know well that Donald has taken up this plea against me entirely through this scheming fellow, James Douglas. I tell you to your face, you have tried to bring shame on an honorable name, but you have failed, and I defy you."

The two men glared at each other, Archie Monteith recklessly defiant; Jamie Douglas outwardly calm, but every nerve tingling with indignation. Jeanie cast one imploring look on Mr. Sinclair. In a moment he was on his feet. Laying his one hand on James Douglas' shoulder, he said gently:

"You are a trusted friend to every one of us, James. For all our sakes take the best view of this unhappy matter."

"He is no friend of mine, Mr. Sinclair, and never has been" said Archie bitterly.

"That's a true word, thank Providence" said Jamie slowly. "I hae nae wish to be a friend tae a forger."

"Take back your words!" roared Archie, bounding to his feet.

"Saftly, man saftly," said Jamie with provoking calmness. Then in a sterner voice he added: "Sit down in that chair, sir, and don't move till I give you leave. And mind this, ma chiel, if you tempt me much further, I put you in the grip o' the law. As it is, were it not for the company you are in, you would never leave this room till I had gien ye a hide fu' of sair bones. Now for ma proof." Archie Monteith, white and trembling, took the seat to which Jamie pointed. If ever guilt was written on a man's face, it was on his at that moment. Drawing the photograph from his breast pocket Jamie held it up to the light.

"Look at this Donald's faither and mither. Look at it Miss Jeanie, his sister. Look at it Mr. Sinclair, his meenister. What think ye o't?"

"Archie!" they all exclaimed in a breath. "Alias Mr. Richard Smith" said Jamie mockingly.

"You lie" hissed Archie through clenched teeth.

"Maybe young Frank Gordon's camera lied on the eighth day o' August last, in the bank o' Brigend, at the hour o' half-past ten by the clock."

"It's a vile conspiracy to ruin an honorable man" shouted the miserable culprit.

"It's all the fault o' the camera. It meant to take one Richard Smith, an' it took the honorable Erchie Monteith instead" mocked Jamie relentlessly.

"James Douglas, this is not a matter tae treat lightly. A man's reputation rests on it," said Mr. Graeme sternly. "Tell us plainly and fully where you got this photograph and what ye think it proves."

"What I'm sure it proves, maister, is that your son Donald is what he has always claimed tae be—an honest man." As James Douglas uttered these words Donald himself burst into the room wildly excited.

"I've seen Frank Gordon" he said "and he has told me all. Give me the photograph. Oh, Archie, you double-dyed liar. How could you be so false as to let me bear the blame all these months? A felon's cell would be too good for you." Archie could bear no more. White as a sheet and trembling in every limb he fell on his knees crying:

"For heaven's sake not that, not that. Oh Uncle David, have mercy on me, save me. I'll tell you everything. But don't send me to prison. Oh, that cursed photograph."

"Ye snivelling coward" said Jamie "that photograph has put it oot o' yer power to cheat us any more. What richt hae ye tae ask mercy frae the man whose son ye blackened tae save yersel'?"

"I never meant you to bear the blame, Donald, never; don't believe James Douglas when he says it."

"But you let him bear it, Cousin Archie," said Jeanie almost bitterly.

"Ah Jeanie, it was for your sake I did it all. I was mad with jealousy against every other man that looked at you. There, I make a clean breast of it. I wanted the blame to rest on a possible rival and so put him out of my way. James Douglas, for Miss Jeanie's sake can you forgive me? And Mr. Sinclair, I will never cease to be sorry for your lost arm. You can never know how madly I have loved Jeanie. Even this evening I have felt like a demon, seeing her sitting by your side. Half an hour ago I was still hoping to win her. But this cursed photograph has swept all my hopes away. Jeanie tell me from your own lips—can you ever forgive, or are all my hopes vain?"

"Villain," whispered Jamie.

"Idiot" responded Donald. Jeanie looked at Archie sadly and tears glistened in her eyes.

"You know quite well, Archie, that I never encouraged you to think of me as anything but a cousin. Even if this had not happened, we never could have been more to each other than we are."

Mr. Sinclair took Jeanie's hand into his own and held it firmly as he said gravely:

"Mr. Monteith, from my inmost heart, I am sorry for you. But it is not too late to start afresh. Other men have fallen and risen again. Why not you? If in your inmost heart you desire to begin anew, God is ready to give the help you need. God is willing to forgive you freely, all the past, and I forgive most gladly, seeing you are about to become my cousin too. Jeanie has honored me by promising to become my wife. Henceforth there is no place in my heart for aught but peace and good will to all men."

James Douglas' face shone with gladness as he shook hands with the minister and with Jeanie, wishing them all joy and happiness. Mrs. Graeme threw her arms around Donald and kissed him fondly as she whispered:

"Thank God, my son Donald, I always believed you a true man. But oh, poor Archie. Let us forgive him, my son."

"Yes, mother, disgrace is punishment enough. And now the next train to Glasgow is due in fifteen minutes. I'm going."

"What for, my son?"

"Surely mother, my lips ought to be the first to tell Elsie. Did she not trust me in my darkest hour as you did."

"Go, my son, and may heaven's best blessings rest on you and Elsie."

When the hum of congratulations were over, it was discovered that Archie Monteith had vanished as completely as if the earth had swallowed him up. So it fared that Brigend felt itself richer for having lost, and South America became poorer by having found, the man with the motor car.

Years afterward old David Graeme, talking lovingly to his daughter-in-law, would often say:

"Ah, Elsie woman, ye may weel be proud o' yer guid man. It's no at every roadside ye'll meet wi' a man who could walk scatheless through a fiery trial, as did ma ae son, Donald Graeme."

The End

Statistical Report

How the Disciples are Giving and Growing

The report of the statistical secretary calls for as careful and prayerful examination as any feature of the Topeka convention. In gifts there was enlargement. In number of churches, ministers, Sunday-schools and Sunday-school enrolment there is an actual decrease. The increase of membership is 31,379 against a loss last year of 3,143. Mr. Warren in his report speaks frankly of the situation which we face. Our best attention should be given to the discovery of the cause of this unsatisfactory showing. For the coming year the American Society will have charge of collecting the statistics. The secretaries should somehow be given power to exercise conscription powers over every pastor and church clerk and state secretary people lest the centennial should be followed in the land. Doctor McCash and Mr. Lewis can perform no more needed service the coming year than to provide the brotherhood with a dependable statistical table.

Following is Mr. Warren's report:

Much anxiety was felt by many of our people lest the centennial should be followed by a harmful reaction. So everybody was gratified and many surprised to find, as the year's work has come to completion, that the high records of last year have actually been surpassed in all sections of the brotherhood and in all departments of the work. This splendid result must be attributed, under the blessing of God, not only to the devoted spirit in which our people have set about their supreme task of the new century, but also to the fact that throughout the centennial period permanence of results was sought, rather than a spectacular showing. Especially gratifying is the educational advance. The large special gifts to the C. W. B. M. and N. B. A. last year account for their apparent decline.

In the records of church membership we face a double humiliation. First is the general indifference of minsters and church clerks to the requests of the state secretaries for statistics. Second, and principally, the undeniable fact, that after all allowances are made for unreported churches and members, we are losing members, churches and ministers nearly or quite as fast as we gain them. Death never rests. Other thousands are not rooted deeply enough to bear transplanting, or even to survive in the original soil. We may easily mistake the widely published success of a few hundred churches for a general advance. It only shows what can be done. Greater is our shame that it has not been!

Respectfully submitted,
W. R. WARREN, Statistical Secretary.

To Keep Out the Cholera.

Uncle Sam is making a vigorous effort to prevent the cholera getting a foothold in this country. The health authorities of every city and town in the United States where immigrants from the infected districts of the old world are likely to go are being asked by the federal immigration authorities to be on the lookout and assist in the work. Every immigrant and steerage passenger coming from the countries where cholera is epidemic, who is allowed to land, will be followed to his point of destination by a report from Ellis Island to the local board of health. These boards will keep a watch on all such arrivals and isolate them at the first indication of illness until the nature of the disease is determined. The plan is an extreme precautionary measure, and it necessitates the sending out of an average of 10,000 notices every week to health boards throughout the country.

Reports the Highest Mountain.

Thomas J. Riggs, Jr., a government engineer who has been at work on the Alaska boundary survey, reports the discovery far north of the Arctic circle of what he believes to be the highest mountain on the continent, exceeding Mount McKinley, the famous Alaska peak, by nearly 2,000 feet. Riggs and his party discovered the mountain while at work on the boundary survey near the Porcupine river, north of latitude 67. The mountain is east of the 141st meridian. Riggs estimates its distance from the Porcupine at seventy miles, placing it close to the little known Davidson range. The party was unable to get close enough to make accurate measurements, but Riggs estimates its height at 22,000 feet. The height of Mount McKinley is 20,480 feet.

Steamships United States to Portugal.

Direct steamship communication between the United States and Portugal is engaging the attention of this government and, according to a report from Consul-General Louis H. Ayme of Lisbon, through the efforts of the Sociedade Propoganda de Portugal, a ministerial decree soon will be issued asking for proposals from steamship companies for establishing regular communication between Lisbon and New York.

The Visitor

We had all supposed that the Centennial of the Disciples of Christ, was celebrated last year at Pittsburg. That at least was th hundredth anniversary of the Declaration and Address. But it was several years before any congregation of the Disciples was actually organized. The Brush Run church, the first of the congregations to spring from the work of the Campbells, did not begin its activity until May 4, 1811. However, it seems that the first church of the Disciples really began its work prior to the evangelistic activities of Thomas and Alexander Campbell in western Pennsylvania and Virginia. The Disciples of Christ in New York claim the priority over all other congregations in the brotherhood by at least a year. And during the week of October 2-9, the First church of the Disciples in New York city celebrated its centennial.

Rev. William L. Fisher.

It is very difficult to reconstruct the beginnings of such a history as that which this congregation has passed through. The admirable statement made by Robert Christie, the senior elder of the church, who read an interesting narrative of the life of the congregation, was able to present only imperfect records of the earlier years. In fact, it was not until 1850 that the church called its first regular minister, Dr. Silas E. Shepherd; and even then a portion of the minister's time was devoted to the practice of medicine. The long line of ministers who have served this church includes in the order named, David S. Burnet, J. Caroll Stark, Urban C. Brewer, W. J. Howe, C. C. Foote, W. C. Dawson, D R. Van Buskirk, J. B. Cleaver, B. B. Tyler, W. C. Payne, M. L. Bates, and W. L. Fisher. Others like W. C. Morse, of Calvary Baptist church, Professor E. S. Ames of Chicago, J. L. Garvin and John L. Darsie, have served the church for brief periods as temporary pastors.

* * *

The church has recently moved from its old quarters on West 56th street to a new and admirable location at 142 West 81st street, not far from Broadway. The new building was formerly a Jewish synagogue, but has been refitted and made into an admirable sanctuary and workshop for the church. It is a much better location, nearer the center of the congregation, and in many ways an improvement over the former building.

The anniversary exercises were admirably planned by the committee. On Sunday, October 2, the new church was dedicated by Dr. B. B. Tyler, whose long service in the pastorate endeared him to the entire church and many outside friends in New York. The fraternal greetings of neighboring ministers were mentioned in Dr. Tyler's letter to The Christian Century two weeks ago, as was the evening sermon by Dr. J. H. Garrison of St. Louis, who spoke again on Monday evening. On the following evening Robert Christie presented the sketch of the church history already referred to and messages from old members of the church were given with special reference to the plea of the Disciples, and on Thursday evening Dr. William Durban of London gave a carefully prepared address upon Christian Unity. On Friday evening Professor Willett spoke and on Sunday morning, October 9th, he preached the centennial sermon. The exercises of the week closed with the address of President Miner Lee Bates of Hiram college on Sunday evening.

The First Church of the Disciples in New York City faces a new century of history with fine prospects. The pastor, William L. Fisher, is a young man of admirable educational equipment and of winning personality. He has made himself master of the situation by careful and constructive work. Old difficulties are being forgotten in the urgency of a new program. The difficulty of maintaining a strong church of the Disciples in any eastern city is well known to those who have had experience in the task. The work of our people will never be more than measurably successful in a region where Baptists and Disciples are so closely related in temper and practice. Yet the Disciples need churches in all the larger eastern cities to take care of their members who come from the west or from the provinces. To this service the historic First Church in New York has set itself throughout its history, and it deserves the gratitude of the Disciples everywhere for its devotion and self-sacrifice. May its next century be marked by increasing usefulness and success.

Dr. W. B. Craig, the pastor of the Church on 126th street, is enjoying a happy and serviceable work with that excellent congregation.

S. T. Willis has recently left the Church on 169th street to accept the presidency of Virginia Christian college. But already the pulpit has been filled to advantage if reports current during the centennial week are true.

M. W. Ammison is the pastor at Sterling Place, Brooklyn, Joseph Keevil at the Second Church and W. S. Rounds at the Third.

W. C. Bower, who has just finished his work at Edgewater, New Jersey, opposite New York, is succeeded by Roscoe L. Hill. The small band of Disciples at Edgewater have recently received the gife of a lot worth $1200 and hope to build soon.

Man hath his daily work of body or mind
Appointed, which declares his dignity,
And the regard of heaven on all his ways;
While other animals unactive range,
And of their doings God takes no account.
—John Milton.

When the day returns, return to us, our sun and comforter, and call us up with morning faces and with morning hearts eager to labor—eager to be happy, if happiness shall be our portion—and if the day be marked for sorrow, strong to endure it.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

Things cannot always go your way. Learn to accept in silence the minor aggravations, cultivate the gifts of taciturnity, and consume your own smoke with an extra draught of hard work, so that those about you may not be annoyed with the dust and soot of your complaints.—William Osler.

We take our share of fretting,
Of grieving and forgetting,
The paths are often rough and steep,
And heedless feet may fall,
But yet the days are cheery,
And night brings rest when weary,
And somehow this old planet is a good world
After all. —Margaret E. Sangster.

Your thorn in the flesh is—what? Whatever it be that disorders, annoys, grieves you, makes life dark and your heart dumbly ache, or wets your eyes with bitter tears—counseled Samuel Longfellow, brother of our poet—look at it steadily, look at it deeply, look at it in the thought of God and his purpose of good, and already the pain of it will begin to brighten.—Selected.

Beware of taking kindnesses from others as matters of course. The heart well purged by humility is so deeply conscious of its unworthiness that to receive acts of kindness always excites some emotion of gratitude, of shame, of surprise, or all three together—of gratitude for the benefit, of shame, upon thinking how ill it is deserved, of surprise that our brethren should bestow upon us what we so little merit.—From Mr. Gladstone's "Religious Life."

If solid happiness we prize,
Within our breast this jewel lies;
And they are fools who roam;
The world has nothing to bestow,
From our ownselves our bliss must flow,
And that dear hut—our home.
—Nathaniel Cotton.

Church Life

—Our hearts and our pages are full of the convention this week.

—And yet there remains much to be said.

—The Brotherhood sessions, for whose report we have no space left, will claim our attention in the next issue.

—George A. Campbell's characterization of our conventions as "national church socials" was a happy description of the Topeka gathering.

—Our friends will be glad to know that the Christian Century fared well at Topeka—in subscriptions, book sales and the Bethany Lessons.

—Dr. Gates' travel article has been crowded out by convention matters this week. He will tell of his visit to Rich Hill, Ireland, the place of Thomas Campbell's last residence in the old country and where his most important work was done.

A. J. Carrick has resigned the pastorate at Milton, Iowa.

J. W. Lowber has concluded a meeting at Perryville, Ky., which resulted in 100 additions.

The Men's Association of First Church, Wabash, Ind., held their annual banquet recently.

J. D. Armistead has arrived in Walla Walla, Wash., and taken charge of the work there.

A. Lyle DeJarnette, who recently closed his work with the church at Santa Cruz, Calif., is now in Los Angeles.

William Jennings Bryan addressed a men's meeting on Sunday, Oct. 16, at Central Church, Indianapolis, Ind.

A three weeks' evangelistic meeting has closed at Washburn, Ill., with twenty-five additions to the church.

Wesley Hatcher is the new minister recently chosen to the pastorate of the West Side Church, at Dayton, Ohio.

C. L. Organ, of Des Moines, Iowa, is conducting evangelistic services at South Broadway Church, Denver, Colo.

In the meeting held at Pickering, Mo., there were eighteen additions. F. M. Lindenmeyer is pastor there.

The meetings being held at Second Church, Cedar Rapids, Ia., under the leadership of J. H. Gilliland, are still in progress.

The church at Rolling Prairie is now without a pastor, R. O. Wickham having resigned to accept the pastorate of Indiana Avenue Church, South Bend, Ind.

J. C. Howell, lately of Hartshorne, Okla., has taken up the work at Lakeport, Calif., All of the departments of the church have been thoroughly reorganized.

Charles Reign Scoville is in a meeting at Oklahoma City, Okla., with the pastor of First Church, J. H. O. Smith. A tabernacle has been erected for these services.

Foundations have been laid for a handsome new edifice at Somerset, Pa. This will be of brick and stone, modern in all its equipment. J. D. Garrison is pastor of this church.

Mrs. M. E. Harlan, national secretary of the C. W. B. M., will address the Chicago workers on Friday, Oct. 28, at 2 p. m., at 328 Wabash Ave.

The motto of the Sunday-school of Twenty-fifth St. Church of Baltimore, Md. is: "Everybody a Doubler." With this slogan carried out, their goal of an attendance of 500 will not long lack completion.

As a result of an evangelistic meeting, a church organization has been formed at Royal, Ill., with a membership of fifty-three. The sum of $1,800 has been subscribed toward the building of a church.

I. T. Underwood has resigned the pastorate of the church at Sheldon, Ia., to accept the unanimous call of the congregation at Lake City, Ia. Mr. Underwood began his work there Oct. 16.

Tolbert F. Weaver, who spent a portion of last summer at the University of Chicago, has recently been holding evangelistic meetings in Texas. One of those recently held was at Orange, where a number of additions were received.

During the seven years' pastorate of L. D. Anderson at First Church, Palestine, Texas, there have been over seven hundred additions to the membership. The congregation is now holding services in the new $20,000 church recently completed.

After a five years' pastorate at West End Church, Atlanta, Ga., Bernard P. Smith has taken charge of the work at Kingston, N. C. The audiences are encouragingly large, the Sunday-school having an attendance of 400. Plans for a new building are under discussion.

A mass meeting of Disciples of Christ will be held under the auspices of the Disciples Missionary Union of New York, on the evening of November 1, at the First Church, 142 West Eighty-first street, New York. A forward movement in city missions will be considered.

The annual "Harvest Home" of Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., was celebrated on Oct. 23, this also being the seventh anniversary of service of the pastor, B. S. Ferrall. This was also the date of dedication of the Kehr Street Mission, now called the Glenwood Avenue Church.

During the meetings held at Second Church, Bloomington, Ill., the pastor preached an interesting series of sermons setting forth the Scriptures after the analogy of a will. The subjects were, "Jesus the Testator," "The New Testament Published," and "The Uniform Conditions of Inheritance."

Information reaches us that Dr. Herbert Martin, of Brooklyn, has been called to the pastorate of the combined church of Baptists and Disciples in Ann Arbor, Mich. The effect of such leadership as Doctor Martin will give the church will be to cement into permanency the experiment of union now being undertaken by the two congregations.

The congregation at Kingman, Kan., has decided to erect a larger building to accomodate this growing membership, and a movement was set on foot to raise funds at a tabernacle meeting being held there. The sum of $6,500 was raised in a short time and the congregation is encouraged that their plans will soon come to fruition.

On a recent Sunday, Broad Street Church, Columbus, Ohio, made a special offering of $810.00, and had a record attendance of 400 in the Sunday-school. The Sunday-school of the church at Urichsville, O., had an attendance of 441 on Oct. 9. This is a gain of more than 100 over the corresponding date last year. Charles Darsie is pastor of this congregation.

Jerome Emanuel, pastor of the church at Fremont, Neb., spoke at a recent service on "The Ideal Woman," in a series of sermons on "Character Building and Home Making." Letters had been received from over a hundred men in the congregation giving their ideas of an ideal woman, and the sentiments of these letters were embodied in the address.

A church has been established at Southwick, Idaho, following an evangelistic meeting led by A. A. Doak of Culdesac, Idaho, and J. E. Denton of Vashon, Wash. Christian union has had local furtherance, by the acceptance of the pulpit by W. H. Berriman, a former Baptist minister. These evangelists will begin a meeting at Vollmer, Idaho, soon.

The Central Church, Indianapolis, is preparing to enlarge its building so as to accommodate the growing Sunday-school. The Board has voted to spend $10,000 in making an extension. The first Sunday in November is to be a red letter day with this school. Ex-Vice President Fairbanks is to make an address. The aim is 1,000 in attendance and $100 collection.

Central Church, Jacksonville, Ill., was the scene of an inspiring service on Sunday, Oct. 9, when the Sunday-school had an attendance of 840. An adult class of 465 was taught by the pastor. This school is thoroughly graded, with a force of fifty teachers, and a superintendent over each department. Considerable time is given by the school to philanthropic and missionary work.

The church at Rupert, Idaho, held a successful meeting recently with Mr. and Mrs. R. F. Whiston of Bethany, Neb. Forty-two were added to the membership and the church was strengthened in every way. This church is now four years old. Beginning with a membership of 25, it now has 165, with men in the majority. D. B. Titus has been the pastor since the time of its organization.

John P. Sala, who is well on with the beginnings of his pastorate at the Central Church at Dayton, Ohio, reports that a recent "Church Planning" meeting was held with a large attendance present. The program included brief addresses by several of the officers of the church on new plans for the immediate future. Churches all need such a vision of their field and opportunity.

The meeting held recently at Plattsburg, Mo., under the leadership of Robert Graham Frank, closed with a number of additions, and an impetus has been given to the spiritual life of the church. It is hoped that this congregation will soon become a living link in the Foreign Society. Mr. Frank was assisted in music by Miss Una Dell Berry, J. P. Pinkerton, the pastor, goes soon to assist in a meeting at St. Joseph, Mo.

State Evangelist C. E. Chambers of Ottumwa, Ia., assisted by Mr. and Mrs. F. F. Sturtevant of Panora, Ia., has closed a three weeks' meeting at Corning, Ia., where O. W. Winter ministers. Mr. Chambers is the Christian Endeavor living link of the Southwest district of Iowa. During the meeting, which was the most successful the Corning Church has had in years, thirty-two were added to the membership.

The South Street Church, Springfield, Mo., reports that the past year has been one of the most successful in its history. Though engaged in a building enterprise which necessitated meeting in a building not easy of access, all of the organizations are in excellent working condition and have made marked progress. The Sunday-school has had an average attendance of 300 for the year and gave $1,000 toward the building fund.

At the annual meeting of the congregation of Lenox Avenue Church, New York, on October 12, the various departments of the church presented reports of work done during the past year. Sixty-three members were added during the year making a total of 355. The average weekly pledge from members for current expenses is ninety-two cents. Wm. Bayard Craig has accepted the call of congregation to continue as minister for an indefinite period.

The meeting held recently at Sullivan, Ill., under the leadership of W. J. Lockhart and W. F. Linnt, closed with 129 additions to the church, for the most part adults. The last meeting was given over to a fellowship service, when the new members were welcomed by the older members of the congregation. This church has a roster of 964, including nominal and non-resident members. J. Will Walters, the minister, has announced his intention of doing evangelistic work and can now be secured for meetings.

The First Church, Bloomington, Ill., Edgar DeWitt Jones, pastor, held its annual meeting the night of October 13, and splendid reports were read. Despite the fact that the minister was absent three months in Europe and that the church was closed five Sundays on account of extensive repairs, progress was reported in all departments. During the year $10,052.59 was raised for all purposes of which sum $1,379.75 was for missions. The church treasurer reported all bills paid and $261.95 on hand. Ten societies of the church reported all bills paid and balances on hand aggregating $366.41. There were 70 additions to the church during the year. The present membership, including nominal and non-resident is 1,729. Among the special features announced by the pastor for the new year is the enlargement of the weekly teachers' class to a Monday Evening Bible Study Club. The attendence at the regular teachers' meeting has for some time been large and not confined solely to the teachers of the Sunday-school. This new Bible Study Class will be thrown open to the entire church and will start with an enrollment of nearly a hundred. It will be taught by the pastor as before. The studies will be the International lessons with adjuncts and supplemental work. Mr. Jones also announced a week of decision services beginning Nov. 20, which he will conduct himself. He and W. F. Richardson of Kansas City will also exchange short meetings within the next six months.

One of our active and successful ministers who has just entered upon his work in a new field calls attention to a matter which constantly needs the careful consideration of church officers. That is the subject of clean church records. It is very easy for a minister, church clerk or other official, to let the list become old and unreliable. In the church to which reference is made, it was supposed that there were about 900 members, but the records were a jumble and no one seemed to know where the people had gone. This minister writes that he has spent four months in trying to straighten out the church directory. He thinks it will show somewhere in the neighborhood of 700 members. Nothing is more essential in the work of a church than an accurate and carefully revised list of its people. A church ought to publish a directory every year; it owes it to itself to provide this information for minister and members. Sometimes the coming of a new minister is the only occasion on which the membership list is revised. Long pastorates are desirable, but they ought to be safeguarded against the dangers of growing carelessness regarding a clean church list.

Observations

Sudden Death in India.

The Blue Book just issued at Calcutta, dealing with the statistics of the Indian empire says that in 1908, no fewer than 909 people fell victims to tigers, 302 to leopards, while wolves claimed 269 as their prey. "Other animals" killed 686. But the ravages of the man-eater were as nothing compared to those of the snake, for the poinsoned fangs of the latter put an end to 19,738 lives.

To cattle, leopards were by far the most destructive. Their kill was 42,427 head of a total of 98,307. Tigers claimed as their quarry 28,258, and wolves about 10,000. Snakes, it would seem, are far less fatal to cattle than to humankind, for during the year they only killed 10,000, a small proportion of the total.

But the war was not one-sided; 17,296 of the denizens of the jungle fell before the rifle and gun, and 70,498 snakes—roughly, four for every person killed—were destroyed. Bounties for their destruction amounted to $50,000. Poor humanity in England's big Eastern possession has a hard struggle with famine on one hand and the beasts of the jungle on the other.

Some Facts About Portugal.

As Portugal is now in the limelight, a few facts about the country may be in order. It is about 360 miles long from north to south, with an average width of perhaps 90 miles. Its area is 34,254 square miles. It has a population of 5,000,000. Forty per cent of the area is used for farms, orchards and vineyards, and 17 per cent is covered with forests. The remaining 43 per cent is denominated "waste land," though much of it might be brought under cultivation if the people were sufficiently enterprising. The annual exports amount to $30,000,000, and the imports to $35,000,000. About one-third of the imports are food stuffs. The country has a big elephant in the way of a national debt, over $600,000,000. At one time Portugal had vast colonial possessions, but has lost the greater part. It still has large dependencies in Africa and elsewhere however. At one time it dominated commerce in the far east, but lost its prestige and control about the middle of the seventeenth century.

The Situation in Portugal.

Whether the new regime in Portugal will be more stable than the old remains to be seen. A republic is something like a newspaper, easier to start than to maintain. The monarchists seem to have deserted the king, while the liberals opposed him, so he had to get out. There is curiosity to know what the clericals will do. Rome never willingly gives her sanction to republics, hence they will be at odds with the new government. Altogether it is a decidely mixed situation, and no one can now tell what will be the final outcome. In the meantime Spain is on the anxious seat, for what is done in Portugal must have a great influence on the Spanish people.

The Rural Life Commission.

When President Roosevelt appointed the "Rural Life Commission," a few years ago, a good many people, including some senators and members of congress, were disposed to poke fun at it. They are not doing so now. As is now acknowledged, it was an important move; and many thoughtful people look upon it as Roosevelt's greatest contribution to the American people. "Nothing in all our history," says an educational journal, "has ever touched rural life with such an uplift as has that commission. The agricultural colleges are accepting an entirely new mission and give out a completely new message. The 'short course' has a vital significance, and their summer sessions are a benediction to rural life. But noblest of all is the absolute transformation of country churches and the transfiguration of rural schools. That commission has acted like a magic wand upon the farm life, domestic conditions, and childhood days in rural life in many places, and this great work is to go on until the entire country life is blessed religiously, educationally, and socially, as fully as it has been improved by rural free delivery and the telephone."

The American Mission Campaign

We return from Topeka giving our first attention in the Bible school department of the American Christian Missionary Society to the promotion of Bible School Day for American Missions. This is the next great day in the Bible school calendar and it is important to note that no school can become a Front Rank school without taking some offering for American missions. We made a slight gain in the offering of last year over the year preceding, and the total offering made last November amounted to only $16,678. This must be doubled this year and the co-operation of every loyal Bible school worker is earnestly solicited. In view of the elevation of the Bible school among the Disciples of Christ by the American Christian Missionary Society to its newly exalted position of opportunity, the Bible schools should rally to the financial support of the work through their offerings as never before. This offering stands for the promotion of the Bible school cause in an organized way among our people. This means that the Bible school is organized as a factor in the evangelization of America. The offering is divided, half of it being used by the states in their local work and the other half by the American Society in its more general service. Not less than $30,000 should be contributed for this purpose next month.

Every school can make some offering and it will be much appreciated if the superintendents and missionary secretaries will drop a note to the national office, indicating the fact that the school will make its contribution. All necessary supplies, banks and other material for the observance of the day may be had free upon request, but whether the day is formally observed with the exercise or not, the offering can easily be taken. Send all requests to the Bible School Department of the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Geo. H. Beaman is our lone preacher in Montreal, a city of 500,000 people and growing rapidly. Recent baptisms and additions from recent arrivals make his heart glad.

During this year much greater progress might have been made had it been possible to have secured a section on which a building might have been erected. Without this retrogression is inevitable. I hope that, hard as the problem seems, we may be able to solve it and believe that there is reason to expect that we will be able to build at an early date. There are many Disciples in this city, but they will not come into the dancing hall, where we are meeting now, nor can we expect them to do so. This cause will not be moved forward in a day, it calls for great wisdom, patience and perseverance. But the reward is sure. There is no better outlook, once we get our building, in the world. (signed) N. A. Davis.

J. L. Haddock has done his usual aggressive work in the Southwest. 263 additions have come to the churches on the mission fields he has served. He writes it is impossible to answer the calls which come to him from small groups of Disciples in the growing towns in the Southwest.

GRANT K. LEWIS, Secretary.

The National Sunday-school Tour

For the purpose of introducing the 1911 Front Rank standard, which was adopted at the State Field Workers' Conference in the Topeka Convention, a National Bible School Tour of 3,000 miles is announced under the auspices of the Bible School Department of the American Christian Missionary Society. Four Bible school specialists will make this tour. R. P. Shepherd of the Christian Publishing Co., E. W. Thornton of the Standard Publishing Co., with the National Bible School superintendent are to do the most of the speaking. Prof. W. E. M. Hackleman will have charge of the music throughout the tour. These four men will be joined by the local Bible school superintendent in each state, making a team of five specialists.

The tour begins in Lexington on Monday, October 31, and will cover eleven states. Each parliament will last one day, having morning, afternoon and night sessions and will be the source of helpful instruction and immense inspiration to the Bible schools. The Front Rank campaign has really resolved itself into an effort to standardize our Bible schools. Of course this is difficult but it is certainly worth while. The emphasis in the past has been laid upon numbers; this campaign puts it upon efficiency instead.

The dates and places for the parliaments of this tour are as follows: Lexington, Ky., Central Church, October 21; Cincinnati, Ohio, Central Church, November 1; Indianapolis, Ind., N. Park Church, November 2; Bloomington, Ill., First Church, November 3; Des Moines, Iowa, University Place Church, November 4; Omaha, Neb. First Church November 5; Kansas City, Mo., Independence Boul. Church, November 6; Wichita, Kans., Central Church, November 7; Enid, Okla., First Church, November 8; Fort Worth, Tex., First Church, November 9; St. Louis, Mo., First Church, November 11; Nashville, Tenn., Vine St. Church, November 13.

Every Bible school worker within fifty miles of these cities should plan to attend. The 1911 Front Rank standard will prove an inspiration and outline a method of work for all schools this winter.

ROBERT M. HOPKINS,
National Sunday-school Eecretary.

The Woman's National Foreign Missionary Jubilee

That the entire church may know the plans for the jubilee rallies and offerings, I quote from the circular issued by the central committee in Boston:

"The year 1910-11 marks the fiftieth anniversary of the beginning of woman's organized work for foreign missions in America. It has seemed advisable to the central committee on united study, which represents the leading denominations, with the approval of Women's Foreign Mission Boards, to hold a series of meetings, beginning in October, 1910, covering thirty of the largest cities, east and west, and culminating in a great gathering in New York, in the spring of 1911.

"To this end the committee has secured the services of Mrs. W. A. Montgomery, who will, with other representative women, present the cause of woman's work in foreign missions. An extension of the central committee to arrange for meetings in the west has been appointed in Chicago. It includes representatives of nine denominations, Mrs. Edmund A. Osbornson, Berwyn, Ill., chairman, Mrs. R. H. Pooley, Evanston, Ill., secretary.

"The general plan recommended by the committee is to hold an afternoon conference with workers, the evening to be given to a lecture on woman's work, illustrated by moving pictures and colored slides. Such a lecture has been prepared by Mr. S. R. Vinton, under the supervision of the central committee. The following morning, a drawing-room meeting for specially invited guests should be held for the benefit of women of means, not deeply interested in foreign missions; at noon a luncheon served for women, limited to a thousand tickets, addresses to follow. In the afternoon at four o'clock, denominational rallies should be held, each under the auspices of its board secretary, who must be ready to present (a) Present Conditions, (b) Scope of Work, (c) Possibilities of Enlargement, (d) Urgent Demands, making these forcible by charts and figures. Literature and pledges furnished by the boards should be distributed. If preliminary work has been done in the churches, the women will be prepared to make such pledges.

"The evening meeting at 7:45 should be a grand rally of all to hear reports from the afternoon meetings and to listen to short stirring addresses and appeals by missionaries and others."

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions will be represented in all the western rallies by Miss Florence Miller, of Louisville, Kentucky, teacher in our mountain school at Hazel Green, Kentucky. She will have charge of all the C. W. B. M. conferences, see to our literature exhibit, aided by the local committee, and will always be ready to assist in any and all of the services.

Beginning with Oakland, Cal., October 12, the following cities are listed for the early fall months:

Oakland, October 12, 13; Tacoma, October 16; Portland, October 17, 18; Seattle, October 19, 20; Cheyenne, October 24; Denver, 25, 26; Omaha, October 27, 28; Des Moines, October 30, 31; Kansas City, November 1, 2; St Louis, November 3, 4; Northwestern University, November 6; Milwaukee, November 7, 8; Chicago, November 9, 10; Minneapolis, November 11, 12; Indianapolis and Depauw University, November 14, 15, 16; Cincinnati, November 17, 18; Detroit, November 19, 20.

In all these cities the Christian Woman's Board of missions has entered heartily into the effort to make this forward united missionary movement a great factor in this year's work Some of our best women are serving on all local committees and are vigorously working for large results.

The state officers of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in the states where these rallies are being held are also aiding in every way possible and will attend the rallies within their respective states.

The financial aim for the Christian Woman's Board of Missions for the jubilee year is $400,000. Action was taken at the Topeka Convention that the general financial aim be made the jubilee aim. Every member of the church is asked to help our women reach the aim that our portion of the great universal jubilee offering may be worthy the noble church we represent and one that the Elder Brother will approve. MRS. M. E. HARLAN.

Former Pastors Present at Irving Park Dedication

October 16 will be a day long remembered by the congregation of Irving Park Church, Chicago, this date marking the dedication of the addition to their church edifice. This consists of a Sunday-school room 40x60 with eight class rooms, which will be used as a gymnasium during the week. Another room 20x22 will be fitted up as a club and ready room for the young men especially. This will be made attractive in every way and offer a place of instruction and amusement for those who would otherwise be attracted to the many cheap amusements offered on every side. A large kitchen has been provided, a steam heating plant and shower baths installed and the whole building redecorated. A. W. Taylor, the former pastor, to whose ideals and plans for an institutional work much of this consummation is due, returned from Columbia, Mo., for this occasion and occupied the pulpit in the morning, and John Ray Ewers, East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa., who had also occupied this pastorate, delivered the dedicatory address in the afternoon to a large audience. The sum of $1,000 was asked for at the services, and about $1,100 was subscribed in a few minutes. Mr. Ewers lectured in the evening on the Passion Play to a well filled house. The new pastor, C. C. Buckner was also installed, and the whole occasion will lend impetus to the work.

Eureka College Notes

The Endowment Campaign of Eureka College has now reached the stage where we can speak definitely as to the closing up of the matter. The friends of the college have been urging me recently to say more about the campaign in the papers. I have worked on the principle that it was better not to talk until you had something to say, and for this reason we have not pushed the endowment campaign through the columns of the papers as vigorously as we might.

But we have reached the point now where we would like to speak a word each week about our campaign to our friends, and those especially who think of helping us. Here is our plan of campaign: We expect to push the campaign as vigorously as possible until the first of April. During this time we will cover the greater part of the state and ought to have our fund increased very greatly.

Then we expect to have a state wide campaign of two months and try to close up the proposition by the first of June.

Dr. H. O. Breeden, of San Francisco, Cal., has agreed to devote six weeks to the Endowment Campaign in Illinois and he will be with us during April and May. A number of other men have also agreed to do more or less work and it is probable that some twenty-five or thirty men will be in the field a portion of the time during the two months. We expect to have a meeting of some fifty of the friends of the college about the first of June, and if we do not have our money all pledged at that time, we will arrange for the balance of it, so that we can go before the people at commencement time with $125,000 pledged.

This ought to be sufficiently definite and we will be glad to give any inside information to any who are especially interested in work.

H. H. PETERS, Field Secretary.

Kentucky's New Sunday-school Leader

Kentucky announces with pride and high hope the presence of Walter E. Frazee as her Sunday-school evangelist. We have dwelt somewhat upon the loss of one whose life is interwoven in the Bible-school work of the state. We have now turned our faces toward the future to herald a worthy successor to Robt. M. Hopkins. Brother Frazee is not a novice in Sunday-school work. Several years' training and experience have equipped him for the task, and a mighty one it is. Not because of weakness that is to be made strong but of strength that is to be directed, the giant is already aroused calling for larger power and wisdom. Our Sunday-schools have in the past ten years given more than a quarter million dollars for various ministries, ranging from providing the expenses of schools (I believe every school should have the self-respect that comes of self-support) to endowing a Chair of Sunday-school Pedagogy and having a large part in benevolent and missionary activities. The Owensboro Convention received Brother Frazee enthusiastically. Kentucky has welcomed him and pledged her support to his leadership. She introduces him to the state. It is now—and we hope for a long time it will be—Walter E. Frazee, Sunday-school Evangelist of Kentucky.

ROGER T. NOOE, Secretary.
Kentucky Sunday-school Association.

Foreign Mission Notes

After Mrs. Dye's appeal at the Topeka Convention, a lady pressed a gold watch into her hand and said: "This is the last piece of jewelry I have, but I want it to go to the work at Lotumbe, Africa."

During the Topeka Convention it was announced that I. W. Gill of Wichita, would assume the navigation expense of the mission steamer "Oregon" at $600 a year.

One of the greatest speeches of the whole convention was that of J. H. Goldner, Cleveland, on the Laymen's Missionary Movement. It was a concise, masterly appeal.

George B. Baird, of Lu Cheo Fu, China, writes: "Our three boys' schools in the Lu Cheo Fu district are all crowded for the fall term. The regular attendance at the Sunday preaching service during the hot weather was very encouraging. Not a Sunday, but what the hospital waiting room was full. After the hot months the Sunday-school has started again with full attendance."

John Johnson, of Nantungchow, China. is down with typhoid fever. At the last report he was improving. The mission asks the prayers of the brethren everywhere in his behalf.

Doctor Macklin and family are starting back to their work in Nakin, China. They return with more faith, hope and joy than ever before.

Chas. S. Settlemeyer writes that three hundred were enrolled in the University of Nankin the first three days of the college year. It is expected that five hundred will be enrolled.

John Johnson, of Nantungchow, writes that the work is still very encouraging. The church at Nantungchow has rented a small building in a neighboring town and hopes to support work there.

W. R. Hunt writes that a suitable lot has been purchased in Wuhu for his home.

David Rioch, of Mungeli, India, reports the death of Manah Lal, the best and most faithful evangelist he had.

Leslie Wolfe, Manila, reports eighteen baptisms in the Tagalog Province and one for Singalon.

B. L. Kershner writes that the Bible-school in Manila, is working to the limit of space and money. The class work this year is of a higher grade than last. An open meeting monthly with special program is a new feature and promises to become popular. W. H. Hanna has had four operations since his return to his work in the Philippine Islands. His physician believes that now he is in a fair way to complete recovery.

The Topeka Convention voted that an effort should be made to raise a half million dollars this year for Foreign Missions and to send out twenty-five new workers. This was the least that the convention was ready to consider.

Fred E. Hagin, of Tokyo, Japan, writes: "Mrs. Kauno was baptized at the Hongo Church, Tokyo, this morning. Her husband is a wealthy Japanese now absent from attendance at the English-Japanese Exhibition at London. Mrs. Kauno is the fruit of Miss Kate V. Johnson's labors. Her work has been blessed with a number of baptisms this year. Mrs. Hagin has reopened her English Bible Class in connection with the Hongo work opposite the Imperial University, Tokyo. Frank Otsuka is at present teaching at Drake College, Tokyo, and serving as pastor for the Hongo Church. His old friends in America will be glad to know of his efficient and loyal service to the church."

That Cold Room

on the side of the house where winter blasts strike hardest always has a lower temperature than the rest of the house. There are times when it is necessary to raise the temperature quickly or to keep the temperature up for a long period. That can't be done by the regular method of heating without great trouble and overheating the rest of the house. The only reliable method of heating such a room alone by other means is to use a which can be kept at full or low heat for a short or long time.

Four quarts of oil will give a glowing heat for nine hours, without smoke or smell.

An indicator always shows the amount of oil in the font. Filler-cap does not screw on; but is put in like a cork in a bottle, and is attached by a chain and cannot get lost.

An automatic-locking flame spreader prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back so that it can be cleaned in an instant.

The burner body or gallery cannot become wedged, and can be unscrewed in an instant for rewicking. Finished in japan or nickel, strong, durable, well-made, built for service, and yet light and ornamental. Has a cool handle.

Our Readers' Opinions

A Question of Interpretation

Editors Christian Century: I have just read Brother Cecil J. Armstrong's article in the Century of the 13th inst., on "The Practice of Christian Union." Brother Armstrong and I were class-mates and studied the alpha, beta, gamma of the Greek alphabet together. I read his article with interest. I think it is good to know how different minds view present conditions, what they think of the task God has set before us.

Two statements in Brother Armstrong's article impress me differently than they do him. The first concerns the making of the New Testament the basis of union, accepting it as the only rule of faith and practice. When the denominationalist says he too, stands for that, let us unite, " Our reply," says Brother Armstrong is, "No, union can only be achieved by an acceptance of a certain interpretation (italics mine) of the New Testament. And the questioner goes away wondering why his interpretation is not as good as ours." That is to say, we have an interpretation of the Bible peculiar to us, which to the questioner, is worth no more nor is it any nearer the truth than the interpretation of any other religious body.

Now as it appears to me, it is not a question of interpretation, or at least "our interpretation." For every position for which we contend is conceded by the foremost scholars and reformers in all the denominations. And especially is this true of the "immersion-dogma."

A lady recently said to me, "Your emphasis on immersion rather than sprinkling is due to your interpretation." I said there are some passages in the Bible that admit of no interpretation. They are so plain and unequivocal, they interpret themselves. I said, what interpretation can you put upon Acts 8:38, 39,—"And they both went down into the water, both Philip and the eunuch, and he baptized him. And when they came up out of the water, etc.", except what is plainly evident upon the face of the text? She as good as admitted the fact, but immediately said, "You cannot convince me that sprinkling is not as good as immersion." And thus she had to retreeat from her position that immersion was simply a matter of my interpretation.

I said to her, I thank God, I do not have to convince you. That is not my prerogative. It belongs to the Spirit of God. As His minister, I am to preach the truth, and if it does not convince you, I am not to be held responsible, unless I have failed to preach it lovingly, prayerfully and in the fear of God.

So when Calvin, Luther, Wesley, Hall, Macknight, and Brenner, when Mosheim, Neander, Smith, Schaff and Dean Stanley, all representatives of the great affusionists bodies, say immersion was baptism in the New Testament Church, our preaching it today certainly cannot be due to "our peculiar interpretation."

In the next place, Brother Armstrong says, "The first essential is to realize and recognize that the only basis for unity is devotion to the personal Christ and His ideals," (italics mine). I agree most heartily. But when we contemplate the Christ, it is impossible to distinguish between Him, what He did and His ideals. We all fall short. Our ideals are ever a long way beyond us. But Jesus Christ and His ideals walked hand in hand.

How else can we learn what a man's ideals are except by a study of what he does. True his doing will lag behind his ideals, but his deeds show whither he would go if he could. Jesus' deeds were the embodiment of His ideals. With Him baptism was an ideal towards "the fulfillment of all righteousness." Hence He submitted to it.

Could it have been less in His contemplating "the fulfillment of all righteousness" on the part of others when He commanded "baptizing them into the name," etc.? and when those inspired by His spirit, led others to see and attain unto this ideal?

Brethren, let us not grow impatient. See James 5:7-11. It is God's will that the church should be one. But no one knows His "times and seasons." He has not commanded us to be successful in bringing it to pass, but He has commanded every servant to be faithful. And the only basis upon which we can be certain of the reunion of the Church of Christ is the Bible, since upon that it was united and achieved its greatest victories.

L. B. HASKINS.

"A Unity With Great Diversity"

Editors Christian Century: In the Christian Century of October 13, is an article headed "The Practice of Christian Union," by my old friend, Cecil J. Armstrong. In the article are statements which are not true to facts and which I doubt if even Brother Armstrong believes. For instance: "Have not the Disciples said, 'We will not unite unless our interpretation of the New Testament is accepted by all.'" This is not true to facts. The Disciples have said, and still say, the gospel is susceptible of no interpretation whatever. Our Lord did not say, "Go, and interpret the gospel;" or, "Go, and prove the gospel;" or, "Go, and compel the people to obey the gospel;" or, "Go, and order people to the church." He said, "Go, and preach the gospel." We are not to interpret the gosper or invent conditions of membership or fellowship. So we insist on just what the New Testament says and what all will admit it says.

Again: "There will be a united church, but it will be a unity with great diversity of doctrinal and ecclesiastical beliefs." That is precisely what we have today—a united church with all sorts of divisions! But surely that is not what Brother Armstrong is looking forward to.

Again: "The first essential is to realize and recognize that the only basis for unity is devotion to the personal Christ and his ideals. ....We are pleading for a doctrinal basis. Such a plea becomes divisive." Surely Brother Armstrong does not mean what he says. For the life of me I do not see how I can show my devotion to the personal Christ and his ideals other than by believing what he says, doing what he commands, being what he requires, living as he directs, and trusting him for what he promises.

The Return to Reality

The spirit and plans of the Topeka Convention have gone far toward convincing those who note the signs of the day that the Disciples are beginning to take seriously their advocacy of Christian unity.

It was a humiliating feature of the recent history of the brotherhood, since the day when its strength would have enabled it to bear efficient testimony to this cause, that it was too much taken up with its own enlargement to make of the work of unification much more than a motto.

We have never wholly lost the phrases our fathers used in their insistence upon the sin of division and the need of oneness. But in effect we denied the reality of the message by a literalness of interpretation which had the result of reducing the possibility of union to a comparatively small fraction of the universal church.

As a matter of fact, the subject was defined in precisely the terms in which Roman Catholic and Episcopalian have construed it—absorption, benevolent or otherwise. We have always been believers in the unity of the church on terms which meant in fact, if not in statement, the inclusion of all Christians in our own denomination. In however mild and pleasing pronouncements we tried to disguise it, this was the simple, bald truth.

More than this, the Disciples have been accustomed to resent as disloyal and unwarranted any suggestion that there was anything more we could do, or that the time would ever come when we should find it worth while to give up our separate and reserved attitude in order to accomplish the very thing for which we came into being.

Almost a decade ago The Christian Century printed a series of editorials which were later published in separate form*, on the duty of the Disciples in view of their historic plea, their strength and opportunity. The responses called out by that statement showed that there were some among our people who took seriously the task to which we had been called. But it was equally clear that there was a large group of our people to whom any definition of Christian unity other than the absorption of the rest of the church was intolerable.

Moreover the smug self-complacency and jingoism of some of the contributions to the discussion were depressing indications of the distance that would have to be traversed before we could understand and undertake our real work.

Even many of our leaders were visionless and passionless on the theme which was supposed to be the chief apology for our existence. In one of the sessions of the Congress of Disciples the pastor of one of our most wealthy and historic churches asked what anybody would have the Disciples do to advance Christian union that they had not done. And then with naive self-composure he added, "I have never refused to coöperate with any of the other churches, when I was invited to do so!"

It was precisely that attitude of complacence, of amiable reception of whatever advances should be made by others, which constituted the chief item in the indictment of the brotherhood for inefficiency in the cause to which it was pledged.

Some bewildered and belated soul cried out at Topeka, in response to President Ainslie's appeal for serious effort to achieve unity, "I have always shaken hands with the people of other churches. What more would you have me do?" Evidently the only answer that would be understood by such a questioner was the one given, "Keep on shaking hands."

But it is one of the cheering portents of the time that many of our people are becoming weary of our long failure to make proof of our profession. Not only in the launching of the Council on Christian Unity at the convention, but in many utterances on the platform and in the conversation of the lobbies was this made evident.

And it was not a moment too soon. Too long have our people waited to take up in serious and effective manner our supreme task. We have boasted of it, made phrases regarding it, played with it, and even in some quarters denied it. The one thing that the Disciples as a body have never done was to seriously undertake its accomplishment.

For years we appointed a Committee on Christian Union, which sent admirably worded addresses to our religious neighbors, the purport of which was that division was a great scandal in the church, that there should be unity, that we possessed the secret and the platform for its realization, and that they should all give up as speedily as possible their separate testimony and practices and come over to our ground.

That we were convinced that this ground of ours was Scriptural, common and final is not to be doubted. Yet we knew full well when we sent the overtures forth that they would not be taken seriously by a single one of the Christian bodies to which they were sent.

In those days the Chicago-Lambeth proposals were made by the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. They looked to the same end—Christian unity. They were made with as much earnestness as was shown in our own addresses. Yet they had the fatal weakness of including as one of the terms of the united church a private dogma of their own—that of the necessity for reordination of all Christian ministers in the so-called Apostolic Succession. They were sincere, but their proposal was an implied affront to the rest of Protestant Christendom, and so was impossible.

When our proposals were received by our religious neighbors, they observed that we included in the terms proposed for the united church an item which they looked upon as fatal to the acceptance of the message—the dogma of immersion, a requirement that the larger portion of the Christian world should be rebaptized before we could have complete Christian fellowship with them. Most of our friends in other churches felt about the matter precisely as we did about the Episcopalians—we were sincere, but our proposal gave affront to the rest of Christendom, and so was impossible.

Our attitude has too much implied the conviction that unity must be on our own ground, or else it is hopeless. That may be true, but is it right for us to assume and keep our air of finality? The surer we are that our position is sound and incontrovertible, the more serious we ought to be in the effort to meet our denominational friends at every point, to compare plans with them, to ascertain what elements of weakness and inconsistency they find in our proposals, and to go as far as we can in the effort to find a common ground.

It was a notable fact that the Congregational Council in Boston at the same time we were meeting in Topeka, uttered earnest words upon the need of a united church, and took steps to further the enterprise.

It was significant that the Protestant Episcopal Convention at Cincinnati, during the last two weeks, organized a definite movement for the promotion of the same cause of union, and a fund was raised, to which one man subscribed $100,000.

These are the hopeful signs of an interest that is rising. The voices heard at the Layman's Missionary Congress and the World's Missionary Conference were pitched in the same key. It is the moment of opportunity for the Disciples.

"What more can we do?" is still the cry of some of our brethren. To that each must give his own answer. The spirit of good will cannot fail to find methods of expression when once it is aroused. Perhaps some will go further than others. It is only natural. It is true in every other department of our activity—evangelism, education, church services, institutional work.

There are diversities of methods, and variations in the interpretation of obligation and freedom. But there may at least be the same spirit of brotherly love for all of the Lord's people.

The time is propitious. The call of the Master, of the Fathers and of the best of our history is imperative. We have prepared long enough for the work to which we were called. Let us take it up. Let us return to reality.

BY ALVA W. TAYLOR

The "Catch-my-pal" Movement

It is doubtful if any temperance movement of modern times has grown more rapidly than has that movement curiously nicknamed "catch-my-pal." Its first anniversary showed a membership of 120,000. It began at Armagh and has spread over all Ireland and over into England and Scotland, but it is especially strong in north and central Ireland. It was organized by Rev. R. J. Patterson through an inspiration. Coming home one evening, he spoke to some fellows who were standing about a lamp post, talking. One of them spoke of their weakness for drink and he invited them to his home. To his surprise, they went, and after a talk, accepted his invitation to each to bring a friend the next night to talk over the matter of drinking. From that act resulted the "catch-my-pal" movement, officially named "The Protestant Total Abstinence Union." Its success is largely due to the fact that it came at a psychological moment and adopted a democratic method. Ireland was busy discussing the Lloyd George Budget, with its increased tax on whisky, one of the island's chief industries. It had forced up the price and thousands were quitting drink. In Belfast, the police court cases had been reduced 60 per cent and the politicians were bewailing the ruin of the land through destruction of the whisky business. Distilleries were closing down or uniting interests to keep going, and temperance advocates were pointing out the fact that Ireland would not suffer if she would quit drinking. There were temperance societies in plenty, but they were managed by people who did not and never had been drinkers. Rev. Patterson conceived that night of the plan to get drinking men to quit and then go with religious zeal after their fellow drinkers. He asked each man to take a pledge before his fellows, vowing to abstain for the sake of "God and home and native land" and to "do all that within me lies" to get others to join. The pledge taking closes with the clenching of fists and saying, emphatically, word at a time, "We—will—see—this—thing—through." At the close of every meeting all go out after saying the Lord's Prayer together. The various Protestant churches have been brought together as nothing else has ever been able to bring them together, and old Erin is stirred as nothing has stirred her in a temperance way since the days of Father Mathew.

Some of Mr. Bryan's Temperance Dynamite

Here are some of Mr. Bryan's characteristic statements on the temperance question:

"I refuse to go to the brewers to learn either constitutional law or the principles of the Democratic party."

"If I have any apologies to offer, I shall not offer them to the liquor interests for speaking now, but to the fathers and mothers for not speaking sooner."

"I am not willing to accept that definition of party that puts consideration for the party above consideration of the state's welfare."

"A man can be a Democrat in good standing without staggering when he walks."

"The saloon is an outlaw and a nuisance and lives by sufferance where it lives at all."

"You cannot build a slaughter house in your block without consulting the people around you, yet you would establish a saloon and fill the air with its poison and say the people who suffer from it have no right to protest."

"I know of nothing that will more hasten prohibition than to have the liquor interests protest that the people of a county cannot have it "dry" when they want it "dry."

"Do not deceive yourselves by thinking you can avoid a decision by silence."

"Will you put the Democratic party on the moral side or on the immoral side?"

"I am not willing to trade men who think so much of the home that they refuse to march under the banner of the liquor interests for men who come simply for a drink and leave us when the barrel is empty."

"If you will read the lexicon of the saloon keeper you will find that the two words—fairness and justice—do not appear."

"We have had aristocracies of birth and of pocket book, but when a minority says the majority cannot abolish the saloon if it wants to, you have an aristocracy of appetite."

Life Insurance Experience With Teetotalism

Seventy years ago an Englishman asked a life insurance company to give him an extra rate because he was a teetotaler and would therefore live longer. The company refused to insure him at even the regular rate and demanded an extra premium for the same reason. It so aroused him that he organized the "United Kingdom Temperance and General Provident Association. Its experience has been great enough to prove some things. Of course, all but moderate drinkers are refused life insurance. This company made a special class for teetotalers, charging them a lower premium, and kept all statistics separate. Its actuarial figures prove that between the ages of 20 and 30 the teetotaler has an advantage of 11 per cent, from 30 to 40 of 68 per cent, from 40 to 50 of 74 per cent, and from 60 to 70 of 19 per cent. It will thus be seen that even moderate drinking has the effect of producing 10 per cent more deaths in mere beginners, while in the prime of life and at the time when there is the largest need of life in its fulness and strength, it produces from 68 to 74 per cent more deaths. Those who survive through the greater labor of middle life suffer less loss, but even then it is enough to form striking witness to the economy of total abstinence as against even moderate drinking. This company's totals are so great and the time so long that its computations are scientific to an absolute degree. The two classes were about equal in numbers on its records, so the comparisons are made good by the quantity of experience. On total expectation, the moderate drinkers and non-abstainers lose 23 per cent on a basis of 40 years' calculation. The Septre Life Association of London gives approximately the same figures for its experience of twenty-three years. The Scottish Temperance Assurance Association found the advantage to be 25 per cent in a period of twenty years. The Mutual Life of New York made an investigation by ascertaining who were its total abstaining policy holders and found that their death loss was 78 per cent of the maximum calculation, while that of the non-abstainers was 96 per cent. A Mr. Nelson, a noted English actuary, conducted an investigation which he considered most thorough and concluded that the total abstainer of twenty years had an average "expectation" of living forty-four years longer, while moderate drinkers could count only on fifteen and one-half years more. At thirty, the teetotalers could expect to average thirty-six and one-half years longer, and the moderate drinker but thirteen and one-half years.

Temperance Sweeping Around the World

Here are some items that show the nature of temperance progress in lands other than our own. Europe has known nothing but the free use of liquor for centuries. The signs are abundant that advancing civilization is bringing this reform, along with others, even in conservative old Europe.

Emperor William continues his personal crusade on behalf of more temperate drinking and says that Germany's industrial supremacy depends upon it. The proposal is made that no place be allowed to sell liquor without keeping temperance drinks, milk, buttermilk, etc., on tap also. Temperance and total abstinence societies are growing in the Fatherland.

The Scandinavians are the most temperate of Europeans. In Sweden, the country districts are prohibition by local option, and the whole state bids fair to soon become prohibition. In Norway, more than one-half of the cities are "dry." In Finland, an absolute prohibition law has been passed.

Switzerland has taken over the liquor business in the interests of regulation, and spends a part of the profits in caring for its victims. The manufacture of absinthe has been prohibited recently.

France is awaking to the terrible destructiveness of absinthe and is preparing measures against it. It is found that there is a frightful increase in insanity in departments where it is used and no increase in those where it is not used. There is talk of a government monopoly of the liquor business in the interests of regulation.

Lloyd George put a tax of $3.50 per gallon on spirits and decreased their sale by 10,000,000 gallons the first year. He raised the license on saloons from $300 to $1,200 and decreased their number by 20,000 the first year. Arrests for drunkenness decreased 35 per cent, and poor Ireland, spending heretofore fully one-third of all her total income on liquor, has seen a great decrease in drinking and a great increase in the growth of the temperance movement. Two years ago the Lords threw out the bill that would have eliminated 30,000 retailers with compensation. Now they have lost 20,000 with no compensation, and the movement has just begun.

Temperance-Grams

Iceland is a saloonless and a beerless land. Its 78,000 inhabitants are all total abstainers. Not a drop of liquor can be made upon or imported into the island. It is a rugged country, with plenty of hard work, but it has not a single child of ten that cannot read and write, and there is little poverty or crime.

London's new Lord Mayor is a teetotaler. Inasmuch as his chief function is that of a social factotum, and the cellars of the mansion are among the most famous for their wine, it will be interesting to see whether the new dignitary will consider it necessary to drink wine to be Lord Mayor. Queen Mary is also a total abstainer and is bringing her children up as such.

The rich brewers are spending millions on a "campaign of education" in behalf of beer drinking. They buy up whole pages of the great daily papers and some of the magazines and print tracts with the zeal of a sectarian propagandist. Many of the more respectable magazines are refusing their stuff. Some of them make "martyr" whines. It is like a religious journal telling of its "sacrifice" in refusing fake medicine advertisements. One of the biggest street car advertising firms in the country recently refused a $150,000 contract for these beer advertisements, and no one has heard of its sniffling.

The farmers are coming to be pretty solidly lined up against the saloon. Now, when the laboring men are enlisted, the battle is won, for they will furnish the balance of power in the cities, as the farmer does in the country. The Central Labor Council of Philadelphia recently passed, by a vote of three to one, a resolution in favor of local option. When labor goes on a strike, it is the saloon that brings a certain element to acts of violence, and all labor is judged thereby.

The number of retail liquor dealers decreased by 13,000 in the two years from 1907 to 1909, the number of saloons by 23,000. Today, with such vast unpeopled territories as Nevada, Montana, and Arizona yet "wet," 65 per cent of the geographical area of the United States is "dry."

The W. C. T. U. is enlisting the Nurses Associations in their fight on nostrums and alcoholic concoctions put out as medicines.

The National Liquor Dealers' League "resolves" that local option is opposed to every principle of good government, depreciates real estate prices, drives trade out of the territory and is the entering wedge for mail order business, which in turn will bring the parcels post and center all business in the large cities. What a plague it is to allow the people self-rule!

Bonfort's Wine & Spirit Gazette says, "The Saloon business in this country is doomed unless the laws are so changed as to rid the trade of the disorderly saloon." Then it must be doomed.

Before the local option principle took hold as a rational step toward universal suppression of the liquor traffic, state-wide prohibition had been voted in 17 states and lost in 14 of them. There will be many reverses in the present war but let it be remembered that there are reverses in all wars and that this is not a battle, but a war of many battles. When state-wide prohibition is builded up by the solid experience of a majority of the counties having tried it out, nothing will bring reverses except the fact that the friends forget eternal vigilance in the presence of a sleepless foe.

There are 7 cities of 100,000 or more that are "dry," 13 of over 50,000, 28 of more than 25,000 and 149 of more than 10,000, in all 197 cities of more than 10,000 population and with a total population of more than 5,000,000.

From one bushel of corn the distiller makes four gallons of whiskey. He sells it for $16.40. The farmer gets $.50 the government $4.40, the railroad company $1.00, the maker $4.00, the retailer $7.00 and, adds the Wichita Beacon, "The man who drinks it gets drunk, his wife gets hunger and sorrow, his children rags and insufficient food."

Church people who vote the party ticket without question should note the saloon keepers' party creed. It was voiced by the president of one of their state leagues and is as follows: "If aspirants for public office are found to be in harmony with us, work as a unit for their election regardless of party. If known to be opposed to our welfare, move heaven and earth and hell to defeat them."

News comes concerning the progress of the union movement between the older British churches of Christ and those affiliated with the Christian Association to the effect that the joint committee of the two bodies has been appointed and will hold its first meeting soon. Prospects are more encouraging for co-operation between these two groups of churches than at any previous time.

A Chinese convert to Christianity was asked to explain what he meant by saying that he had never been so good a Confucianist as he had been since becoming a Christian. He replied that in Christ he had found the noblest ethical teaching of Confucius established, illuminated, and uplifted to a height and a glory such as he had never conceived before. It is thus that all the world will yet bring homage to Jesus and crown him Lord of all.

There is to be held in Chicago in the near future a celebration in honor of the centenary of Theodore Parker, the noted Boston preacher, whose influence was so potent both for freedom of thought and for righteousness of action in all New England. Channing. Bushnell, Parker and Beecher are men whose characters and messages reached far beyond their denominational environment. They stand as great citizens who have helped to mold a republic, and it is fitting that their lives should be brought to remembrance on appropriate occasions.

Fresh attention is called to the work of the American Institute of Sacred Literature connected with the University of Chicago which provides numbers of admirable study and reading courses for Bible students, Sunday-school teachers and ministers. The work of the institute has gone forward for many years with increasing value to those who have availed themselves of its help. The outlying study courses have had a long and honorable history. They represent inductive Bible study in its simplest form. It is well worth while to send a request to the institution for full information regarding its work.

The American Bible Society has just added to its interesting list of versions of the Scripture in the languages of the North American Indians, a translation of the Book of Genesis and the Gospel of Mark into the language of the Navajos. This is the first publication of the translation of the Scriptures into the tongue of these people. The version has been prepared by the Rev. Leonard P. Brink, of Tohatchi, New Mexico, connected with the Southwest Indian Conference, an interdenominational mission at work in that region. There are said to be 25,000 Navajos in the United States, and there are at present Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Christian Reformed, Gospel Union, and independent missions at work among them. These Scriptures will help in the education of the people and in the formation of a Navajo literature.

During Dr. Errett Gates' stay in Edinburgh and Glasgow, on his way to spend the winter in the University of Berlin, he was able to secure a large amount of valuable literature bearing upon the history of the period just preceding the work of Thomas and Alexander Campbell in America. The consignment of books purchased by him, and including two or three hundred titles, has just been received at the Disciples' Divinity House of the University of Chicago. These books will prove exceedingly valuable in the work of our ministers in residence at the university, particularly those who are working in the history and literature of Christian unity. A number of these volumes are rare and out of date, and only to be secured in the painstaking manner in which Dr. Gates has procured them. This consignment of books will add very greatly to the value of the library of the Disciples' Divinity House, which is now by far the most complete existing on the subjects with which it deals.

Both of Dr. Willett's Palestine Travel Study classes have continued to support hospital work in Palestine since their visits there. One of these hospitals is that of Dr. Masterman at Jerusalem, the other is that of Dr. Torrence at Tiberius. A cot in each of these hospitals is supported by these classes. A recent note from Dr. Masterman to the secretary of the first Palestine Travel Study class acknowledges the receipt of the annual check for the English Mission Hospital at Jerusalem, and states that he has now full charge of the hospital, having given up his work at Safid, where he spent a portion of his time during the past three years. He has also a young physician to assist him. The magazine published by the English Mission among the Jews in Palestine and entitled "The Jewish Missionary Intelligencer," gives frequent reports of Dr. Masterman's work. He sends cordial good wishes to all the members of the class.

The twenty-eighth annual session of the Baptist Congress is to be held in Augusta, Georgia, November 8-10. Among the topics to be considered are "The Place of Prayer in the Modern World View," "How Shall We Interpret the Holy Spirit in the Life of Today," "The Christian Principle in Modern Criminology," "The Relation of the Baptist Denomination to the Universal Church," "Can the Distinction Between Canonical and Non-canonical Writings be Maintained?" and "Christian Experience as Testimony for Truth." Among those whose names appear on the program are Rev. George H. Ferris, D. D., of Philadelphia; Rev. Harry E. Fosdick, D. D., of Montclair, New Jersey; Mr. Mornay Williams, of New York; Rev. Charles H. Dodd, D. D., of Baltimore, and Professor G. B. Smith, D. D., of the University of Chicago. A number of Disciples have membership in the organization of the Baptist Congress, growing out of the joint congress held in this city two years ago.

Concerning the World Beyond

Do you believe the fact that Moses and Elijah met the Savior; and in the presence of the three apostles talked about the kingdom, teaches that the dead are conscious and interested in the work of the church on earth and in the progress of the saints here? Do you believe we shall know each other in heaven, and if so, do you think the conscious knowledge of the saved or lost condition of our friends will in any way affect the happiness of the saints or our friends in heaven? W. D.

Gainesville, Texas.

The presence of Moses and Elijah with Christ on the Mount of Transfiguration, while not the basis of any doctrine regarding conditions in the larger life, is at least suggestive of what on other grounds seems a reasonable belief. It appears to be no part of the purpose of the New Testament to present a program of the life to come. It concerns itself alone with the certainty of that life. Yet the character of God and the nature of the soul of man makes reasonable, and in many ways convincing, the belief that life goes onward under conditions which permit not only of continued intelligence but growth.

It seems unreasonable to believe that those who have entered into the life beyond should be either unconscious or unconcerned regarding the progress of the kingdom of God in this world. Those who have been friends of God here, working for the fuller realization of his purposes, cannot be indifferent to the progress of righteousness after they have ceased to be active in human society. And why should they know or care less about it than in the days of their flesh? Every element of permanency in character would lead us to suppose that neither their interest nor their conscious concern in the forward goings of the kingdom would be changed.

That they do not communicate with us, or at least that we have perfected as yet no methods by which such communications can be received and understood, is probably in no sense due to their unconcern but rather to the imperfections of our education and the immaturity which marks our present stage of spiritual life.

The question you raise with regard to the joy or sorrow of our friends in heaven over the good or evil lives of those they leave behind is beyond the range of satisfactory answer. Yet even here something may be said. The interest we have in people depends in large degree upon the similarity of taste and aim in life. If those who have loved us and have entered into life mark our waywardness and final choice of evil, must this not lessen the bond and increase the distance, until moral values alone mark the degree of remaining interest? The saints have sorrow of heart in this life over the evil courses of those they love. Is it unlikely that such sorrows enter into the progress of the soul in its career toward the highest good? If God Himself is grieved with the loss of character in those whose promise was fair, should the saints be untouched by the same sense of grief—a grief, however, that fades as life goes forever into new amplitudes of power.

In the presence of all such problems the mind stands hesitant where no definite word of testimony has been spoken. Yet there are many questions of deep significance which lie outside of New Testament instruction, and on these it is not only the right but the duty of the friends of Jesus to think. Something at least may be made out in harmony with the familiar teachings of our Lord. The rest must be left to the fuller light of the life to come.

"For Me To Live Is"—What?

"So long as we love, we serve. So long as we are loved by others, I would almost say we are indispensable; and no man is useless while he has a friend."—Stevenson.

Is it worth while to live? No, if we intend to live without love. This world is no place for the selfish man. True, he can often acquire material resources and he may have power over other men. But what of it? He never has a single moment of happiness. Animal pleasure may be his portion for a part of his life, but even this is less in quantity and poorer in quality than that of one who lives a complete human life. "I beg to be enrolled amongst those who wish to spend their days as easily and pleasantly as possible." "It is not reasonable that a wise man should hazard himself for his country, and endanger wisdom for a set of fools." These are sayings of ancient lovers of pleasure. Later men of the same school of philosophy said, "Life only appears a good thing to a fool." This world was not made for men who intend to live as easily and pleasantly as possible, and those who think it is will reach the conclusion of the Cyrenaic, that only a fool will think it is worth while to live.

Yesterday I was at the funeral of an aged disciple of the Lord. About her body sat her children and their children's children. One who had known her for nearly three score years told the story of her life. It was a simple story and yet it was more inspiring than that of any king or warrior I ever read. The most hopeless of pessimists could not have stood by that bier without misgivings as to his view of life. Men and women searched their own hearts and found evil which they had been hiding even from themselves. With the sense of failure there was joined the hope of nobler service, for the most common duties had been glorified by the wisdom and grace of this Christian woman, and she had revealed the possibilities of service which come to every honest soul. She thought life was worth living. To the last day her mind was busy devising ways of doing good. Her home was the place of peace and gladness. She was always looking for the best in other persons. Yes, it is good to live if one is a disciple of Jesus Christ.

David Livingstone seemed to have no complaint to make about the weariness of this earthly existence. He had many of what the world calls hardships, but he said he never made any sacrifices. Paul was not a pessimist, even when he was in prison for the faith he preached and was being slandered by false brethren. He grew weary, but his weariness was not that of disgust and cynicism. For him to live was Christ. He had a message of love for all mankind and as long as he had freedom to speak or write, he delighted to give his message. The Christian cure of weariness is work of the right sort. There is no reason whatever why a man should not become disgusted with himself and everybody else if he is living for himself alone. Such a man has not enough to interest him. The more intelligent he is, the sooner he will be ready to say all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

What, then, does the Christian do with the dark problem of suffering? He accepts suffering as a necessary part of life. He endeavors to reduce the amount of pain in the world. He studies disease for the purpose of banishing it from the earth. He cultivates grace of speech that he may not needlessly wound the heart of the weakest of the children of men. But he knows that with all the efforts that are being made to gladden the world, suffering remains and will remain. As long as there is a difference between the ideal and the actual, between what men feel they ought to be and what they are, misery will form a part of human experience. Moral pains will cease when men sink to the level of beasts or rise to the perfection of God. The Christian rejoices in the pain that is a necessary concomitant of spiritual progress. "Tribulation worketh patience." The apostles rejoiced that "they were counted worthy to suffer dishonor for the Name." Persecution enhanced their self-respect and gave significance to their faith. To live for Christ today and accept the consequences brings a like reward.

Our Fellowship and the Task

The Militant and Irenic Address of American Society's President

PETER AINSLIE.

One afternoon I climbed the dark stairs of Stirling Castle that I might stand on its famous balcony and look out upon what Queen Mary of Scots said was the most beautiful landscape in the world. The rocky eminence, upon which the castle rests, rises abruptly four or five hundred feet out of a level plain of green fields that extend for several miles in every direction and upon which lie the silvery links of the river Forth. At the base of this great rock is the historic beheading block and the fields to the west were made famous by the battle of Bannockburn.

Yonder to the southeast, Edinburgh, with its castle, university and great churches, sits in splendor upon the Firth of Forth. Yonder to the east is the North Sea, bearing upon its bosom vessels that carry the flags of all nations. To the southwest, the smoke rises from the vast industrial centers of Glasgow. And yonder to the northwest, Ben Lomond lifts its snow crowned head far into the sky, as if it were keeping watch over all Scotland. Over this picture was the arched sky like an overturned bowl of blue, with amber clouds hanging in the west holding the wealth of a sapphire, purple and crimson sunset.

Amid such history, such poetry, such facts, I felt as though I were looking around the world and beyond it. It is so today. I speak your own sentiments when I say that no one who sees and reads and thinks and feels can look out upon this country without being stirred by the world's panoramic vision.

A Look Into the Past.

We, who wear the name Christian only, have climbed a hundred rugged steps and today standing on God's balcony, we look down the past and yonder is Jesus moving in that mightiest drama of all time. The cross is still stained with His blood, the tomb of Arimathaea lies broken and the ascension from the Mount of Olives is as fresh as though it were the action of yesterday. Yonder are the apostles telling the story of Jesus and the resurrection from the dead. Yonder is Paul preaching in Ephesus, Philippi, Athens and Corinth.

Yonder is Polycarp, Papias, Irenaeus and hosts of saints witnessing for Jesus. Yonder is Tertullian, saying defiantly to the whole Roman world: "We are of yesterday, yet we have filled your empire, your cities, your islands, your castles, your towns, your assemblies, your very camps, your tribes, your companies, your palaces, your senate. Your forum and your temples alone are left you." Yonder is Augustine vindicating the Christian faith against pagan intrusions and leading the council in the settling of our New Testament canon.

Yonder is Boniface preaching the Gospel to the painted savages of Germany and Xavier to the untaught pagans of Asia. Yonder is Hugo de Saint Caro marking the chapters in our Bible as we now have them and Thomas a Kempis writing his "Imitation of Christ." Yonder are Savonarola and Huss insisting on the Bible as the surest guide to the knowledge of God, and the ashes from the burned body of the former are thrown into the Arno and from the latter are strewn on the Rhine. Yonder is Fra Angelico, Raphael and Da Vinci painting pictures of Jesus on canvas and Michaelangelo carving the features of Jesus in stone.

The Army of Martyrs.

Yonder is Luther nailing the ninety-five thesis to the door of castle church in Wittenberg, and Calvin, a refugee from persecution, writing his "Institutes." Yonder are the Wesleys calling all believers in Jesus to the life of personal holiness and the Campbells pleading for a united church by the return to the New Testament in name, in ordinances and in life. What a host of saints! Some were called "Nazarenes," others "Christians," still others "Roman Catholics," others "Reformers" and some "Disciples," but whatever be their names, all these are our brethren. If they were authors, we have their books in our libraries and we quote their sayings; if they were artists, we have their paintings in our homes and admire their achievements, and whatever may have been their contribution to Christ, we hold them as our brothers. Some of them thought differently from what we think, but they all loved our Lord and sought to reproduce Him in their lives. Say what you will, they live because Christ lived in them.

A Host of Saints.

But standing on God's balcony, we look about us today and yonder are millions in all parts of the world witnessing for Jesus. Some are preaching to the multitudes with a passion like those brothers of the holy past. Others have left homes and friends and are preaching Jesus and the resurrection from the dead to the heathen nations. Here and yonder are hospitals for the sick, asylums for the orphan, homes for the aged and schools for the ignorant. Some are ministering to the poor and friendless, others are crutches to the lame and stumbling, and thousands are serving in obscure places for the sake of Him whose we are. What a host of saints!

They are called "Presbyterians," "Baptists," "Episcopalians," "Congregationalists," "Lutherans," "Methodists" and "Disciples," but whatever be their names, all these likewise are our brethren, for they show that they have been with Jesus. Some may doubt this fellowship, but I will not, for I feel in my heart the kinship, as I feel within me the love of God.

Still standing on God's balcony we look into the sacred future and yonder are vast multitudes of believers out of every tribe and tongue and nation. They are servants of Jesus, because our brethren of the past and our brethren of the present served. The currents of fellowship, too frequently unrecognized by us, have so passed from one heart to the other, until all the saints of the future belong in this blessed circle of the redeemed. Love, fraternity, friendship and brotherhood are passing from dream into fact. Sectarianism is going to its entombment and a united brotherhood is rising with its undivided message for a lost world, for yonder down the ages is one flock as there is one Shepherd.

An Unbroken Fellowship.

There nobility of soul is holding an unbroken fellowship with Christ and with all who worship before Him, for out of the travail of the church, all denominational names and their dependencies are lost and out of the Christ spirit shall rise for perpetual adornment that name which is above every name and before which every knee shall bow. Far yonder on the rim of the horizon, unnumbered hosts of angels assemble and the unnumbered hosts of the redeemed of humanity meet and mingle, like where the blue of the sky and the blue of the sea touch and the line of the sea is lost in the line of the sky. What a host of saints! They both wear His name and reproduce His life. Yonder among them and yet above them all is Jesus in His majesty and the glory of the universe hangs upon the wheels of His advent chariot.

What a vision from God's balcony! Whether we look in the past or around us or into the future, we see our brethren. Then let us remember as wearers of the name Christian only, we hold in this period of God's providence, the cure for the divided church. Our message therefore, to the present and to the future is to remove the barriers to brotherhood by a larger loyalty to the personality of Christ. The rightful contribution of the Disciples to modern religion is the widening of faith's view, for the best asset in this world is faith in Jesus Christ and love for all who love our Lord.

Faith and Obedience.

2. We hold the deposits of the past; we are the joint creators of the present; we are debtors to the future. It is the broadest platform in the world. Holding with deep conviction to personal faith in Jesus Christ and obedience to His commandments, we must hold with equally deep conviction to fellowship with all believers, else we drop to the level of a sect.

Our brethren of other communities are not to us as the Jewish sects were to Christianity. If that were so, our task would be that of conversion; but our religious neighbors, who are serving Christ, are our brethren and our task is that of fellowship. There are serious barriers to this achievement, but it is in God's program and it can no more be kept back than the sun can be kept down.

Millions are now anxious for the removal of the barriers that the whole church may be one and to that end five propositions have been presented in recent years. The Roman Catholics insist on the repentance of Protestants and their return to the supreme authority in ecclesiastical affairs of the pope, but this proposition has never been taken seriously any more than the proposition of the liberals, who argue for only the two dogmas of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. The Episcopalians propose a merger with the rights of all parties concerned, only all must recognize the claims of the historic episcopate, which likewise necessarily removes their proposition from serious consideration, however sincere the Lambeth council was in framing it. The Presbyterians and Congregationalists are the leaders in the federation of the churches, which is merely an alliance without disturbing the forms of church polity or doctrine. This last is the best of these propositions, but all of them stop short of the real issue.

Disciples of Christ.

About a hundred years ago, some Presbyterians and Baptists proposed to return to Christ by way of the New Testament in name, in ordinances and in life. These abandoned their human creeds and denominational names and became Christians only and their proposition to all Christendom is to do likewise, for human creeds and denominational names are the greatest barriers to a united fellowship.

These Christians, who were first called "Disciples of Christ" about a hundred years ago, propose going back to Christ and Christ alone, for Christianity started neither from theological ideas nor ethical principles, but from the personality of Jesus Christ. To be in possession of its original power, it must go back to fidelity to that personality. There has been no message like this since the church divided and its practicability is simple and axiomatic. It at once over shadows all other propositions for the union of Christendom, for only in unstinted loyalty to Christ do we find the key to brotherhood. To turn aside to surrender the ordinances on the one hand or to narrow the fellowship on the other is to give a sectarian complexion to an unsectarian message. We have no choice other than fidelity to Christ, into whom we have been baptized and with whom we were raised up to walk in newness of life, until there shall have been such friendship between Him and us that all men shall know that we have been with Jesus. We have among us some of the noblest spirits of this world, brave and true men in the pulpit and faithful and consecrated members in the pew.

A Critical Period.

I beg that you will pardon me if I speak too frankly, but these are serious times and soft words will not suffice. If I mistake not, the Disciples of Christ are facing the most critical period in their history. It is so with all movements. After passing a few decades or a century at most, they drift from their original principles either into wreckage or crystallization. It was so with every order started in the Roman Catholic Church and it has likewise been so with every movement in Protestantism. Loyola upstayed a falling church by his genuine piety, but the Jesuits became the curse and shame of Rome. The Lutheran movement crystallized, as has also Methodism and every other Protestant body of any years. The Disciples are passing the way of all others and I fear that the prow of our ship is too decidedly set toward sectarian harbors and unless we turn our course in conformity to Thomas Campbell's clarion call, we are destined to become one of the most sectarian bodies, as love unused becomes unlove. These conditions must not be smoothed over with self-laudatory sentences and self-congratulatory reports, but it behooves us as students of history and servants of Christ to face the bare facts and humbly set ourselves to the solution.

Lack of Knowledge.

In the last twelve months I have traveled more than 16,000 miles in the interest of American missions. I have spoken to thousands and have held conferences with hundreds, from which I have learned that, in the opinion of many of our brethren, not more than a tenth, or at most twenty-five per cent, of our membership know anything at all about what the mission of the Disciples is. They may know that the New Testament baptism is by immersion; but if that is all they might as well be Baptists. They may know that the churches of Christ have elders and deacons; but if that is all, they might as well be Presbyterians. They may know that the New Testament government is congregational; but if that is all, they might as well be Congregationalists.

I do not speak as a partisan, but it must be recognized as axiomatically true that where there is division and discord, it is wisest to refer the whole matter to a supreme authority. It is so today. The Church of Christ is divided into many unaffiliated bodies and the greatest call of Christendom is back to Christ by the way of the New Testament, in name, in ordinances and in life.

The Real Mission.

However thoroughly one may be educated in literature and science, if he does not understand the mission of the Disciples, he is counted among the ignorant in our membership, and intelligence among us is that vision and heart that sees and believes that the absolute leadership of Jesus Christ is necessary for a united church and a redeemed world. If it be true that only ten to fifteen per cent of our membership—and most of the opinions center around these figures—if it be true that these figures represent the intelligence among us, it is impossible to fulfill our mission, unless some definite plan be established whereby the ninety or eighty-five per cent of our membership shall be educated into the responsibility of the sacred commission, which we hold as Christians only.

I do not know but that the problem of ourselves at this period is quite as urgent to us at least as the problem of the divided church. Do not misunderstand me, for I am not advocating the study of a catechism. Far be it from me. But I insist on a systematic and devotional study of the Scriptures until every Disciple shall recognize the personal leadership of Jesus in his life and shall intelligently practice the principles of Jesus both as to himself and to those about him, that every home shall have a family altar and that religion shall be lifted out of the pale of dogma and be made the life of mankind.

Great Activity Today.

Never has there been more activity in the history of Christianity than now. The Laymen's Missionary Movement has swept through the whole church with a wonderful enthusiasm, bringing to the front more than ever the necessity of a united church, until the leaders of all the missionary forces have been brought to plead for the union of Christendom. These leaders are speaking with no uncertain sound and the religious bodies with which they are identified are making large contributions of money in launching plans for a closer and more cordial fellowship of believers.

An Auspicious Time.

It is an auspicious time, and it is a pertinent question to ask ourselves, as Disciples of Christ, what are we doing for the solution of this problem? And the answer is that our contribution to the union of Christendom is speaking faithfully regarding it from our pulpits, where it is heard only by our own people and the inactive members of other churches and persons of the world, and by writing of it in our papers, which are subscribed to largely by our own people. I beg that you will pardon me, but you know that this is not enough and unless we do more, especially in this period, the Christian world will have a right to doubt our sincerity.

They know little of us and our mission, and it is largely if not entirely our fault. I doubt if there is another religious body of the same numerical strength in the history of the world that is so little known as the Disciples of Christ and, considering the commission that we hold, there is no other religious body that ought to be better known. I question whether this contentment to be so little known and this indifference to making world-wide this proposition for the union of Christendom is not grave disloyalty to Christ. "If this proposition is not of God, it ought to be abandoned; if it is of God, it ought to call for an unparalleled enthusiasm on the part of every Disciple of Christ, until all Christendom shall hear in kindest words that back to Christ in name, in ordinances and in life is the only cure for the scandalous division in the house of God."

A New Charter.

The Episcopalians have incorporated the Christian Unity Foundation with the purpose of promoting Christian union at home and throughout the world until the various Christian bodies are knit together in one organic life. Such is the aim expressed in their charter and we rejoice in their splendid vision; and fifty years hence the Disciples of Christ will look back on this convention as one of the most eventful in our illustrious history because at this convention a definite program has been launched. This council which was formed on Wednesday should be as important among us as the Foreign Christian Missionary Society or the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, or the American Christian Missionary Society, or any or all of our colleges.

A Clearing House of Thought.

This council should put out a magazine, not as a propaganda, but as a clearing house of thought on Christian union. As we exercise the right to think, we must grant that right to others, for until we have stood on their level, we cannot lift them out of denominational names and human creeds. Open wide its pages to all who have convictions on Christian union and let them speak without criticism through its pages to their brothers who are thinking with them on the necessity of a united church, and make it the exchange of every paper in the English speaking world. Send it both to Disciples and certain other Disciples, if you please, for there are ripe souls in all communions, who would gladly receive this as a benediction of peace, and the instincts of a united church would burn more deeply within us. Besides all this, who knows whether the last word on Christian union has been spoken? So far, our proposition is in advance of all others, but maybe another voice shall melt the last wall of sectarianism as the voice of the Campbells marked the beginning of its decay.

Endowment Necessary.

Such a council should receive an endowment as large as that of a college and all the churches should have a part in the contribution, for the union of Christendom is of first importance and the necessity is laid more upon us for such a service than any other religious body, for to this end did we become Christians only. The Protestant world needs it and it is riper now than any other time in its history and we ourselves need it for our own salvation. Others may see another way out of our danger, but to me the broader field of fellowship is pre-eminent over all other policies, for out of a friendly conference, we would find a common basis and the leadership of Jesus would make us forget all our unbrotherliness and leave behind all sectarian barriers.

Democratic in Spirit.

3. In common with all other Christians we are under obligations to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ. If it is not belittling the Disciples to say so, it appears that they are adapted more to America than any other people. The Roman Catholic Church is monarchical in government and consequently it is best suited to those countries where there are monarchical governments. Those Protestant bodies with human creeds are best suited to those countries where a limited monarchy or the government by the aristocracy prevails, but here in the heart of this greatest government of democracy on the globe has been established the most democratic religious movement in the world. I do not believe that it was an accident that the Disciples of Christ were planted in the heart of the republic, but I believe that it will be a calamity to them if they do not rise to the occasion.

A Divided Church.

There are thousands of fields in America unoccupied by any people and the divided church is making a lame effort at Christian-

The Work of the Woman's Society

The President's Message

BY MRS. ANNA R. ATWATER.

That every year several thousand of our people come up to our annual convention indicates the importance which is attached to this occasion. And every one of these meetings does mark an epoch in our work. As we come to the close of the first year of the new century of our history as a people, we are at the thirty-sixth anniversary of the organization of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and at the period when the fiftieth anniversary of woman's organized missionary work is being celebrated.

It was in the winter of 1860 and '61 that the first Woman's Missionary Society was organized. This was a union society. Seven years later, after the Civil War had ended and women had proven, in the stress of the times, their ability to do many things that previously seemed to be beyond their sphere of action, and a power to dare and to do in the face of opposition in private and public circles, the women of one church realized enough strength in their own numbers to organize the first denominational woman's missionary society. One by one, women of other churches organized their societies.

Appeal for Service.

Our people, unlike Israel, were not anxious to be like those around them, consequently the movement among them was late in starting. Women in all the churches were stirred by the events of the times. The need of women in heathen lands was making its mighty appeal to their hearts, and the possibilities of a broader service for their own lives were alluring. No doubt many of our young women in the sixties longed to go to the field, but had no opportunity. In 1863 one of our noble young women was graduated from Oberlin College. She had been stirred by the growth of work for women and by the fact that some were already daring to go to the dark lands to take the Gospel story, but not one of our women had ventured on such a career. There was no missionary society at that time in our church to send a volunteer to the field. She dreaded the sensation that would be created if she should ask to be sent by the church. She testified that she knew our people would call her insane to think of such a thing, and tell her that her place was to stay at home.

A Broadening Vision.

Where there is no vision the people perish, and there must be a constantly broadening vision or they perish. There were some things our people saw right clearly from the first. They saw their mission to the Christian world, and true to the vision they were making their impress. Who doubts that the division of the Word as taught by our fathers, had its influence? Who doubts the power of the restoration of the ordinances of the church to their rightful place? Who fails to see that the slogan "Where the Bible speaks" had its proper application to the problem of human creeds? But had not the broadening vision of the unsaved world opened before us while we caught the force of the Great Commission as marching orders to us personally, we would have perished as a people. As we have been obedient to that heavenly vision, we have been prospered.

A little more than three weeks ago, in Lexington, Ky., Mrs. Caroline Neville Pearre was laid to rest. It seems entirely fitting at this time to speak of her, for she was among our people one of the see-ers of visions. Whether most of us have looked upon her face or not, we know her through what she wrought. At the mention of her name there comes a picture before every daughter of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, a picture dear as it is familiar. It is that of a beautiful woman on her knees in her morning devotions, taking to the Father the yearning of her heart for those who sit in darkness, and for a richer service for the women of the church of Christ in her loved land. While thus she brought her will into submission to His will, while she opened her mind and heart to see and understand, the vision came. She arose from her devotions, and like one of old time, she was not disobedient to the heavenly vision. It was out of this experience and the brave and constant efforts that followed that organized mission work for women of the Church of Christ was born, in October, 1874. In the Missionary Training School and Headquarters of the Board at Indianapolis, there will be a tablet placed in loving memory by the women of the Missionary Society of Columbia, Missouri, of which she was a member, and on it will be the name of Mrs. Caroline Neville Pearre, honored Mother of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. How just is the title, and more than three score and ten thousand daughters rise up to call her blessed. From that early beginning the work broadened as the work grew and as the lives of our women have developed.

MRS. ANNA R. ATWATER.

In the Field.

We look out over the fields and the work that has been done in them the past year. There is much that is gratifying. In Jamaica, though our missionaries report quite a number who have become discouraged and fallen away from their allegiance to Christ, yet they tell us that two hundred and eighty have been added to the churches.

From India one of our missionaries writes "Let it be said to the glory of the Christian faith in India that the one thing that is attracting the attention of the educated Hindus and Mohammedans in this land today is the extraordinary progress of the Christian community, progress not merely numerical but also intellectual and social. Many in this land, like Pliny and Younger, who was Governor of Pontus and Bithynia, writing to his royal master concerning Christianity, are saying, 'The number of Christians is so great as to call for serious consultation. The contagion of this superstition has spread not only through the cities, but is spreading through the villages of the country.' One hundred thousand patients have been treated in our hospitals the past year, though a part of the year our number of medical missionaries has been less than formerly; and the spectacle of a former priest of Vienna preaching the Gospel of Christ to his people has given new inspiration to the workers.

Work Gaining Ground.

Our mission in Mexico reports two hundred and fifty-five brought to Christ the past year. Foundations are today being laid for a new mission building for our frontier work.

Porto Rico never had a better corps of missionaries, better fitted to their work than are those on the field today. One hundred baptisms are reported from this island.

The work in the Argentine has been slow, but the little church there now numbers sixteen. There are four missionaries, and the coming year we trust may find the force increased.

The work in Liberia, South West Africa, steadily gains ground. The day school enrolled sixty-two pupils, and twelve have been won to Christ.

Evangelistic work has been done in thirty-one states and the reports give unusual encouragement. The interest in Bible Chair work was never greater than at the present time, nor were there ever so many demands for this form of work.

Our mountain schools have enrolled sixteen hundred and fifty students and from their influence one hundred and forty young people have been brought to Christ.

The work in behalf of the negroes has been growing steadily in its appeal to our people, and it is gratifying to see the interest of the colored brethren in the schools for their young people. They are putting forth faithful efforts to help the progress of the work.

Our work on the coast for the Oriental people has reached and influenced several hundred during the past year. For all this work among Chinese and Japanese we own no building of our own.

The Lack of Workers.

Again this year we must report the lack of a sufficient number of workers. No other need is so apparent to the one who reads our reports with care. We have not been entirely neglectful of this need, though falling far short of meeting it. From the Pittsburgh Convention Mrs. M. R. Ford and Miss Zona Smith went to the Argentine; Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Ghormley and Miss Emma Ennis were added to the forces in India. Later in the year, Mr. and Mrs. M. C. Vanneter were found at the work in Porto Rico, and as this report is being rendered, Mr. and Mrs J. P. McLeod, Mrs. George E. Springer, and Miss Mayme Jackson are en route to India. As they set sail Oct. 4, Mr. and Mrs. Davis wrote: "We leave at eleven o'clock today for the long journey, as your representatives to carry the message of Jesus to a people who sit in darkness. May the Lord of the harvest bless His Word among the nations. Our new missionaries are splendid. All well and happy in going, and rejoicing in the mercy and love of God our Father. More later, after we cast off. 'Kept by the power of God.' All send love." Besides the new forces for the fields, three couples who were on furlough a year ago have returned to India. Miss Nora Siler has gone back to her work in Porto Rico, and Mr. and Mrs G. D. Purdy to their's in Jamaica. India asked earnestly for twelve new workers this fall. Our answer is but a feeble one when we send four. Jamaica is pleading for a man and wife for King's Gate. The workers in the Argentine are strongly urging for a couple to open up a new station. Other fields need workers, but these mentioned have the greatest need.

The Need of Buildings.

And in buildings, the immediate demands are by no means insignificant. Jamaica stands with pleading hands raised for the rebuilding of those chapels destroyed by the earthquake. The less encouraging report from that field this year may be largely accounted for by this delay. Jamaica's need is constantly on our hearts. If means were in our hands we should do the work and save the waste that must necessarily go on until these congregations are properly housed. The Girls' Orphanage in Porto Rico has been too long delayed, and another chapel ought to be built. The lack of a second bungalow for the overworked missionaries at Mahoba, India, is really endangering health and life and the bungalow at Bina must have extensive repairs to make it a safe home. Mexico has vast opportunities which await more workers, more schools and more chapels.

In the home field appeals are continuous for the enlargement of our schools, for more Bible Chairs to be established in state universities, and for more evangelistic help Some one has said that there are many times for reformation but only one time for formation. Now is the time for formation in the lives of the untaught children of the less favored part of our land. Now is the time for formation when the strangers, torn loose from their old world homes, have come to start anew within our gates. Now is the time for formation in our great new West Land when the earth itself, even the desert, is being transformed and made habitable.

Because of the needs of our fields at home and abroad, and because of the opportunities that offer themselves on every hand, we urge you forward in this great work. Because of our faithful missionaries who have given all for the cause, and are working beyond their strength till we send recruits, we plead for greater zeal and earnestness. Because of the noble women who as pioneers in this cause labored and endured, and did not enter fully into the promises, we plead with you to come up to your high privilege of life and service that their joy may be full in you. The Church of Christ, of which the Christian Woman's Board of Missions is a vital part, as Bishop Simpson says, "Must grope her way through the courts and alleys and purlieus of the great city, and up the broken staircase, and into the bare room, and beside the loathsome sufferer. She must go into the tent with the soldier, into the ship with the sailor, into the field with the farmer, into the shop with the mechanic, into the factory with the operator, into the counting-room with the merchant. Like the air, she must press equally upon all surfaces of society; like the sea, she must reach into every nook of the shore-line of humanity; and like the sun she must shine on things foul and low as well as fair and high; for she was organized, commissioned and equipped for the moral renovation of the whole earth." Because of the unfilled mission of the church, we urge you forward, upward, onward.

The Missionary Call to Young Men

World's Supreme Opportunity in Foreign Field

BY JOHN G. McGAVRAN.

Sentiment and emotion are, happily, no longer dominant factors in deciding on a missionary career. Pecuniarily, the foreign field has nothing to offer. Duty was once supposed to be an all constraining motive. Even now people sometimes think of missionaries as men, who, Joan of Arc like, hear the call of duty and hasten to obey. Thoughtful men no longer give the missionary such a position of favoritism among the servants of Jesus. The call for the gospel, by the people of all lands, and the command of the Master to take the gospel to them, come with equal force, and apply with equal rigor to every man in the church.

"Can You Go?"

There are two questions before the church today. Our Lord more and more insistently, each succeeding year, demands an unflinching self-revealing answer. His first question is, "Can you go?" This question recognizes the fact of almost numberless limitations in answering the call of duty. One's age, his health, his family, his ability, his education, his spiritual gifts are all factors limiting his ability to respond. We admit that these limitations are great in extent and degree, but, when all have been allowed for, there remain many thousands of young men in the church, many hundreds, certainly, among the Disciples, a hundred or more, probably, in this room, who cannot look the Master squarely in the face tonight and give any other answer than "I can go." And for every man who says, "I can go," there are five hundred who must answer "I can send," although they themselves are unable to go.

"Will You Go?"

The second question is "Will you go?" The answer to this question, given by the hundreds whose circumstances, abilities and qualifications compel them to say, "I can go," constitutes the most serious problem in mission work today. The moment the majority of those who can go will go the problem will be solved.

No man cares to go in for a career that tends to make his life narrow or circumscribed. The missionary career, like the higher diplomatic service of a government, is at the very top of the ladder as a broadener of personal life. It begins with travel. It is a life of many lands and peoples. It is a life of exploration and research. It is a life of new history, new ethics, new language, new mental vision. The missionary has not reached his field till he begins to be conscious of a quickening of his intellectual life. He meets men and conditions and philosophies which stimulate every fiber of his brain. Like an ambassador, he stands before kings and princes and the doors leading to the culture and art of ancient days open before him. The opportunity for self culture is limited only by the man's own capacity.

The next opportunity open to the missionary, who is looking for what is worth while, is found in the political reorganization —in many cases rebirth—of the nations. There is no man in mission lands who has a greater opportunity to influence the development of new political institutions. If he care to make himself familiar with the history and politics of the country he works in; if he care to identify himself with the interests of the people he works among; if he have any knowledge of the philosophy of government his advice, his warnings, his suggestions will have a weight, out of all proportion to his position as a humble missionary of the cross, in deciding great questions of state. The very existence on the statute books, of laws tolerable to Christian conscience, is over and over again due to missionary influence. The change of sovereignty in the Congo Free State was forced on an unwilling world by missionary insistence.

Greater far than the opportunity for political usefulness, is the place he is bound to fill in the social development of three quarters of the inhabitants of the world.

Social Reconstruction.

The missionary knows the people. He knows their literature, their institutions, their customs, their aspirations, as no one else does. Every where, in all mission lands, the leaven of commerce, travel, education and Christianity is forcing the reconstruction of the whole social fabric. The codes of business, honor, and ethics are being made over. Family relationships, community relationships and foreign relationships are changing in nearly every foreign field. It is the finest place in the world for the student of social problems, for the man who wants to see humanity in the act of growth—for the man who wants to leave the stamp of his mind on the institutions of future generations. So great is this opportunity and so great the need for the influence of men of far reaching views that no man ought to go to a great foreign field without some knowledge of the principles of sociology, and some preparation to help meet the evils which inevitably accompany social revolution.

Measured by the standard of personal influence, the fourth opportunity greatly exceeds those already spoken of. The children of today are the men of tomorrow and the rulers of next week. Sooner or later every people and every nation becomes what its schools make it If any man think it worth while to pass through his own hands the future governors, and magistrates, and legislators, and educators of great empires, he will search in vain for an opportunity like that offered by the mission schools and colleges of the foreign field. If any man think the gratitude, nay almost veneration, of the best men and women among half the people of the world, is a trophy worth securing let him become the fountain of learning for their boys and girls. Let him realize that he goes out, not only to teach, but to teach others to teach, to formulate educational codes and fix educational standards. The mission school, in many lands, sets the educational pace and has the inside track. It was his Presbyterian missionary teacher who turned Raja Sir Harnam Singh from Hinduism to Christianity. It was Robert College which made New Turkey possible.

The Real Purpose.

After all, however, the opportunities so far considered are only incidental to a strenuous missionary career. They do not make that career. If unduly pressed they may even nullify the life of the missionary. We do not send men out that they may gain self culture, or that they may do eminent work in politics, sociology, or philosophy. No man worth anything on the field would consider anyone, or all of them, in themselves, a worthy motive for saying, "I will go."

The fifth great opportunity which we shall consider pertains to the religious life of the people to whom we are sent. It is the establishment of the Kingdom. It is the expansion of the content of the term "brotherhood," until it shall include the whole of mankind. Even the merely secular mind realizes that a new day is dawning in the east. The old religious life, the old experience, the old moralization, the old inspiration, the old theology—all these are going or gone. The new wine has burst the old skins. Their young men are seeing visions and their old men dreaming dreams. The futility of their traditional faith, and its inability to meet the life of today, have taken strong hold on the minds of multitudes of the world's greatest thinkers. Never in the history of men has the door stood so wide open for men who measure opportunity by the effect producible by the impact of their minds on those of their fellows.

The Battleground.
